CORRESPONDENCE.

SPAIN.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Hale.

No. 92.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 2, 1867.

SIR : Mr. Perry's dispatch No. 14, of the 13th ultimo, upon the subject of the quarantine in Spain of vessels from the United States, has been received.

It is noticed with regret that the remonstrances which, by the instructions from this department, Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, he was directed to address to that government, has proved unavailing.

The reasons which he represents as having been assigned by the minister of the interior for justifying the quarantine, are founded upon obvious misconceptions of fact in regard to the existence of contagious disease, especially yellow fever, in this country.

That epidemic was restricted to a few ports only of the southern States. If vessels from those ports had been subjected to the quarantine, there would have been no ground of complaint.

The rule has, however, been applied without discrimination to vessels from all parts of the United States, even when bearing a health certificate, attested by the Spanish consul at the port whence they may have cleared. This seem to be unreasonable and unjust. It has given rise to numerous complaints, which have from time to time been made known to your legation. The letter of Mr. Alpheus Hardy, of Boston, a copy of which is inclosed, relates to the case of his bark Young Turk, which has been subjected to the quarantine without apparent necessity, and to the great loss of her owner.

It is hoped that the Spanish minister of the interior may see cause to rescind his order, and that, seeing the serious mistake which he has committed, the government of Spain will make good the damages which United States citizens have sustained.

If the Spanish secretary of the interior persists in maintaining the quarantine, we must protest with energy, and will expect indemnification.

I telegraphed to you to-day on this important subject.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

JOHN P. HALE, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Hardy to Mr. Seward.

BOSTON, November 27, 1867.

SIR: Permit me to call your attention to the great wrong practised upon the United States shipping trading with Spain. I cannot better do this than by stating my own case. My bark, Young Turk, sailed hence the last of August, with a cargo wholly of staves, bound for Malaga, Spain. At that time our port was entirely free of any contagious disease; the officers and crew in good health. The bark was cleared at the custom-house with a clean bill of health, duly and properly certified by the Spanish consul at this port. After a passage of about twenty-five days she arrived at Malaga, all on board in good health, but was not allowed to enter the port because the yellow fever was in New Orleans, or the cholera in some port of the United States. The bark was ordered off to Port Mahon; kept there ten days; compelled to pay port charges and quarantine fees, doctor's bills, &c., was thirty-seven days in getting to, at, and from Mahon, and at a large expense for time, wages, provisions, &c., besides throwing the voyage wholly out of its plan, bringing her here too late for the best sale of her cargo, and making a difference to the owners of several thousand dollars.

The Spanish government make no difference between New Orleans and Boston, and pay no regard to the certificate of our authorities, backed by their own consul, to whom we paid a fee for his name, but send our vessels off without reason, much to our damage. Our masters assert it is mainly to secure fees. Their vessels are not so treated with us, nor do they treat other nations as they do us.

For instance, they put Gibraltar down as a foul port, but by the remonstrance of the British government they withdrew their edict and allowed British vessels from Gibraltar to enter Spain, while our vessels hence, after being admitted at Gibraltar, and unloading there side by side with those from England, and associating with their crew, were ordered off.

The whole system is unjust, as I view it, and I trust may commend itself to your attention.

We are large customers for Spanish products, taking from Malaga more than half of all the fruit she exports, (from 800,000 to 1,000,000 boxes out of a crop of 1,300,000, at 1,500,000,) and it is a peculiar hardship to be thus troubled and taxed from this port when and because there is yellow fever in Louisiana or Texas.

Pardon my free expression of a felt wrong, and allow me to remain, with high regards, yours, &c.,

ALPHEUS HARDY.

SIR: The consul of the United States at Malaga has communicated to this department the particulars of a mutinous affray which took place, on the 21st of October last, on board an American vessel lying in that port named the Abd-el-Kader. The captain and mate of the vessel were assaulted and severely wounded, and but for the timely interference of the officers of the Spanish revenue boat Alerta, who caused the arrest of the mutineers and their delivery to the United States consul, the affair would no doubt have proved a more serious one than it did.

You will, upon the receipt of this instruction, make the above-mentioned facts known to the minister for foreign affairs of her Catholic Majesty, and convey in suitable terms the acknowledgments of this government for the friendly assistance given by the officers of the Alenta.

SIR : I have the satisfaction of informing you that last week we had the pleasure of a visit from Admiral and Mrs. Farragut and a portion of his staff at this city. Though his stay here was very brief, he arriving early Wednesday morning and leaving Saturday evening, yet I think I may say that it was very pleasant and entirely satisfactory to the admiral and his party.

I had the pleasure of introducing him to her Majesty the Queen, and her husband, styled "the King" by courtesy and I believe also by virtue of an act of the Cortes, to the ministers of war, state, and navy, and also to the members of the diplomatic corps, whom I invited with a number of friends in Spanish society to meet the admiral at my house.

All were charmed with the bearing and deportment of the admiral who bore so meekly and modestly the multiplied honors and attentions of which he has been the recipient in his European travels.

I can but hope and believe that his visit to this capital will have a most salutary influence on the relations of the two countries, for it is not often that the inhabitants of this capital have an opportunity of meeting and greeting distinguished Americans who have shed luster on our national character, and I am sure that there could not have come from that number any one who could have done more to favorably impress the minds of the Spanish people than Admiral Farragut and his party.

SIR : Your dispatches to No. 113, of the 6th instant, inclusive, have been received.

The refusal of the Spanish government, as announced to you in Mr. Arrazola's note of the 5th instant, to repeal the quarantine interdict which has been a subject of recent correspondence between this department and the legation at Madrid, is much to be regretted. That refusal, so far as it relates to this country, seems to be based upon more incorrect statements than even the original promulgation of the interdict. It assumes the continuance of yellow fever at New Orleans, whereas it is well known that, as usual, that disease ceases there with the first frost, and any danger of its introduction into or propagation in Spain must have been annihilated by the same cause there. Under these circumstances it becomes my duty to instruct you to give notice to the minister for foreign affairs that the Spanish government will be held accountable for any damages which the shipping of the United States may have sustained or may hereafter sustain in consequence of the quarantine regulation referred to.

You will also express regrets at this conclusion of a matter in which so much forbearance has been shown by this government.

SIR: I am instructed by the Secretary of State of the United States to make known to her Majesty's government that a mutinous affray occurred on the 21st of October last on board the American vessel named the Abd-el-Kader, in the port of Malaga, and that but for the timely interference of the officers of the Spanish revenue boat, the Alerta, who caused the arrest of the mutineers and their delivery to the United States consul, the affair would no doubt have proved a more serious one than it did. And I have much pleasure in communicating these facts to your excellency, to comply with the further instructions of my government, in expressing to her Majesty's government and to the officers of the Alerta the grateful acknowledgments of the government of the United States for the friendly assistance given by the officers of the Alerta on that occasion.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, January 20, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 96, dated December 30, 1867, was received in this legation on Friday the 17th instant, and I was somewhat embarrassed by the fact that on the same day there appeared in the official Gazette of Madrid a royal order of the 14th instant, materially altering the quarantine regulations of the Spanish government so far as relates to all the sea-coast of the United States from Charleston east, but leaving New Orleans and the Gulf ports still subject to the same interdict as before.

Under these circumstances, I have not for the present formally communicated the substance of your instructions to the Spanish minister of foreign affairs, but have unofficially given him notice that I had received instructions from you on the subject, which I had not for the present communicated to him, in the hope that as the Spanish government had shown a disposition to modify and relax the very stringent regulations heretofore enforced, they might be induced, in view of the statements of your said dispatch in regard to the disappearance of the yellow fever at New Orleans, be induced still further to modify or repeal the restrictions as to vessels coming from New Orleans and the Gulf ports generally.

With this view I have addressed to him a note, of which I herewith inclose you a copy, deeming it prudent to wait a few days after the Spanish government shall have received my communication to see if they are disposed to make still further modifications in their quarantine regulations complained of.

With sentiments of the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant.

JOHN P. HALE.

P. S.—Please find inclosed part of the Gazette referred to, containing the royal order of the 14th instant.

J. P. H.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, January 19, 1868.

SIR: I have received from my government an instruction dated the 30th December, relative to the sanitary regulations injurious to the commerce of the United States, which the government of Spain has thought it necessary to enforce in spite of the observations heretofore addressed to your excellency on this subject.

But these instructions reach me at the same time with the official Gazette of the 17th instant, which contains a royal order of the 14th instant greatly modifying the regulations heretofore enforced.

I notice, however, that these are maintained as regards New Orleans and other ports of the United States on the Gulf of Mexico.

The instruction from Washington before referred to contains the information that at New Orleans (and the statement may reasonably be regarded as covering all the Gulf ports of the United States) the epidemic disease which has been prevalent through the summer had ceased as usual with the first frost.

I therefore earnestly request your excellency to give this intelligence its full weight and effect, and cause the exception still maintained in the royal order of the 14th instant to the prejudice of vessels proceeding from the Gulf ports of the United States to be removed.

In view of such hoped-for action on the part of her Majesty's government in entire conformity with the spirit manifested in the said royal order of the 14th instant, I will again refer this question to Mr. Seward, suspending the execution of the instruction written by him in ignorance of the recent action of her Majesty's government, and trusting that I may speedily be able to communicate to him the additional relief now solicited.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

You will consequently suggest in the proper quarter that a measure of this character should be adopted by the government to which you are accredited. If your suggestion should be favorably received, you may follow it by another to the effect that all the parties to the war referred to should appoint plenipotentiaries to meet here for the purpose of bringing about a definite peace. At the time indicated, I went with the purpose of making the communication to him, but found him fully advised of what I had proposed to inform him, as he had previously been fully informed thereof, as he told me, by Mr. Goñi, the Spanish minister in Washington. Mr. Arrazola expressed himself highly gratified at this new proof of the persistent friendship of the United States, and having expressed a desire that I should make my communication to him in writing, and promised to make his answer thereto in the same manner, I acceded to his suggestion, and shall forthwith put my communication to him in that form, and as soon as I get an answer from him will communicate the same to you.

SIR: In my dispatch No. 128, dated April 18, 1868, I informed you that Mr. Arrazola, the minister of state, expressed a desire that I should make a communication to him in writing of the statement which I then made verbally, and that I promised I would do so. Accordingly on the same day, viz, April 18, I complied with my promise, and on the 13th of May I received an answer from the new minister of state, of which I herewith inclose a copy and a translation of the same.

Perhaps the delay occasioned between the date and the delivery may be explained by the fact that in the mean time there has been a change of ministry occasioned by the death of the Duke of Valencia, and further, immediately after, the festivities of the court, occasioned by the marriage of the eldest daughter of the Queen with a younger brother of the ex-King of Naples.

MINISTRY OF STATE.
Palace, May 1, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: I have had the honor of receiving the note of your excellency of the date of the 18th of the last month, in which, in conformity to the instructions of Mr. Seward, your excellency is pleased to express the desire that, by means of a formal armistice, there should be terminated all the inconveniences which the passive state of war, at present existing between Spain and the allied republics of the Pacific, occasions to the United States; and for that purpose proposes that there be adopted a resolution to that effect, and that afterwards there be in Washington a conference of plenipotentiaries of the interested powers for the definitive arrangement of a peace.

The government of her Majesty receives with favor the suggestion of Mr. Seward on this subject, and as your excellency very well knows the continuance of this war has not been owing to them, and satisfied that the benefits of peace now more than ever necessary to the welfare of the civilized world, is pleased to do what it can to carry into effect the realization of the propositions of the cabinet of Washington, putting an end to the inconveniences which the present state of things occasions to neutral powers.

In consequence, the Spanish government, seconding with its accustomed deference the views of the United States on this subject, are disposed to make a formal declaration of an armistice as soon as the other powers interested agree thereto, and at the same time is ready to nominate a representative to the conference at Washington who shall have power to treat of the terms of a definitive treaty of peace.

Upon this last subject, however, I ought to inform your excellency, to the end that you may communicate the same to the government of the United States, that the government of her Majesty must insist that there be fixed, in the first place, a point of time from which the matters to be discussed in the conference shall commence, and that on no pretense shall there be submitted to the conference anything heretofore arranged by international agreement.

Your excellency will observe the good and sincere desire which has always animated Spain, in favor of a peace honorable for all the nations engaged in this war of the Pacific, and the government of her Majesty hopes that the cabinet of Washington will appreciate this new proof of the sentiments of loyalty and justice which inspires its conduct, as her Majesty's government appreciates the friendly action of the United States.

I improve this opportunity for reiterating to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 1, 1868.

SIR: Complaints have of late been addressed to this department from various quarters, against the stern manner in which the custom-house authorities in Cuba carry into effect the very stringent regulations there in regard to importations, and in particular the minute requirements as to the manifests of cargoes.

While it may be allowed that the Spanish government has a perfect right to prescribe any terms which may not be otherwise provided for by treaty, upon which foreign commerce shall be carried on in that quarter, it is certainly for the interest of that commerce, and therefore of the revenue which the government expects from it, that honest traders should be protected from the exercise of arbitrary power, and that a fraud should not be assumed to have been intended, when errors obviously accidental, or occasioned by the different languages of the two countries, creep into manifests.

The literal and rigid execution of law in such cases cannot fail to work serious injustice, which this government will be slow to impute to her Catholic Majesty's government, or to any person acting in its behalf.

The revenue laws of most countries provide a system of equitable and summary relief in cases where a fine or forfeiture may have been incurred, willful negligence, or intention of fraud. The department is unable to say whether this provision exists in Cuba and Porto Rico.

If it does, the complaints above referred to seem to show that it has either been refused, or has been unduly withheld. You will consequently address such representations upon the subject to the minister for foreign affairs at Madrid, as will bring about an inquiry into, and a redress of the grievance adverted to. You will, however, assure him that this government has no intention of seeking to screen any dishonest trader from any willful evasion of the Spanish revenue laws which he may commit. We only desire that the extreme penalty of the law may not be visited upon those who may make accidental mistakes.

It might not be impertinent to refer the minister to the first section of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1797, a copy of which is inclosed, which contains the provisions in force in this country in such cases, and which, as we believe, have been found to be entirely satisfactory to individuals concerned, as well as to the government itself.

SIR: I transmit a copy of correspondence between this department and the vice-consul general of the United States at Havana, on the subject of the bond required by Cuban authorities on account of every person of African extraction who may repair to that island in a vessel of the United States.

The stipulation of the bond is that such persons shall not go ashore during the stay of the vessel in which they may have arrived.

This exaction must have been inconvenient and burdensome, even when such persons were much fewer than they now are, on board of United States vessels proceeding to that quarter. It is very desirable that there should be a repeal, or some relaxation of the regulation. To that end you will present the subject to the Spanish minister for foreign affairs.

You may say to him that while the enactment and enforcement of the regulation are acknowledged to be entirely within the discretion of the Spanish authorities, its necessity or even its expediency under existing circumstances is believed by us to be at least questionable.

Those authorities may be assured, however, that there is no disposition on our part to intervene, or to encourage intervention of any sort, in the domestic affairs of Cuba.

The great change of the political relations between the races in this country has made it the duty of this government to see that no unjust or unnecessary discriminations are made in foreign countries between citizens of the United States of different birth, extraction, or color.

I inclose, also, a copy of the bond referred to by Mr. Gibbs in his communication.

You will perceive that the evil complained of arises from a police regulation of this island respecting free persons of color coming to this island.

[Extract.]

NUEVITAS, February 29, 1868.

I beg leave to call your attention to certain charges made on American vessels, which go to augment the very heavy expenses already paid by American tonnage in Cuban ports, not only as a charge but, an act of severity to those who are now American citizens. I refer to colored seamen arriving at Cuban ports under the American flag.

All vessels having colored men or women that may act as stewardesses aboard, the authorities here exact from the consignee a bond of one thousand dollars that such colored people will not come ashore during the stay of the vessel in port; if such bonds are not given, the police go aboard of the vessel and the parties are taken and placed in prison until the vessel leaves. When the bond is given, the fees of bond and copy, ordered on stamped paper, amount to $5 25. I inclose a copy of the bond. This charge comes directly on the vessel, and is paid by the captain, who prefers paying it to having his men taken from aboard.

It is an old law, and in this port had not been carried into effect for some time, until about four years ago, when they have again placed it in operation, and is now vigorously carried out. Some of the captains inform me that it is not so in other parts of the island.

In the city of Nuevitas, on the 27th of February, 1868, before me, a notary public, and witnesses, appeared Mr. Richard Gibbs, representative of the commercial house of R. Gibbs & Co., a resident of this place, and declareth: That the American brig Udola, Captain Whittemore, from New York, consigned to him, anchored in this port on the 25th instant, having on board, as sailors, the negro men George Trimble and Johnny Trimble; and in compliance with article 23 of the Island Decrees, and 21 of Instructions issued the 1st of April, 1849, to prevent the negroes from being taken from the vessel by the police and imprisoned on land till the vessel is ready to leave, he hereby constitutes himself and his commercial house surety for the said negroes, and binds, himself to keep them on board, under the captain's eyes, and not allow them to go on shore under any pretext whatever, so long as the vessel remains in this port; and if it is proved that they have violated this contract, the surety now present shall pay a fine of 2,000 crowns (exudos) or $1,000; the penalty inflicted by said article 23 to be collected as by regular suit of court; and to this he subjects all his property, present and future, without recourse of privileges or legal rights.

This is the act of the deponent, and I attest his hand, in presence of the witnesses Hipolito Mier, Manuel Villafuerte, and Idalecio Barreto, all present.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 39, of the 16th instant, on the subject of the bonds required for negroes carried to Cuba on board of vessels of the United States, has been received.

As the requirement is pursuant to law, its discontinuance cannot be asked for as a matter of right. It appears, however, that it has not uniformly been enacted, some of the executive officers in Cuba having, it is supposed, deemed themselves warranted by circumstances from dispensing with it. The repeal of the law, or a general discontinuance of the exaction, is very desirable for us, now much more than formerly, since the abolition of negro slavery in this country has much increased the proportion of blacks who seek employment on board of vessels.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, San Ildefonso, July 28, 1868.

SIR: I have received your several dispatches numbered 113 and 114; the first about the manner in which the custom-house rules and regulations in the island of Cuba are carried into effect, and the other in regard to the oppressive regulations as to colored citizens of the United States on their arrival in Cuba. As soon as I received these several dispatches, I sent a note embodying their contents to the minister of state, and last evening I received from him replies to the same, copies of which I herewith inclose. As soon as I receive any further advices from the minister of state I will lose no time in advising you thereof.

Last year there was some difficulty in regard to our whaling vessels arriving at the Canary islands, as to the quarantine to which they were subjected, which was ultimately satisfactorily arranged at Madrid, after notice to this legation by the United States consul at Teneriffe of the embarrassments to which they had been subjected.

This year the consul, in anticipation of the like embarrassments, has written me under date of July 13, asking that a similar arrangement may be made this year. On the receipt of this letter, I addressed a note to the minister of state, inclosing to him a copy of the letter aforesaid, asking that a similar arrangement be made this year. Last evening I received from him an answer, a copy of which I herewith inclose, marked A.

Any further advices which I may receive touching this matter I will lose no time in communicating to you, and also to the consul at Teneriffe.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN P. HALE.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received to-day the letter of your excellency, in which you set forth the causes which induce the government of the United States to ask for a modification of the regulations in force in the island of Cuba in respect to the entry of individuals of the negro race in that ultra-marine province.

I have communicated the contents of your said letter to the minister of ultramar, and when he has come to any result on the subject I will give your excellency opportune notice thereof.

I improve this occasion for reiterating to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your excellency's letter of the 24th of the present month, in which, after referring to the terms in which the fiscal laws in the island of Cuba are generally carried into effect, your excellency solicits, by request of your government, that an investigation may be instituted on this subject, and that a remedy may be applied to the abuses which occasioned the above-mentioned letter of your excellency.

Notice was immediately given on this subject to the minister of ultramar, and as soon as the determination which he shall judge most convenient is reported, I shall have the honor to communicate it to your excellency.

I improve this occasion for reiterating to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received the note of your excellency of the 24th of the present month, relative to the quarantine of three days which is exacted in the Canary islands of whaling vessels. I communicated the letter of your excellency to the minister of gubernacion, as well as the letter of the consul of the United States in Teneriffe, which accompanied it, and I will give you opportune notice of the result arrived at.

I improve this occasion for reiterating the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 28th of July, No. 142, together with an accompaniment, namely, a note which was addressed to you on the 27th of July last by the Marquis of Roncali, secretary of state for foreign affairs, concerning the regulations which are now in force in the island of Cuba in respect to the entrance of seamen of the colored race into that province. These regulations bear inconveniently upon the commerce of the United States, and tend to excite injurious prejudices against Spain in this country, where happily all men are free. It is hoped the enlightened government of Spain will without unnecessary delay revise a policy which seems to be productive of no considerable benefit, while it cannot be otherwise than a fruitful ground of complaint on the part of friendly nations.

You may give a copy of the substance of this dispatch to the marquis, if it shall seem expedient.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, -

Washington, August 27, 1868.

SIR: I have received from the United States minister at Chili a copy of a note, which was addressed to him by the minister for foreign affairs for the republic of Chile, on the 16th of June last, in reply to a note of the United States minister which related to the proposition of the United States to Spain on the one hand, and the republics of the Pacific on the other, offering the good offices of the United States for the adjustment of the controversies, and a restoration of peace among the belligerents. From the Chilian minister's reply it is inferred, that while Chili is unwilling to accept the form of arbitration which was proposed by the United States to the belligerents, yet she would not be unwilling to co-operate with her allies in arriving at peace through means of a truce, which should be without limitation, and which should leave the questions of the war open, and should also leave the belligerents at liberty to renew the war upon due notice given.

The Chilian minister for foreign affairs refers, with apparent favor, in his communication to a proposition of indefinite truce, which appears to have been offered by France and Great Britain. The terms of this reply of the Chilian government would justify this government in retiring from any further continuance of its offices in mediation.

On the other hand, the same friendly disposition for the belligerents which prompted the proposition of this government has prevailed on me to submit the reply of the Chilian government for the consideration of Spain, to the end that her Catholic Majesty's government, if it thinks proper, may inform the United States whether it is disposed to enter into such a truce as the Chilian government contemplates.

If the Spanish government shall desire the United States to make any further communication on this subject to the Chilian government, I will cheerfully perform that duty.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, San Sebastian, August 27, 1868.

SIR: In the latter part of May I received from the consul of the United States at Mahon a communication complaining of the treatment shown to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Canandaigua, by the sanitary authorities of that port, and especially in that these authorities had forced the officers and crew of that ship to go on shore and pass review before one of the health officers, a proceeding which the consul qualified, I think justly, as dangerous for the ship and discourteous to the flag of the United States which had been confided to that ship's company to keep and defend. I immediately represented the facts to the minister of state of her Catholic Majesty in such terms as seemed to be demanded by the occasion, and to that note, dated June 1st, I have now received a reply, dated on the 13th instant, at Lequeitio, a neighboring village on this coast, where the court of Spain is now sojourning, accompanied by the minister of state for foreign affairs. A translation of this note goes inclosed, and would seem to be satisfactory in so far as it recognizes the bad conduct of the employés complained of, states that they have been rebuked for the same, and expresses confidence that such incidents will not be repeated in future.

Yours, respectfully,

JOHN P. HALE.

MINISTERIAL DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Lequeitio, August 13, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, in reply to your note of the 1st of last June, that the ministerial department of the interior government of the kingdom has recognized the error of the employés of the quarantine ground at Mahon, in admitting to that lazaretto the war steamer of the United States Canandaigua, and in treating her crew as if they had come from a foul port, whilst the ship should have been subjected only to an observation of three days in one of the ports designated as quarantine grounds for observation; and also that it was abusive to order her officers and crew to disembark and go on shore for the health visit; on which account the disapprobation of the government of her Majesty has been manifested to those employés for their conduct on this occasion, and they have been warned in future to fulfill scrupulously the existing regulations.

I am confident that cases of this nature will not again be repeated, and I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

No. 147.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, San Sebastian, September 27, 1868.

SIR: I have never been so embarrassed in sitting down to write a dispatch to you as at the present time. Fully aware that I should be expected to give you some information in regard to the extraordinary state of things in Spain, when I have attempted it I have found myself unable to give you anything authentic and reliable, save that there exists now, and has for at least ten days past, a serious and extensive rebellion in Spain.

Whenever I have undertaken to write you anything about the rebellion, and I have done so several times since it commenced, I have not finished the dispatch I had begun before other and conflicting reports, equally authentic, have been received, contradicting what I had written. In illustration of what I have here said, I will mention that, on the 22d of this month of September, the government of this province issued the inclosed extraordinary bulletin, marked A, communicating the very important information that the railroad had been cut at various points between this place and Madrid. This telegraphic dispatch arrived at this place, as you will see, at 12 o'clock on the night of the 21st instant, and at that time the Queen was at the railroad station, expecting every moment to leave for Madrid. Of course that news caused her to abandon that purpose, and she left the cars and the station and returned to her lodgings in the house of Don Sebastian, where she has remained ever since. But the next morning, the 22d, at the usual hour, about half-past 9 o'clock, the regular express train from Madrid arrived here and reported that the railroad communication between this place and Madrid was safe and uninterrupted, and in fact it so continues until this moment; and thus it is certain that this "extraordinary official bulletin of the government of the province of Guipuzcoa" (this province) was a total fabrication, entirely destitute of the shadow of truth. Various rumors are in circulation explanatory of this singular circumstance, but I forbear any attempt at reconciling them.

tins" are not always to be implicitly relied upon, we are informed by an official notice, published in the third edition of the Correspondencia, as follows: "By order of the superior authority of this province, there shall not be published in the newspapers any other news of the events of the day than such as appear in the Gazette," the official organ of the administration. Thus, so far as newspapers are concerned, we are not to have any news except such as the official organ of the administration may publish. Thus situated, in a community where the newspapers are prohibited from publishing anything which the government does not authorize, and the publications of the officials of the province are such as I have shown you, by the extraordinary bulletin herewith inclosed, you will readily conclude that I am not in the most favorable situation or condition for acquiring or imparting reliable news.

I will, however, now give you a few facts which may be relied upon as authentic. The Queen of Spain left Lequeitio, where she had been spending about five weeks, taking sea baths, on the 17th of the present month, by steamboat, and came to this place with the intention of paying a complimentary visit to the French Emperor at Biarritz, a fashionable watering place near here, and just over the dividing line between Spain and France. But on the 18th she received news of a formidable rebellion or insurrection in the southern portion of Spain, in which nearly all the vessels of war in the navy yards and on the coasts took the side of the insurgents. This, of course, broke up the arrangements for the intended visit to France.

The Queen, it is said, and I have no doubt of it, was inclined to go immediately to Madrid, and even to Cadiz, which was said to be in the power of the insurgents, but from this she was dissuaded by some suggestions, I know not what. She has made three several attempts to go since, but by some means has been thwarted, and here she remains still. The rebellion is not confined to any particular locality or portion of the peninsula, but is found in Santander on the north, and Cadiz on the south. Although the railroad communication remains entire and uninterrupted between this place and Madrid, a distance of about 400 miles, it is said to be broken and interrupted in various points in the southern portion of the peninsula; the same is true of the telegraph.

The above, although the account is very meager, is about everything which we have which is reliable. There has been some fighting at Santander, in which the reports say the royal forces were victorious, as well as in some other places, and these reports of the officials generally, from whatever quarter they may come, add that "complete tranquillity prevails in all the rest of the peninsula."

It is impossible at this moment to say what is to be expected. My own opinion is, from the very scanty means of information at my command, that the government will succeed in putting down this attempt at revolution, as they have those that preceded it, although it is certain the movement at the present time appears to have a more formidable aspect than any other since I have been here. Should this attempt not be put down, by the government within a short time it will present rather an embarrassing question for me to decide for myself, viz., where to reside. At present I am the only member of the foreign diplomatic body at San Sebastian, the others being at Madrid or elsewhere. It is said a provisional government has been established at Seville.

JOHN P. HALE.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFICIAL BULLETIN.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PROVINCE OF GUIPUZCOA,

Tuesday, September 22, 1863.

The commanding general of the division of Birgos, in a telegram dated 12 o'clock at night of the 21st instant, says to his excellency, the captain general of the Basque provinces, the following: "The minister of war, in a telegram of to-day, at 11 o'clock at night, communicates to me the following: At this moment they advise me that the railroad is cut at various points, and no train can pass." The which, by order of his said excellency, the captain general, is published, so that it may come to the knowledge of the loyal inhabitants of this province.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Madrid, October 9, 1868.

SIR: On the 30th ultimo I had the honor to inform you by telegraph of two very important events in the progress of the revolution in this country, which formed the subject of my dispatch No. 147, from San Sebastian. That dispatch bore date of the 27th September, and on that day, though important positions were in the hands of the insurgents, and the greater part of the naval force in the Spanish forts had joined them, still the important naval station of Carthagena had refused to join them, and a royalist army, supposed to be equal if not superior in force to the insurgent army, confronted the latter on the confines of Andalusia and barred its passage towards the capital.

The Queen's government was sustained apparently by a force of about 80,000 armed men, well appointed and obedient to their government, and distributed over by far the greater portion of the Spanish territory. The people, notwithstanding their knowledge of the serious insurrection among the troops and in the navy, did not appear to have taken any part in the matter. On the 28th of September, however, the army, under Marshal Novalichez, advanced apparently with the intention of dislodging the insurgents from the positions their vanguard had taken at the bridge of Alcolen, over the Guadalquivir, at about seven miles from Cordova, where Marshal Serrano, commanding the insurgent army, had established his headquarters. The accounts of this action are still too confused to form any correct narrative of the details of the engagement. The attack seems to have been vigorous, and to have been firmly and successfully resisted. Undoubtedly the advantage of position was with the insurgents. The battalions under fire seem to have been heavily reinforced from both sides, but the defense was constantly made good till, at about nightfall, in an assault upon the bridge itself, which I have heard qualified as foolhardy, Marshal Novalichez himself received a very dangerous wound from a shell and was borne from the field, his troops withdrawing from the attack, and those of Marshal Serrano forbearing pursuit. But this action, in its political effects, was decisive.

On the 29th instant the population of Madrid pronounced enthusiastically for the insurgents, and the troops of the garrison fraternized with the people without a struggle. The details of this event will have reached you by telegraph and newspaper. The news swept over Spain like wildfire; and at every point the knowledge of those two events, the defeat of Novalichez and the popular rising of Madrid, seems to have been followed immediately by the rising or adherence of the whole country, marked in every instance and in all places with the same general characteristics of popular enthusiasm, peaceful execution, and thorough completeness.

I am informed that during the night of the 29th, in the palace at San Sebastian, the question of further resistance was debated till 4 o'clock in the morning. It was the wish of a few who immediately surrounded the Queen, that the Basque provinces should arm in her defense. But the representatives of that people, whilst they respectfully assured the Queen that she was personally safe under the protection of their hospitality, firmly resisted her solicitations to levy war in defense of her legal rights. Then preparations for departure were hastily made. The royal train was prepared, and at 10 o'clock on the morning of the 30th the royal carriages, moved towards the station bearing the whole royal family. The bearing of the people was remarkably dignified; not a shout, not an insult, no crowding nor rushing after the carriages, which moved slowly. The guards were turned out, the Bourbon march was played, and royal honors shown to the party as usual; the authorities of the province accompanying the royal train till the French frontier was passed at Hendaye. There they respectfully took leave of the Queen and her family. Her royal guard of halberdiers took leave and turned back to Spain. The Queen and her family entered for the first time, in France, a public railway car, and the dynasty of the Bourbons had fallen.

Events have since happened so rapidly as to almost preclude a detailed reference.

On the 3d instant I sent you a second telegram informing you of the entrance of Marshal Serrano into Madrid, where he was immediately invested with the authority of general-in-chief of the army and of the navy and president of the provisional government of Spain.

On the 1st instant the people of Madrid made their first essay in the exercise of sovereignty, electing, by universal suffrage, a superior revolutionary board or junta of 30 members, which on the 5th instant organized by the election of its officers and replaced the provisional junta, which had been hastily and spontaneously assembled on the 20th ultimo.

Marshal Serrano, Duke of La Torre, had been charged by the first junta to form a cabinet of ministers.

On the night of the 8th instant this was done, and the decree appointing them, signed by the duke as president of the provisional government of Spain, appeared in the Gazette on the morning of the 9th, yesterday.

This government having been thus peacefully constituted, and there being no other contending government within the limits of this kingdom, I considered that the case foreseen by your telegraphic instruction of the 6th instant had arrived, and immediately addressed to the duke an official request for an interview.

This was set for 4 o'clock in the afternoon of yesterday, at which hour I went to the official residence of the duke, accompanied by the secretary of this legation, and was immediately received by the duke, accompanied by the newly appointed minister of state, Senor D. Juan de Lorenzana.

I then addressed the president of the provisional government in English, as appears in the inclosed copy, marked A. The president replied in Spanish, speaking without notes, and his remarks, written immediately after in Spanish, by Mr. Perry, and translated into English, were substantially as appears in the inclosed paper, marked B.

You will also find inclosed the official Gazette of this morning containing a Spanish translation of my speech, and what purports to have been the duke's reply. The latter, however, was prepared afterwards, as I understand, by a gentleman not present at the interview.

Both the president and the minister of state were evidently much pleased with this prompt recognition on the part of the American government. After some informal conversation, in which these sentiments were freely exchanged, I took my leave.

In the same Gazette of to-day, which contains these speeches, you will find on the first page a declaration of rights by the superior revolutionary junta of Madrid, with the names of its members at the foot. On the fourth page is an important circular letter addressed to the governors and local juntas of the provinces, by the new minister of interior government; a document from the Madrid junta, accepting the ministers appointed by the president, Duke of La Torre; and an address by the junta of Madrid to the local juntas of the capital towns and principal cities of the provinces, in which the central junta, on motion of Senor Rivero, leader of the democratic party, resolves to support and maintain the government just constituted, notwithstanding the absence of the democratic element in the new cabinet. This last document is important. Sent by telegram to the provinces, you will notice that it has been immediately responded to; and on the fifth and sixth pages of this Gazette you will find already the telegraphic response of the juntas of the provinces accepting and maintaining the new cabinet and adhering to the declaration of rights published by the Madrid junta.

This is, therefore, a government accepted by the whole nation, and in the peaceful and undisputed exercise of its functions.

Madrid remains constantly tranquil, though about 60,000 stand of arms were indiscriminately distributed to the people on the 30th instant, and the bands of the armed people are seen constantly in the streets since that date.

They are rapidly organizing in battalions, according to their wards, and elect their own officers. They stand guard over the royal palace; over the Bank of Spain; over the ministerial departments, archives and public edifices, performing this voluntary service with rare constancy and perfect courtesy.

In short, sir, the deportment of this people, so long the victim of a corrupt oppression, in the first moments of liberty, with arms in their hands, and in the enthusiasm of victory, has astonished me and will challenge the admiration of the world.

I inclose translations of the declaration of rights before alluded to, and the decree published in the Gazette of yesterday, by which the new cabinet has been constituted.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN P. HALE.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

A.

Speech of Mr. Hale.

MR. PRESIDENT: By command of my government, recognizing the fact that the people of Spain, in the exercise of that high prerogative which rightfully pertains to every people, have fundamentally changed their system of government, in the name and on behalf of the government and people of the United States of America, I come to offer their congratulations on the quiet, efficient, and thorough manner in which this great change has been effected.

A government claiming to be founded on divine right has been overthrown, and a government founded on a right still more divine, the right of the people, has been established in its place.

As Spain was among the first of the nations of the earth to hail the advent of the United States of America in the family of nations, so now, in grateful return, they make haste to congratulate the Spanish people on their political regeneration.

In thus establishing diplomatic relations with the government over which your excellency presides, I recall with pleasure the fact that the United States and Spain have never had any difference which diplomacy has not been able to reconcile.

I hardly need add that in the present circumstances no effort of mine will be spared for strengthening and rendering more cordial the sentiments of sincere friendship and good will now so happily subsisting between the two nations.

[Translation.]

Marshal Serrano, Duke de la Torre, president of the provincial government, made this response to the American minister:

MR. MINISTER: Nothing could be more grateful to my heart than to receive on this solemn occasion, in the name of the Spanish people, the congratulations you offer on the use they have made of the prerogative that emanates from their sovereignty.

Now that the first portion of the task is finished, and all the obstacles to the establishment of national institutions removed, the new order of things that must soon arise from what has ceased to exist, in the first exercise of that sovereignty, will also deserve in due time. I assure you, the felicitations of your government and the sympathy of the United States.

The memories which you now so pertinently recall are pleasant to my recollection, and Spain, which under present circumstances needs, and no doubt will deserve, the encouragement of all nations that love liberty and know how to preserve it, gratefully accepts the sympathy of those magnanimous nations, like the United States, that spare no sacrifice to maintain their free institutions in their perfect integrity.

The diplomatic relations continued by this act between your government and that over which I have the honor to preside will, from this day forward, be more intimate and cordial, as they ought to be between nations that have had no difficulties but what have been amicably settled, and that, in homage to the same principle of sovereignty, exercise it in the establishment of their institutions in a definite and permanent manner, each with due regard to its national peculiarity.

Declaration of rights.

The superior revolutionary junta, faithful to its high origin, makes the following declaration of rights:

Universal suffrage.
Liberty of worship.
Liberty of teaching.
Liberty of assembling and of pacific associations.

Liberty of printing without special legislation.

Decentralization of the administration, returning to the provinces and the municipalities their autonomy.

Trial by jury in all criminal cases.

Unity of legal rights in all branches of the administration of justice.

Immobility of the judges.

Individual security, inviolability of domicile, and of private correspondence.

Abolition of the death penalty.

JOAQUIN AQUIRRE, President.

NICOLAS RIVERA, Vice-President.

MADRID, October 8, 1868.

Officials of the provisional government of Spain:

Decree issued from the war department:

In compliance with the duty intrusted to me by the nation, and by the power with which it has clothed me, as the president, I now form the following provisional government:

Department of War.—Lieutenant General Don Juan Prim, Marquis de los Castellejos.

Department of State.—Don Juan Alvarez de Lorenzana.

Department of Grace and Justice.—Don Antonio Romero Ortiz.

Department of the Navy.—Don Juan Topete, Commander of the Fleet.

Department of Finance.—Don Lameano Figuerola.

Department of Government.—Don Praxedes Mateo Sagasta.

Department of Industry.—Don Manuel Ruiz Zorilla.

Department of the Colonies.—Don Adelardo Lopez de Ayala.

EL DUQUE DE LA TORRE,

President of the Provisional Government.

MADRID, October 8, 1868.

Circular from the department of government to the civil governors and government councils of Spain.

The provisional government having been organized, and the first part of our glorious revolution being finished, the minister undersigned feels it his most pressing duty to address the councils and all constituted authorities in the country and explain to them the patriotic intentions of the government, and tell them what to do to preserve the glory of our revolution, to assure confidence at home and retain the sympathy, admiration, and applause so readily awarded to us by Europe and America at the dawn of our regeneration.

Our easy victory and the moderation in which we enjoy it seem singular to those who look upon us from a distance, without knowing the vices and corruption of the oppressive system under which we were living or the proverbial virtues of the Spanish character.

The glorious revolution, begun in Cadiz, has emboldened those timid souls that bowed their necks to the yoke of a corrupt government in dread of the horrors of anarchy or the fury of angry passions.

To their everlasting glory, the Spanish people have demonstrated to the world that they not only could rise up against the tyranny that oppressed and degraded them, but, after the victory, could preserve that moderation that shows an education sufficient to enter boldly into paths trodden by a free people.

Honorable in every way as this revolution has so far been—and we may be proud of it, as history records no other such—we would sin as prodigals, and fail in our patriotic duty, if we halted a moment on the way, before completing the work we so auspiciously began with so much enthusiasm.

If we would preserve the great advantages obtained in so brief a time, we should exercise unremitting vigilance, encouraged by patriotism, honor, and confidence in a free future. We must remember that the enemies of our honor and liberties have secreted themselves among the people, and have assumed the mask of patriotism to mislead them and induce them to commit outrages that would disgrace our nation and sully the purity of our revolution. If it was formerly a painful necessity to resort to arms to overthrow a government that humbled and degraded us, now that we are peaceful victors we must preserve order; and the provisional government is determined to do this in fulfillment of the great duty it owes to the country.

Fortunately we have no sanguinary deeds to lament so far; but the few that have occurred will prove a warning and may prevent the perpetration of others. If some are guilty, there are courts to try them and punish them. Mobs must not undertake to administer justice, lest innocent victims be sacrificed and the fury of personal resentment turn to vengeance. Such acts are unworthy of a civilized nation, and the provisional government would not tolerate them, for it has assumed the reins of state to conduct the nation to the enjoyment of liberty, and not to let it perish in anarchy.

Having explained the intentions of the government in this particular, it remains for me to advise you to deserve the country's thanks by maintaining order at all risks, delivering over to the courts of justice all those that disturb it under any pretext, for they are the true enemies to liberty, and might cause us many sacrifices and tears if left to pursue their wild career.

May God give you many years.

PRAXEDES MATEO SAGASTA.

Minister of Government.

MADRID, October 9, 1868.

Dispatch of Señor Aquirre, president of the superior revolutionary council, to Señor Serrano, president of the provisional government.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: This superior revolutionary council is much pleased to receive your communication, giving the form of government you have chosen, in concert with the Marquis of Castellajos, (General Prim.)

The worthy officers you have selected is a proof to this council that we may expect the sacred principles inscribed on our revolutionary banner to be enforced by the supreme power, and we do not hesitate one moment to offer you our most frank and decided support.

This council hopes that all the provinces will hasten to approve of the constituted government, thus fulfilling a duty of patriotism.

On acknowledging the reception of your communication, the council hopes that you will act as interpreter of these sentiments to your worthy colleagues.

God give you many years.

JOAQUIN AQUIRRE.

His Excellency Don FRANCISCO SERRANO Y DOMINGUEZ,

MADRID, October 8, 1868.

Circular telegram from the revolutionary council of Madrid to the provincial councils.

At a large meeting of the democratic party, it was resolved, on motion of Mr. Rivera, to support the recently constituted government, in hopes that the programme of Cadiz may be faithfully carried out. At this meeting, and afterwards from the balcony of government house, Mr. Rivera, introduced by Mr. Aquirre, spoke in the name of the democracy, and counselled all citizens to extreme vigilance in the preservation of order. His speech was warmly applauded by the people. On quietly retiring, they shouted for Rivera and for General Prim, who was seated by his side, and who also made a speech.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 9, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 9th of October, No. 148, which gives a detailed and interesting history of the revolution which has taken place in Spain, and of your own proceeding in relation to that great transaction. The dispatch supplies for the records of this department much information which it has failed to receive from the telegraph and from the press. The views of this government in regard to the matters thus presented having been heretofore made known to you by the telegraph, it remains for me now only to commend the diligence and discretion which you have practiced in those delicate and important affairs.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

SPANISH LEGATION.

Mr. Tassara to Mr. Seward.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF SPAIN IN WASHINGTON,
Washington, February 11, 1867.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, has received notice that the steamer Cuyler, lately detained by the authorities of New York for violation of the neutrality laws, was about to be permitted to depart for her place of destination.

The honorable Secretary of State is acquainted with the antecedents of the affair so far as this legation is concerned. The undersigned, aware that it was intended to take from those ports not only that vessel, which was then denounced under the name of Schuyler, but also one or more others, respecting which the same circumstances had concurred or might concur, he communicated more than once his suspicions, in the first place to the department, and afterwards to the police of New York, which, in view of the evidence of the fact, and in virtue of fresh data, proceeded ultimately to the detention of the Cuyler.

In view of this proof there is nothing to make the undersigned believe but that the government as well as the United States authorities are disposed to prevent the violation of the neutrality laws, and in now addressing himself to your department, nothing is further from his mind than to call in question these good dispositions.

Considering, however, the singularity and complication of an affair in which the agents of another power also neutral appear to be interfering, he thinks it his duty to guard against any error or surprise that might be attempted, to compromise directly or indirectly the neutrality of the government of the United States. His reason for doing so is so much the greater, as he is conscious that an attempt was made, and is perhaps now making, to purchase and dispatch from the same port of New York two other vessels, one of which appears to be named the Tartar, attended by similar circumstances and under the same flag as the Cuyler.

Under these circumstances, the fact, from the evidence before us, would be still more serious, and in itself as difficult of explanation as the departure of the Cuyler.

Whatever turn this affair may be destined to take, the undersigned hopes that the question of neutrality, instead of becoming more complicated, will remain in the state in which the authorities have placed it by their impartial conduct, not doubting but that this government will consider itself now more under obligation to maintain and cause to be maintained its present attitude, as that alone would perhaps contribute to the realization of the peaceful views which it seems to entertain on the Pacific question.

The undersigned accepts, &c.,

GABRIEL G. TASSARA.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Tassara.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 14, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 11th instant, relating to the steamer R. R. Cuyler, and other vessels which you apprehend are about to depart from New York in violation of the neutrality laws of the United States.

The steamer particularly referred to by you was seized by the revenue officers at the port of New York, in ignorance of the facts that the owners of the vessel, as well as the representative of the United States of Colombia accredited to this government, had several weeks since informed this department of the sale of the steamer, completely fitted as a man-of-war, to the United States of Colombia.

The evidence upon which the seizure was made has been examined by the Attorney General, who is of the opinion that it was insufficient to impeach the good faith of the transaction. As it appears, however, that the title to the vessel was not to pass to the United States of Colombia until the delivery of the steamer at one of the ports of that government, it has been determined that the owners shall, before the release of the vessel, be required to furnish the security prescribed by our neutrality laws that she will not be employed by them to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects and property of any power with which the United States are at peace.

You may be assured that there will be no abatement of the vigilance which has been constantly exercised to prevent any violation by our citizens of their neutral obligations.

I am, sir, with the highest consideration, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor Don GABRIEL GARCIA Y TASSARA, &c., &c., &c.

LEGATION OF SPAIN AT WASHINGTON,

Washington, February 20, 1867.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, had the honor to receive yesterday evening the note which, under date of 14th, the honorable Secretary of State pleased to address to him, answering his of the 11th, about the detention of the Cuyler, and would have nothing to reply to it if the case were simply that of a neutral power like the United States of Colombia, which might treat of buying ships of war in these States.

The honorable Secretary of State knows, nevertheless, how much and how essentially the affair is complicated by the undoubted existence of a plan, the object of which was to cause the Cuyler to pass into the power of the republics of the Pacific; and although the Attorney General may be of opinion that the evidence is not sufficient to inculpate the good faith of the transaction, the fact alone is sufficient to excite the gravest suspicions and to engage the government of the United States to cause its neutrality to be respected.

The undersigned is far from believing that a neutral government, and friendly to Spain as that of Colombia, would avail of her neutrality to cover the contraband of vessels of war against others belligerent.

He must rather suppose and does suppose that the Colombian government is entirely a stranger to the project which has been attempted to be carried out under its auspices and beneath its flag. This reserve made, however, I hold that the government of the United States, in obedience to the principles it has so highly proclaimed in the matter, ought to have allowed an investigation to have proceeded which would have brought to light the true nature of such transaction, because, as the honorable Secretary of State could do no less than admit, the bond, however ample and effective it might be, would only require the Cuyler to enter a Colombian port for a moment, without thereby impeding the realization of any project such as that which has been the cause of her detention.

While writing this note the undersigned receives news that the bond for the Cuyler has been fixed at $200,000, a sum which it is supposed not only does not come up to double the value of the vessel and her cargo, but does not even equal that amount.

Repeating, therefore, his reservations, he thinks it his duty to protest, trusting yet that the government of the United States will do what is in its reach to prevent that through any indirect means neutrality shall be violated.

The undersigned avails of the occasion to reiterate to the honorable Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his highest consideration.

GABRIEL G. TASSARA.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

No. 13.]

LEGATION OF SPAIN AT WASHINGTON,

Washington, February 25, 1867.

Referring to his note of the 20th about the Cuyler, the undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, finds himself under the unavoidable duty of bringing to the knowledge of the honorable Secretary of State that by the mail of yesterday evening he has received from New York reports which give a character, each time more singular and more serious, to the matter, and which place him under the necessity of again calling to it the attention of your department.

It appears in fact that the Cuyler not only has been delivered to her owners, and is at liberty to go to sea, but also that this was to take place on the afternoon of the day before yesterday, the 23d. It also appears that at the latest hour indications were noticed on board of the same plotting, which had already before caused her detention, there resulting therefrom complications between the owners and such crew, hindering for a moment her departure. It seems, in fine, that the steamer is notwithstanding to go to sea, and that the idea in general pervading New York is that more or less directly she is going to cruise against Spanish vessels.

Reiterating therefore anew his reservations, but reiterating also his protests, and in the supposition that they may yet be in season for the appliance of a remedy, the undersigned believes it his duty to advise the honorable Secretary of State of the case, at first glance very improbable, but which circumstances make appear possible, of so flagrant a contravention as this would be of all the laws and principles of neutrality.

The undersigned avails of this occasion to reiterate to the honorable Secretary of State the assurances of his highest consideration.

GABRIEL G. TASSARA.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Tassara.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 1, 1867.

SIR: With reference to your notes of the 20th and 25th ultimo, on the subject of the Cuyler, I have the honor to acquaint you that I have consulted my colleague, the Attorney General, who says that after the most careful consideration he does not see upon what ground, as the law officer of the United States, he can take or advise any action in addition to that heretofore taken in reference to the vessel referred to.

According to Mr. Stanbery's judgment the course of action which has been taken is in strict accordance with the neutrality laws of the United States.

The Attorney General adds that he is happy to see that you acquit the Colombian government of all participation in any unlawful purpose in reference to the purchase and destination of the vessel.

That the suspicious circumstances to which you refer do not inculpate that government or the American merchants who have sold and are bound to deliver the Cuyler at one of the Colombian ports into the possession of the government of that republic.

That you refer wholly to suspicious circumstances, attaching to some of her crew, which have led, as you state, to complications between the crew and the owners, causing delay in her departure. That it is upon the footing of such suspicious circumstances that the bond was required of the owners. That as to the sufficiency in the amount, which you say is supposed not to amount to double the value or even to the actual value of the vessel, the Attorney General has only to say that the value of the vessel was fixed by the proper officers of the United States, who it must be inferred have understood and have faithfully performed the duty of appraisalment.

That the United States has done what was proper in reference to the vessel, her present owners, and the Colombian government; both acting in good faith to provide the proper safeguard against the alleged designs of others towards her Catholic Majesty's subjects and their commerce.

That whatever ulterior designs may be suggested as to the course to be pursued by the Colombian government after the vessel shall come into its possession, the United States can only entertain the same conviction as that expressed by you of the entire good faith of that government.

I am directed to inform you that these views of the Attorney General have been adopted, and are sanctioned by the President.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my very high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF SPAIN AT WASHINGTON.

Washington, March 30, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, has the honor to address himself to the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, begging on his part a friendly action in the matter of which he is going to occupy himself.

The history of the steamer Cuyler is of public notoriety—her sailing in January, 1866, from New York for one of the ports of Colombia, as well as that the government of her Catholic Majesty finding herself at war with some republics of the Pacific, and having credible information as to the ulterior destination of the said vessel, sent maritime forces to the port of Cartagena in order to watch her and to impede her passing into the power of Peru, or her being employed in any manner against the interests of Spain.

The undersigned has sufficient reason to believe that the government which now governs at Bogota, and which in the matter of the Cuyler has manifested the loyalty and good faith which are fit to a neutral nation, would guarantee to retain in its power the Cuyler during the continuance of the state of war, on condition that the Spanish government withdraw its force of observation from Cartagena. If this should come about on the part of the government of Colombia, that of Spain, which had no other interest in watching the vessel but to prevent her from being employed to its prejudice, would withdraw its forces from Cartagena under the guarantee of the Colombian government.

Supposing that which he has just expressed, and Spain not having any representative at Bogota, the undersigned would be very specially grateful to the honorable Secretary of State, who has given such signal proofs of the conciliatory spirit which animates him respecting the war of the Pacific, to employ his good offices, through the medium of the minister of the United States at Bogota, to bring about this event. If the minister, Mr. Sullivan, can obtain from the government of Bogota the compromise not to deliver the Cuyler to any government or person during the existence of the state of war between Spain and the republics of the Pacific, the Spanish government would immediately withdraw the maritime force of vigilance which it maintains at Cartagena, returning the pieces of machinery of the Cuyler at present held as a guarantee.

The undersigned, expecting this new proof of friendly complaisance from the honorable Mr. Seward, improves the opportunity to reiterate to him the assurances of his highest consideration.

FACUNDO GOÑI.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Goñi.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 17, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 30th ultimo, relative to the steamer Cuyler, and to inform you in reply that the arrangement which it proposes has been made known to Mr. Sullivan, the United States minister at Bogota, who has been instructed to endeavor to cause it to be carried into effect.

I am, sir, with high consideration, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor Don FACUNDO GOÑI, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Goñi.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 15, 1868.

The Secretary of State presents his compliments to Mr. Goñi, her Catholic Majesty's minister plenipotentiary, with the following information, namely:

On the 19th of April last, the United States minister at Lima communicated to the minister for foreign affairs in Peru a copy of the circular letter in which the undersigned renewed his proposition of good offices for the adjustment of the difficulties between Spain and the allied republics of the Pacific.

The undersigned is informed that the minister for foreign affairs of Peru expressed himself as being decidedly in favor of the armistice, but stated, at the same time, that it would be necessary to lay the matter before the government of Peru and its allies. He assured the United States minister that such a proceeding would be adopted immediately, and the result would be promptly communicated.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to offer to Mr. Goñi renewed assurances of his highest consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor Don FACUNDO GOÑI, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Goñi to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF SPAIN AT WASHINGTON,
Washington, May 23, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, has the honor to present to the consideration of the honorable Secretary of State what follows:

It is already a notorious fact, as published by the daily press in the United States, as well as in that of Peru, and neither contradicted nor denied, nor called in question by any one, that the armor clad ships Catawba and Oneota, bought by Messrs. Swift & Co., of Cincinnati, have been purchased for the government of Peru, to which they at this time belong, and that they are preparing for departure, more or less early, bound for that republic from the port of New Orleans, where they now actually are. This being understood, the undersigned, repeating the verbal reclamations which he has at various conferences made upon the subject, now addresses himself to the honorable Secretary of State, invoking his recognized uprightness, his loyalty towards friendly nations, and the noble perseverance with which he has upheld respect for the laws of neutrality, to the end that he may hinder the departure to sea of the monitors Catawba and Oneota, while the state of war exists between Spain and Peru.

The undersigned, on the present occasion, thinks he may hope for the most efficient action from the honorable Secretary of State for most especial and extraordinary reasons. First, if the state of war still subsists, it is not by fault of the Spanish government, which has shown dispositions propitious to the adjustment of a peace worthy and honorable for all parties, having always met the friendly invitations given by the Hon. Mr. Seward, and in consequence suspending active hostilities. Secondly, that the government of her Catholic Majesty having now presented the question of peace in a positive manner to the honorable Secretary of State, it ought to trust, and does trust, that while Peru and the allied republics do not proffer themselves to enter upon the negotiations proposed, the government of the United States will not consent that in this country any detriment shall occur to the rights of Spain in derogation of the laws of neutrality.

The undersigned avails of this occasion to reiterate to the honorable Secretary of State the assurance of his highest consideration.

FACUNDO GOÑI.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Goñi to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF SPAIN IN WASHINGTON.

Washington, June 30, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, on referring to his note of the 23d of May last, relative to the monitors Catawba and Oneota, has the honor to call the attention of the honorable Secretary of State once more to the contents of that note.

Two circumstances move the undersigned to insist again upon this affair. 1st. It is known to the undersigned that the minister of Peru has solicited permission from the government of the United States to take possession of the monitors, contending that the existing situation between Spain and Peru is not a state of war, which assertion is entirely without foundation; and 2d, that the monitors now in the port of New Orleans are not apparently sufficiently guarded to prevent them from going to sea, as the undersigned is aware of no official measures having been taken to prevent their departure.

In regard to the assertion of the government of Peru, the undersigned hopes the honorable Secretary has rejected it, as it deserves. The state of war between the nations exists so long as the belligerent and interested parties do not stipulate for peace, and in the present case, not only has peace between Spain and Peru not been agreed upon, but the government of Peru has not, up to this time, even accepted the good offices tendered for that purpose by the government of the United States.

We cannot conceive, therefore, how the government of Peru could make such a request of the United States, as its grant would imply a violation of the law of nations, a serious offense to the laws of neutrality of this country, and a want of reciprocity in the friendship and conciliatory sentiments manifested by the government of her Catholic Majesty on accepting the good offices of the government of the United States for the settlement of the contest. Fortunately, the honorable Secretary of State, in his note of the 23d of April, to Mr. Garcia, minister of Peru, expressed his opinion in conformity with this doctrine, in judging of the present situation between Spain and Peru, and therefore the undersigned hopes he may be excused for insisting upon that point. If the government of Peru desires the present situation to be converted into one of peace, why does it not accept the good offices tendered by the government at Washington? But as it has not accepted them, how can it believe that this government is to consider the present situation as a state of peace, neither perfect nor imperfect? The undersigned trusts that the honorable Secretary of State will reject such unfounded pretensions as exceedingly inconsistent. From what has been said, the undersigned feels obliged to insist upon the adoption of peremptory measures to prevent the departure of those monitors. It appears from common report, that the said vessels are not in the hands of the local authorities, and it is not known what order has been issued about them.

The undersigned, therefore, once more invokes justice from the government of the United States, and begs that immediate measures be taken to detain the monitors Catawba and Oneota.

The undersigned hopes the honorable Secretary of State will be pleased to communicate to him the resolutions adopted in conformity with the claims of right and justice.

The undersigned embraces the occasion to renew to the honorable Secretary of State the assurances of his very high consideration.

FACUNDO GOÑI.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Goñi.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, July 9, 1868.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a note from Mr. Goñi, minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, written on the 30th of June last, in which Mr. Goñi directs the attention of the undersigned to the affair of the monitors Catawba and Oneota. Mr. Goñi mentions two circumstances which move him to insist upon the detention of those monitors, namely: first, that the minister plenipotentiary of Peru has solicited permission from the United States government to take possession of the monitors, contending that the existing situation between Spain and Peru is no longer one of war, which assertion Mr. Goñi pronounces to be entirely without foundation; and secondly, that the monitors now in the port of New Orleans are not apparently sufficiently guarded to prevent them from going to sea, as the undersigned is aware of no official measures having been taken to prevent their departure.

Mr. Goñi dwells upon the fact that the United States have tendered their good offices to Spain and to her antagonists, the Pacific republics, and that while Spain has promptly expressed her disposition to accept those good offices with a view to the establishment of peace, Peru has not accepted them, nor given any conclusive reply upon the subject. Mr. Goñi argues from this fact that the government of Peru cannot rightfully claim that the government of the United States shall, during those overtures, pronounce the state of war to be closed and the state of peace to have been reached by the silent consent and concurrence of the parties.

Upon the grounds thus mentioned Mr. Goñi feels himself obliged to insist upon the adoption of peremptory measures to prevent the departure of the monitors in question. He fortifies this position by stating from common report that the vessels are not in the hands of the local authorities, and it is not known what orders have been issued about them. He begs, therefore, that immediate measures be taken to detain the monitors Catawba and Oneota.

The undersigned has the honor, in reply, to inform Mr. Goñi, in the first place, that the Peruvian government on its part insists that the situation of war between herself and allies on the one part, and Spain on the other, has practically come to an end by the cessation of all hostilities on either side since the second day of May, 1866.

The undersigned has further the honor to inform Mr. Goñi that the Peruvian government alleges in support of its position the fact that Chili and Spain, Chili being one of the allied belligerents and Spain the other belligerent, have, in the present year, voluntarily joined themselves together in peaceful and friendly concert and co-operation in waiving objections to the clearance from British ports of ships of war for the respective parties. So far as this department is informed, this statement is not controverted by the Spanish government, and Peru insists that the proceeding is equivalent to an acknowledgment on the part of Spain of the pretensions made by Peru that the situation of war between the belligerent republics and Spain has come to an end. Peru agrees in this respect that Spain cannot claim before the government of Great Britain to be at peace and at the same time claim before the government of the United States to be at war with Peru and her allies, the position of the United States and Great Britain in regard to the belligerents being identical.

Mr. Goñi is informed, in the third place, that the Peruvian government distinctly proposes to the government of the United States that, if it shall consent to the clearance of the Catawba and the Oneota, the Peruvian government will give adequate security that those vessels shall not be employed in any hostile proceeding against Spain or any other nation on their way to the port of Callao, in the Pacific, but shall keep the peace until the vessels shall have arrived in the harbor of Callao, there to be used for purposes of domestic defense and security.

Mr. Goñi is further informed, in the fourth place, that the House of Representatives having taken the subject of the sale and proposed departure of these vessels into consideration with a view to some possible legislative action thereupon, directions have been given by the President that those vessels shall not receive clearance or be permitted to depart while the subject is engaging the attention of Congress. The vessels are for this reason detained at present, and will be so temporarily detained, whatever appearances or presumptions to the contrary may anywhere exist.

In consequence of the proceedings of the House of Representatives which have been referred to, it seems to the President that the occasion has not yet arrived when it will be necessary for him to decide the grave question which has been raised before this government between the ministers of Spain and Peru, namely the question whether the war which was heretofore waged between those nations has been practically brought to an end or not. Frankness, however, obliges the undersigned to say that unless some unforeseen circumstances shall soon occur, the time for acting upon that question would seem to be near at hand.

The undersigned freely admits the difficulties which are likely to attend the decision of the question. It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances.

The proceedings of Spain and Chili which have been referred to, although inconclusive, require an explanation on the part of either of those powers which shall insist that the condition of war still exists. Peru, equally with Spain, has as absolute a right to decline the good offices or mediation of the United States for peace as either has to accept the same. The refusal of either would be inconclusive as an evidence of determination to resume or continue the war. It is the interest of the United States, and of all nations, that the return of peace, however it may be brought about, shall be accepted whenever it has become clearly established. Whenever the United States shall find itself obliged to decide the question whether the war still exists between Spain and Peru, or whether that war has come to an end, it will make that decision only after having carefully examined all the pertinent facts which shall be within its reach, and after having given due consideration to such representations as shall have been made by the several parties interested.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor Don FACUNDO GOÑI, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Goñi.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 22, 1868.

SIR: The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to communicate herewith, for the information of Mr. Goñi, her Catholic Majesty's minister plenipotentiary, a transcript of the reply of the Colombian government to the request made at his instance and under instructions from this department by the minister of the United States at Bogota, that measures might be taken to prevent the sailing of the war steamer R. R. Cuyler or El Rayo, during the existence of war between Spain and certain Spanish-American republics.

The undersigned offers to Mr. Goñi renewed assurances of his highest consideration.

LEGATION OF SPAIN AT WASHINGTON,
Washington, July 23, 1868.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, has received the communication which, under date of the 22d instant, the honorable Secretary of State of the United States was pleased to address to him, remitting to him copy of the note sent on the 15th of June, by the secretary of foreign relations at Bogota, to the minister, Mr. Sullivan, relative to the detention of the steamer R. R. Cuyler or El Rayo.

The undersigned, in his name and in that of the government of her Majesty, can do no less than manifest to the honorable Secretary of State the most profound gratitude for his loyal and friendly mediation in the affair, and for the satisfactory result which it produced.

The undersigned offers to the honorable Secretary of State fresh assurances of his highest consideration.

FACUNDO GOÑI.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Goñi to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF SPAIN AT WASHINGTON,
Washington, July 29, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of her Catholic Majesty, has the honor to reply to the note, in the matter of the monitors Catawba and Oneota, which the honorable Secretary of State of the United States was pleased to address to him on the 9th instant, and passes on to notice the contents thereof.

The honorable Secretary of State, in the note referred to, informs the undersigned that the government of Peru maintains that the state of war between Spain and the allied republics has terminated, alleging, for reason, that active hostilities have been suspended for more than two years, and quoting that Spain and Chili had reciprocally consented to the departure of some vessels of their respective flags, which were detained in British ports, from which fact the government of Peru infers that Spain cannot say she is at peace in respect of the British government, and say that she is at war in respect of the government of the United States.

The undersigned can do no less than state that the singular pretension of the government of Peru causes him extreme surprise. To say that a state of war does not exist when, nevertheless, no proposition of peace has been accepted, is an affirmation equally gratuitous and new, which it is not necessary to contest.

As to the facts alleged, no one of them implies, even remotely, the cessation of war. The fact of hostilities being suspended on the part of Spain is the consequence of the acceptance of the good offices offered to the belligerents by the government of the United States on the 20th of December, 1866. In respect of the departure of Spanish and Chilian vessels, detained by the government of Great Britain in fulfillment of her duties as a neutral power, the undersigned does not know, with exactness, what happened in London, although he has reasons for thinking that there was not any formal and direct agreement between the representatives of both nations, but at all events, and even if such had existed, that could not alter or modify the situation in which both parties find themselves. To pretend that the consent to the departure of the vessels respectively means a declaration of a state of peace, would be equivalent to maintaining that any special agreement of two belligerent States, whether about an exchange of prisoners, or furnishing supplies, or any other partial and limited point, would imply the termination of the war. It is, therefore, not a logical consequence which the Peruvian government deduces from the act which occurred in London, nor the signification attached to it, well founded. Besides, it is proper to note the fact, that whatever might be the importance of the arrangement of London, that arrangement took place between Spain and Chili, and not between Spain and Peru; and the Peruvian government, however much allied with that of Chili in the contest with Spain, could not invoke in its favor a special agreement made with another state.

It follows from what has been said that although Spain, through the effect of its sincere desire for peace, has suspended active hostilities, she still finds herself in a state of war, and can do no less than maintain the rights which correspond with such condition according to the laws of nations whilst that state continues to subsist, and a solution satisfactory to both belligerent parties is not reached.

The honorable Secretary of State, in connection with this question, discusses in his note a grave matter which the undersigned can do no less than notice. The honorable Secretary states that because of the interference of the House of Representatives in the question of the monitors Catawba and Onyota, the President may not deem the occasion opportune for deciding whether the war between Spain and the allied republics has or has not practically come to an end; but considers that it is nearly time to decide upon this, and the more so, that he recognizes the difficulties which that solution presents. He adds that inasmuch as a state of war may be established without a previous declaration, so also may a state of peace be re-established without an express treaty; and, as it has not as yet been settled how much time must elapse from the suspension of hostilities until peace may be presumed to be re-established, it ought to be decided in view of the facts and circumstances of each case; and concludes by declaring that the United States when they consider themselves obliged to determine whether war still exists between Spain and Peru, or has come to an end, such will be reached after having carefully examined the facts, and given due consideration to the representations of the parties interested.

The undersigned cannot assent entirely to the preceding assertions, but will confine himself to observing only that the state of war and state of peace between two nations, first of all, and beyond all, are facts which depend upon the will of the parties interested, it belonging to them to decide by common accord what is the state in which they find themselves, and what the character of their respective relations.

As for the determinations which the United States may believe themselves to be obliged to adopt under given circumstances, the government of the United States, and especially the honorable Secretary of State, on whom this matter is incumbent, has too much enlightenment and uprightness to separate himself in these matters from the recognized principles of the law of nations and international usages, and thus he disposes of the finale of the note of the honorable Secretary of State. Besides, the government of the United States holding on the present occasion the character of mediator, in virtue of the acceptance of its good offices on the part of Spain, the undersigned cannot for a moment doubt that while it holds that trust it will respond with its accustomed loyalty to the confidence of the Spanish government.

In the last place the Secretary of State informs the undersigned that by reason of the above-mentioned intervention of the House of Representatives about the sale and departure of the monitors, orders were dispatched by the President that clearances should not be given to them, nor that they should be permitted to go to sea, and that in consequence the vessels are detained, and will so continue temporarily. The undersigned, as is just, appreciates the issuance of such orders, and must hope that, the detention of the vessels being found just in itself by the provisions of the law of neutrality, and the prescriptions of international law, such detention will not cease until the state of war ceases. As for what the government of Peru may have offered to that of the United States as security that the monitors shall not be employed in hostilities against Spain, the undersigned will make no reply, not having any cause to doubt the sincerity and good faith of such offers; but that circumstance cannot discharge him from his duty of making just reclamations.

The undersigned recapitulates the contents of the present note by stating that Spain is disposed to re-establish honorably her friendly relations with the allied republics, and therefore desires to return to the state of peace, but that unfortunately she now still finds herself in a state of war; that neither the suspension of hostilities, nor the concerted departure of the Spanish and Chilian vessels from London, change or alter the existing status.

That the determination of said state of war cannot be brought about except by the declaration of the interested belligerent parties.

That the state of war existing, Spain can do no less than maintain the rights which belong to her, and reclaim their observance by neutral governments.

That in addressing the government of the United States, which combines the character of neutral with that of mediator, Spain finds herself assisted by a double right to request the detention of the monitors Catawba and Oneota belonging to Peru.

And, in conclusion, that he hopes that the government of the United States, as friend and neutral, will continue to cause to be respected the right and the laws of neutrality; and that as mediator it may succeed in obtaining a solution honorable to the contending parties, and beneficial to the interests of all nations.

The undersigned reiterates again to the honorable Secretary of State the assurance of his highest consideration.

FACUNDO GOÑI.

LEGATION OF SPAIN IN WASHINGTON,
Washington, November 24, 1868.

At one of the latest conferences in relation to the monitors Catawba and Oneota, purchased for the government of Peru, the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, after again presenting some observations expressed in his note of the 9th of July referring to this matter, was pleased to make manifest to the undersigned that the Spanish government could, without obstacle of any kind, consent to the departure of those vessels in consideration of two special circumstances, to wit:

1st. That complete peace existing in fact between Spain and Peru, and this peace in fact being very shortly to be converted into peace according to law, as recent communications received at the Department of State demonstrate, and especially the protocol of the conference which, on the first day of September last, was observed in Lima by the representatives of the four allied republics, in view of so near and probable an event, the acquiescence of the Spanish government would be justifiable in respect of the immediate departure of the monitors, which need to avail themselves of the fair weather of the southern hemisphere, and would moreover signify a deference, very remarkable and worthy of esteem.

2d. That this government having assurance that the monitors are not to exercise any hostilities against Spain, not only because of the disposition which animates the government of Peru, but also because the minister of that republic has made so solemn promise thereof, as the honorable Secretary of State has been pleased to assure the undersigned in the said note of the 9th of July, that Spain cannot entertain, in this respect, the least reason for withdrawal or apprehension.

In consequence of the precedent manifestation of the Secretary of State, the undersigned finds himself fully authorized to declare that the present government of Spain, desirous, as the representative of the new political situation created in that country, to give proof of its friendly attitude towards the Hispano-American republics of the Pacific ceases to oppose the departure to sea of the monitors Catawba and Oneota, hoping only that the honorable Secretary of State will please to assure him, in conformity with the offers made by the minister of Peru, that the said vessels will not attempt to commit any act offensive to Spanish interests during their voyage to the Pacific.

The undersigned has the honor to communicate the foregoing to the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, and awaiting reply to the present note, avails of this fresh occasion to reiterate the assurance of his highest consideration.

FACUNDO GOÑI.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Goñi.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 30, 1868.

SIR: Your note of the 24th instant has been received with high satisfaction.

I give you herewith, and with the assent of Senor Garcia y Garcia, minister of Peru, extracts from two notes which have been received from that distinguished gentleman, relating to the proposed departure of the Oneota and Catawba for a Peruvian port. It gives me pleasure to add that this government reposes entire confidence in the fulfillment of the assurances on that subject which appear in those notes.

I avail myself of the occasion, sir, to offer to you assurances of my very high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor Don FACUNDO GOÑI, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Garcia to Mr. Seward.

[Translation.—Extract.]

CLARENDON HOTEL, New York, May 8, 1868.

SIR: * * * *

If, in order to your acceding to the intimation I have hinted at, it were necessary to promise positively that the vessels which go from the United States shall proceed on the route to Peru without attacking or provoking attacks from other nations, without any exception, nor to cause injury nor to offer threats to their possessions, I hold in pledge to the United States the honor of the Peruvian government from this moment.

I avail myself, with satisfaction, of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of the high respect and esteem with which I subscribe myself your very obedient servant,

JOSE ANTONIO G. Y GARCIA.

Mr. Garcia to Mr. Seward.

CLARENDON HOTEL, New York, July 28, 1868.

SIR: * * * *

The foregoing would undoubtedly suffice for the end in view when addressing an upright and enlightened government, such as that of your Excellency's; but the government of Peru voluntarily and deliberately desires to offer to yours the most perfect security as to the rectitude of its intentions in sending those vessels to the coasts of the republic, and for that purpose has instructed me to reiterate, expressly in its name, to the United States government, the formal promise that the monitors will leave for the Pacific without attacking, or in any way molesting, any vessels or possessions of Spain, and without committing any act of hostility, directly or indirectly, against the flag of that nation, either at sea or on land, to which they may not be provoked. The honor of the Peruvian government, I again repeat on this occasion, guarantees to your Excellency the strict fulfillment of this solemn promise.

I have the honor of subscribing myself, with the highest consideration, your Excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

JOSE ANTONIO G. Y GARCIA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 9, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 20th of November, No. 21.

It shows that upon due consideration you have decided to recognize officially, not only the Prussian Parliament, but also the Parliament of the North German United States, and the collective German Customs and Commerce Union, upon the ground that by the paramount constitution of the North German United States, the King of Prussia, to whom you were accredited, is at the head of those several organizations or institutions. This decision is entirely approved.

I have taken care to promulgate the description of the national flag of the North German United States. Its presence in our waters will be hailed with peculiar pleasure.

I shall probably have occasion to speak hereafter of the consular law, of which you have given me a copy.

I thank you for your suggestions in regard to the law concerning free migration.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, December 20, 1867.

SIR: * * * * * It was last evening intimated to me informally, but very positively, by a high official, that the long-vexed question of military service in reference to naturalized American citizens, should be settled entirely to my satisfaction. Several weeks ago I was assured in my conversations at the Foreign Office that such was its desire, but it came to my knowledge that strong objections were interposed from other quarters; and I still postpone a formal report till I learn definitively that the difficulty thus interposed has been overcome.

It is certainly the wish of this government to maintain the most friendly relations with the United States, and public opinion is in accord with this policy.

No. 31.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, January 21, 1868.

SIR: To-day I am able to report to you progress in the settlement of the question respecting the right of the adopted American citizen to immunity from military service in Prussia.

Immediately after the proceedings of which I gave an account in my No. 9, letters of inquiry were sent to the principal foreign legations of Prussia. In due time answers were received. That from France was such as I could have wished on the essential points. That from England was imperfect, its writer not having been familiar with the usage of the British government previous to the recent prohibition by law of the impressment of mariners; but as the answer otherwise had nothing adverse to our wishes, I did not think it worth the while to add anything to what I had already communicated on that subject.

The next step was for the foreign department to take the opinions of the minister of war and the minister of internal affairs. They were both adverse. I was told that I might discuss the subject with the ministers and directors of those departments, and was rather invited to do so. An occasion offered of speaking with the present head of the war department. His expressions of regard towards the United States were all that could be wished. He disclaimed any thought of holding an adopted American citizen to service in the Prussian army; but he wished to leave the present law unaltered, that the subject might be under control. He expressed not merely the willingness but the desire that exemption should be granted as each individual case should arise.

I spoke of these answers at the foreign department, expressing a belief that as the objections of the war department related chiefly to form, they might be overcome; and it proved so.

The minister of the interior raised a question of the Prussian constitution and the Prussian law, as being opposed to the request of the United States. I thought it not safe to discuss with a domestic minister of state the interpretation of the laws of his own country; for it would belong to him of right to interpret those laws at least for the guidance of his own government. My answer on this point was, therefore, that whatever might be the laws of Prussia they must be considered as final only for Prussians, and the relations of a foreign power were a proper subject for a convention. This answer on my part met with no objection from any quarter.

Meantime the subject had been constantly brought before the attention of Count Bismarck himself, and he became interested in it. A new law was drafted which would greatly facilitate the concessions which the President desires, and I was asked not to urge the question until that draft should be finished. The matter was thus in the very best way. On the draft of the new law and before its adoption the interior department withdrew its objections, and, I believe, Count Eulenberg now lends his hearty co-operation to the policy of his colleague. Nothing remained but to get the consent of the King, and last Saturday evening Count Bismarck informed me that he had brought the subject before the King and that the King had given verbally his concurrence. That assent will, according to the usages of this government, be given formally in writing, and then we shall proceed to settle the convention.

I have thought that sufficient progress has been made to justify this report. At the same time I desire you and the President not to regard the matter as settled, until the convention, in all its details, shall be formally agreed upon; and in the meantime I would request that this dispatch be kept from the press, though there is no reason why the substance of it should not be made known to any one whom you may judge entitled to the communication.

I remain, sir, sincerely yours,

GEO. BANCROFT.

No. 33.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, January 23, 1868.

SIR:

Count Bismarck informs me that the British government has inquired of him as to the answer the Prussian government would make to the American government on the subject of naturalization. In reply he informed them of the intention of this government to come to an understanding with that of America, according to its request. The remarks of Count Bismarck implied that the British government is inclined to follow the example of the Prussian, and that the settlement of the question here will be virtually a settlement for Great Britain.

In the prosecution of this business to a settlement there is need of great patience, as the several departments interested in the measure have to be consulted and to propose their difficulties and desired modifications. Some time must therefore pass away before the negotiations can be closed.

A few days ago, a gentleman holding a subordinate office in the Prussian province of Westphalia called on me to inquire if I would approve or consent that a benevolent society for prisoners should continue to make shipments to the United States from the prisons of Westphalia. I put to him some questions and drew out of him that they had been accustomed to make a general jail delivery of culprits and worthless persons and ship them to New York. The system was so thoroughly organized that arrangements were made with railroads for sending them into the interior, and with agents at several stations for receiving and distributing them; that the business had been interfered with by some recently enacted law, of which he could not give me any particulars, and that now the society to which he belonged, renouncing the practice of exporting condemned criminals, asked leave to send at least such persons as were imprisoned, not for crimes, but as vagabonds. Now by the Prussian law a vagabond is a man who has no occupation and no desire to be occupied. My answers were of course of such a nature as to put him on his defense. He said his motives were those of a philanthropist; that the superior officer in the department in which he was employed knew nothing of his application to me; that what had been done in Westphalia in shipments of prisoners to America was a trifle compared to what had been done in Bavaria; that in Bavaria the business had been carried on at an exorbitant rate. I can think of no surer way of repressing the evil than by instructions from the department to the consuls at the several ports.

The state of the Danish question remains unchanged. Denmark will have nothing less than the island of Alsen and a good military frontier. This Prussia refuses, and Denmark will wait in the hope that a general war may support her demands. Meantime, Prussia remains in possession of all North Schleswig and treats it as an integral part of the kingdom.

The whole influence of this government is exerted to maintain the peace of Europe, and its policy meets with the success which my reports may have led you to expect. Notwithstanding the clamor that has been raised, France has no desire of a war with North Germany, and Austria already begins to adopt the inevitable policy of abandoning the struggle for influence in Germany and of cultivating the friendship of Prussia.

I remain, sir, yours sincerely,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

No. 36.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, January 27, 1868.

SIR: I have already informed the department that I do not intend to risk success in settling the question of military service by embarrassing it with anything else. Nor have I thought it proper officially to ask this government to connect any other subject with the special one in view. But there are two questions that somewhat engage public attention here and I should like an instruction from the department how to speak about them to this government.

1st. This country has not yet freed itself completely from the medieval restrictions on trade. Germans may go to America and open a shop; an American coming here could only open a shop on sufferance or by special permission. Is it not best, if occasion offers, to propose perfect reciprocity in this respect? and should the perfect reciprocity extend to the right of holding real estate, at least so far as it is required for the trade or pursuit of the American emigrating to Germany or the German emigrating to America?

2d. In our first treaty with Prussia, Franklin introduced a clause against privateering, and after about 70 years all the great powers of Europe, April 16, 1856, accepted it. Mr. Marcy offered the adhesion of the United States if England would go further and agree not to employ its countless vessels of war virtually as privateers against our commerce.

I think it not improbable that this government, which adopts the principle laid down by Mr. Marcy, might admit a formal recognition of it. I should like to have the President's views on this point: whether as between North Germany and ourselves the rule may be inviolability of private persons and property on the high seas, subject only to the necessities of war.

My own judgment is in favor of both these suggestions, especially the second one; it would bind us towards no nation but North Germany, and would be for our republic a recognition of the highest principle of civilization of our time. I am certain that the suggestion would be relished here, and, as yet, no decisive objection has occurred to me in the way of its adoption. On all questions of maritime law and neutrality the interests of North Germany and America are identical.

I remain sir, yours sincerely,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: Your dispatch of the 23d of January, No. 33, has been received. I thank you for your attention manifested in informing me what has passed between the governments of Great Britain and Prussia concerning the question on the naturalization laws existing between the United States and those two governments respectively. I have informally suggested to the British minister here, that a proceeding in a form of mutual or common legislation in the two countries would be more simple and probably easier than formal negotiations, inasmuch as there are so many other questions which urgently require settlement between the United States and Great Britain, besides that of the conflicting naturalization laws. Perhaps it would be well for you to speak in the same sense to the British ambassador at Berlin.

I am sir, your obedient servant,

GEORGE BANCROFT, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

No. 41.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, February 14, 1868.

SIR: Yesterday I had an official meeting with Mr. König, who has received full powers to settle with me the questions relating to the naturalization of Germans in America.

I proposed to him these terms:

- 1st. Germans and Americans may reciprocally emigrate.
- 2d. Naturalization after a five years' residence changes nationality and releases from military duty.
- 3d. Naturalization till after a residence of five years shall not be binding on the original country.
- 4th. Naturalization shall not be an excuse for desertion from military service actually entered upon, but shall free from all liabilities for eventual service not due at the time of emigration.
- 5th. A naturalized citizen returning to his native country with intent to resume his domicile therein and proving his intention by a continuous residence of ———, shall not be entitled to the interposition respectively of the United States and of North Germany.

Mr. König received the proposals with general assent, and in return offered to send me a draft of a treaty. This offer I the more cheerfully accepted, as up to this time I had had nothing from the department in writing. In the evening I received the draft. Mr. König appears to me to have impaired the clearness of the paper by a desire, as far as he could, to avoid a glaring conflict with ancient laws; but in substance his project seems to me to offer a basis for the settlement of the questions in discussion. The right of expatriation is conceded. The Prussian law would, wish American citizenship not to be obtainable by a Prussian except after a ten years' absence; but Count Bismarck will accept our American rule of five years' continuous residence, as it has been established by law since 1795.

The second section may need explanation. Mr. König remarked that he wished to meet the case of the fugitive from justice, who, if he chanced to get naturalized in America, could not be demanded under the extradition treaty, and who must remain liable for his old offenses if he should return to Germany.

The third section explains itself and has no obscurity. The fourth is right in principle. If a naturalized German turns his back on America and makes Germany once more his permanent domicile, he should submit to the laws of the country of his choice. * * * * *

I remain, sir, sincerely yours,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Privy Councillor König to Mr. Bancroft.

[Translation.]

I have the honor, in pursuance of our understanding, to transmit respectfully to your excellency the inclosed project for a treaty.

I beg you to consider this project as a suggestion merely, not binding, as I have not yet submitted it to Count Bismarck, and have received as yet no instructions respecting it.

With sentiments of the most distinguished consideration,
You excellency's obedient servant,

KÖNIG.

BERLIN, February 13, 1868.

[Translation.]

1. Members of the North German Union who acquire the right of citizenship in the United States of America shall, in their relation to the North German Union, and citizens of the United States of America who acquire membership in the territory of the North German Union shall, in their relation to the United States of America, enjoy the full operation of their naturalization only after an uninterrupted residence of five years in the country in which they are naturalized; so that a German naturalized in America, who, before completion of his five years' residence there, returns to the territory of the North German Union, can be required to discharge all the public duties which the laws of the same impose upon him, without any objection thereto being made by the government of the United States; while in like manner an American naturalized within the territory of the North German Union, who, before completion of his five years' residence there, returns to the United States, can be required to discharge all the public duties which the laws of the same impose upon him, without objection thereto being made by the said Union.

The mere declaration of the citizens and members of the one country, of a wish to become respectively citizens or members of the other, has not the effect of naturalization.

2. Naturalization in the territory of one of the contracting parties does not prevent the person naturalized from being, upon his return to the territory of the other, subject to trial and punishment on account of any punishable acts committed before emigration.

3. The terms of the present treaty do not affect the agreements in Article 3 of the convention of June 16, 1852, between Prussia and other states of the German Union on the one side, and the United States of America on the other, concerning the delivery up in certain cases of criminals fugitive from justice. The said treaty will hereafter be applicable to all States of the North German Union.

4. If a German, naturalized in America returns to the territory of the North German Union and settles there permanently, he shall have no claim upon the protection of the government of the United States. In like manner an American, naturalized in the territory of the North German Union, who returns to the United States and permanently settles there, shall have no claim upon the protection of the North German Union.

The intention to take up a permanent residence shall [soll] be regarded as existing when the person naturalized resides for more than two years within the territory of the other party.

5. The present treaty goes into effect —, and continues in force till —. If neither party gives notice to the other six months before of its intent to terminate the same, it shall continue in force until twelve months after one of the contracting parties shall give notice to the other of such intention.

6. The present treaty shall be ratified by the King of Prussia in the name of the North German Union, with the consent of the council of the Union and the approval of the imperial Diet, and by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Berlin within — months of the present date.

No. 45.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 19, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 26th of January, No. 36, has been received. You mention two questions which somewhat engage the public attention in Germany, and ask instruction of the department how to speak about them to the government of North Germany.

The first of these questions is, whether it is not expedient to secure perfect reciprocity in regard to the privilege of carrying on trade by the citizens or subjects of the one country in the other country; such reciprocity to extend to the right of holding real estate, at least so far as required for the trade or pursuit of the American emigrant to Germany or the German emigrant to America. The second of these questions is, whether it is practicable and expedient to stipulate with North Germany for the inviolability of private persons and property on the high seas, subject only to the necessities of war. You remark that your judgment is in favor of both these suggestions, especially the second one. I further take notice that you do not propose to connect either of these questions, or any other, with that of naturalization, which subject we have now specially in view in our negotiations with the North German government.

The President has submitted to me a private letter which you have written to him on the subject of the second question.

In regard to the first question, namely, reciprocity for persons concerned in trade in acquiring, holding, and transferring real estate, my personal opinion is in favor of such a reciprocity as is suggested. The subject, however, is one which is beset with grave difficulties. The regulation of the right to acquire, to hold, and alienate real estate in the United States has always been held to fall exclusively within the province of State legislation, and not within the province of federal legislation. It is by no means settled how far the federal government can enter into conventions with foreign nations affecting individual rights over real estate in the several States. Different States cherish and maintain quite different policies, and there are many conflicts of laws between the States in regard to guarantees, alienations, and remedies. There results from this conflict an unwillingness on the part of many senators to negotiate concerning real estate tenures, and this unwillingness renders it difficult to obtain a concurrence of two-thirds in support of any treaty which involves stipulations concerning tenure, inheritance, or disposition of real estate. A considerable service in the Senate has made me familiarly acquainted with this difficulty. I will take an early occasion to inquire concerning the amount of favor such a proposition as the one under immediate consideration might be expected to obtain in the Senate.

I shall afterwards be able to give you the President's instruction on the subject.

In relation to the second question, very conflicting opinions have always been, and still are, entertained in the United States. Thoughtful and hopeful minds generally favor the proposition to exempt private persons and property on the high seas from the inflictions of war. So far as I have learned, this opinion has, however, been by no means universally accepted. There is a large class of persons who habitually regard foreign war as always a probable contingency, besides many who are continually expecting a conflict with some particular State or States. These persons regard privateering not only as the strongest arm of naval defense, but as one which the United States could use with greater advantage than any foreign enemy. These persons are so jealous on the subject of privateering that they are always unwilling to consent to waive the rights in any one treaty for fear that the treaty may become a precedent for the entire abandonment of that form of public war. Certainly this latter class very strongly prevailed throughout the entire period of our civil war. I have not recently made any careful inquiry to ascertain how far that popular sentiment has been modified by the return of peace.

I will, however, on this question, as on the other, make diligent observations, and I will then communicate such decision as the President shall see fit to adopt.

It is quite clear that it would be injudicious to connect either of these two questions with the negotiations now happily on foot concerning naturalization.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

GEORGE BANCROFT, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Bancroft to Mr. Seward.

No. 44.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, February 22, 1868.

SIR: I hold it of good augury that the treaty between the United States and North Germany respecting the effect of naturalization has been signed on Washington's birthday.

Immediately upon entering upon my office I gave attention to this subject, respecting which your instructions were so full as to leave nothing to desire.

I was met in the most friendly spirit. If we had followed the standard books on international law we could have come to no result, for they fail in the great point of the right of the naturalized citizen to maintain his new citizenship in his old country. The opinions of the lawyers of the United States are, as you so well know, in conflict with each other. The laws in Prussia and in the United States, interpreted according to the letter, were also in conflict. To succeed, it was necessary to consider the principles underlying the laws of the two countries; and here there was found to be a remarkable harmony. The disposition of the foreign department to comply with our wishes was made known to me by Messrs. Van Philipsborn and König, in my interview with them on the 18th day of September last.

Nothing then remained but to remove difficulties growing out of the previous administrative system of Prussia; and there could have been no progress, had not the chiefs in the departments of war and the interior discussed the questions which arose with a candid desire to remove every obstacle. Count Bismarck from the first took a large and liberal view of the case. But with all this, the difficulties were numerous and grave. I made it my rule throughout to avoid controversy and not to precipitate a decision.

On the question of the right of expatriation there arose no discussion. It is recognized by the laws of both countries.

On the question of residence as a condition of naturalization which the mother country should respect, there existed no difference.

The time of residence was a point of more delicacy. The Prussian law required an absence of 10 years; ours a residence of five. With liberality and frankness Count Bismarck declared himself willing to accept the American rule, as it had received the sanction of the administration of Washington, and had become fixed by the usage of more than three-score years and ten.

Should the United States see fit for its own purposes, as lately in the act of July 17, 1862, to concede naturalization on a shorter residence, their right to do so is not impaired; but the meaning of this treaty is, that they will not ask North Germany to recognize such naturalization, till the adopted citizen shall have completed the term of residence now required by their normal law.

A question has arisen at what time the emigrant shall be released from liability to military service, whether from the moment of his emigration, or of his naturalization. The object of this government is a real, permanent, friendly adjustment of all questions that have been raised, and it has therefore in the 2d article agreed that the emigrant, on his return, shall not be called to account for the non-performance of any military duty to which the liability may arise subsequent to his emigration.

The 3d article establishes the principle that a North German who, in conformity to the terms of the 1st article, has been received as an American citizen, is no longer liable to extradition.

The 4th article is intended to prevent insincerity in the transfer of allegiance. A German naturalized in America and returning to Germany for two years, does not necessarily renounce his American citizenship; only he may be called upon to declare his purpose explicitly.

The 5th and 6th articles require no explanation.

I trust the President and Senate will unanimously approve what I have done, and that the ratification of the treaty herewith enclosed will be immediately returned for the necessary exchange. The result is to be ascribed to the hereditary disposition of this government, unaltered from the days of the great Frederic and Franklin, to cherish the best relations with us; and to the mutual desire that the first important transaction between the United States of America and the United States of North Germany may bear indelible marks of a disposition to recognize and perpetuate the natural friendship of the two countries.

I remain, sir, yours sincerely,

GEO. BANCROFT.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 25, 1868.

SIR: I recur on this occasion to your dispatch No. 36, and to my answer thereto, No. 45, of which latter paper this dispatch may be considered a supplement. Inquiry has been made and full consideration has been bestowed upon the two subjects which you have presented, and upon which the opinion of the President was reserved.

I have now to say, first, that neither of those questions is in any case to be connected with the negotiation, or with such treaty as you may be able to make concerning the naturalization question.

Secondly, that you are at liberty to treat with the government of North Germany upon the first of those reserved questions which concern the mutual freedom of trade upon the broad foundation which, in your No. 36, you propose to adopt.

In regard to the second question which concerns the inviolability of private persons and property in war, we must still defer any proceeding to commit this government, for the reason that in the present condition of our relations with one of the European powers, any proposition to a foreign state for the inviolability of private persons and property on the high seas, could not be expected to find favor with the Senate of the United States or with the country. The principle which Franklin proposed is widely cherished, and there exists an earnest desire among us to give it vitality, thus at once vindicating Franklin's philanthropic foresight, and securing to ourselves and to our country a new distinction for humanity and benevolence.

It is not to be understood that the President thinks that the time has not arrived, but only that the immediate condition is unfavorable.

Your private letter of the 7th of February is received and has been submitted to the President.

The cable has a statement that your treaty upon the naturalization question is complete. I hope that it may be followed by prompt action on the part of Great Britain. In that case I will again bring your proposition concerning the inviolability of private property in war to the consideration of the President and his constitutional advisers.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, March 23, 1868.

SIR: The treaty between the United States of America and North Germany, regulating naturalization, having been laid before the council of the Confederation, was approved on Saturday last, the 21st of this month, without dissent.

In the speech with which the King of Prussia this day opened the Diet of the Confederation, he spoke of the treaty as designed to check in the bud every germ of discord between two nations closely bound together by commercial interests and by family ties.

I cannot but hope the action of the Senate on the treaty will have been equally prompt, and marked by the same friendly spirit.

I repeat to you the request that you will send me by telegraph the decision of the Senate when made.

I remain, sir, sincerely yours,

GEO. BANCROFT.

Translation of extract respecting treaty with the United States.

A treaty which has been concluded with the United States of America is designed to regulate the nationality of immigrants to either country, and thus to remove from the relations between two nations, closely related by commercial interests and family ties, the germ of discord.

No. 51.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, April 3, 1868.

SIR: That no doubt might exist of the correctness of my interpretation of our treaty with North Germany, as communicated to you in my dispatch of February 22, I left a copy of that dispatch at the Foreign Office, and no objection whatever was made to its contents.

The report made upon the treaty by the committee of the North German Council was not well digested, and was not wholly free from ambiguity.

Yesterday the treaty came up for acceptance in the imperial Diet; Mr. König in the first instance, and then Count Bismarck, took the occasion publicly, and in the clearest and most emphatic manner, to confirm my interpretation of it in every particular.

Ex-Consul Meier, the member from Bremen, to whom the president of the Diet had referred the treaty, one of the first merchants in Europe, and well known in America from his long residence among us, reported the treaty to the Diet with the "full conviction" of its merits. He declared his peculiar satisfaction that the natural right of emigration and change of nationality was for the first time made a part of recognized international law by North Germany and the United States.

Dr. Schleiden, so well known to you from his long residence as minister at Washington, not omitting to make some cavils at what he called "small defects," spoke substantially and heartily for the treaty, and for the most liberal interpretation of its terms, describing it as a great progress in international intercourse.

A discussion arose which brought out a full interpretation of its several articles. Mr. König, the plenipotentiary who signed the treaty on the part of North Germany, in explanation of the first article said that a five years' continuous residence in America, and no more, was all that the treaty required in regard to residence.

The chancellor of the Confederation, Count Bismarck, spoke on the same point, declaring that the words of the article were too plain to be misunderstood; that the period of five years was to date from the moment when the emigrant should cross the American line; and that the continuity of residence which was required was to be interpreted, "nicht in körperlichem sondern in juristischem sinne," not in a corporal but in a legal sense.

The interpretation of the second article of the treaty was equally explicit. Dr. Schleiden, of the committee of the Diet, reported that inasmuch as the liability of the naturalized citizen on his return to his original country extended only to breaches of law committed before emigration, it followed that any breach of the law which might be committed by emigration itself was excluded from the class of punishable actions. This view was confirmed by Mr. König, who pointed out that, as the emigrant remained liable only for acts committed before emigration, emigration itself, and the consequent withdrawal from military duty, could not be included among such acts. "So then," said Dr. Löwe, one of the ablest members of the Diet, and well known as a long and esteemed resident of New York, "the hateful military business is now put aside, and the emigrant on his return is not liable to arrest for the violation of the military duty from which he had withdrawn by emigration." While he fully accepted the explanation of Mr. König, Dr. Löwe still intimated a wish that it might be confirmed by Count Bismarck himself. The chancellor immediately arose and replied as follows:

The gentleman who has last spoken fears that a person who has lived five years in America and been naturalized there may yet, on his return here, be held to military duty. This apprehension I can designate as perfectly and absolutely unfounded. The literal observation of the treaty includes in itself that those whom we are bound to acknowledge as American citizens cannot be held to military duty in North Germany. That is the main purpose of the treaty. Whosoever emigrates bona fide with the purpose of residing permanently in America, shall meet with no obstacle on our part to his becoming an American citizen, and his bona fides will be assumed when he shall have passed five years in that country, and, renouncing his North German nationality, shall have become an American citizen. I believe, therefore, that no room has been left open for the anxiety that has been expressed, and I lay great stress upon here placing the subject in its true light.

Dr. Löwe questioned the chancellor on this point once more, saying: "To my joy I think I may understand the chancellor to say that no prosecution for unauthorized emigration can take place, even if the emigrant shall have ceased to be an American citizen." Count Bismarck replied, "I herewith confirm the declaration which the gentleman desires, and" he added jocosely in form, seriously in substance, "I might almost assert that we will treat the five years' absence in America, when connected with naturalization, as a fulfillment of the military duty in the North German Confederation."

The fourth article of the treaty came also under consideration. Mr. Lasker, one of the ablest men of the Diet, inquired whether the German, naturalized in America and returning to Germany, would, after a two years' residence in Germany, be held liable to military duty. The text of the treaty, he said, gave no color to such an interpretation, but the report of the council of the Confederation was ambiguous, and therefore he called upon the chancellor for a nearer explanation. In the beginning of the debate ex-Consul Meier had most clearly explained that the American law required from the person who becomes naturalized a total renunciation of his allegiance to any other power. Holding fast to this fact, Count Bismarck replied that the German-American citizen on resuming his relations as a citizen of North Germany would, under the treaty, stand in the light of a foreigner emigrating into North Germany; that he could not be held to the discharge of any old military duty, but only to such new military duty as would attach to every foreigner emigrating into North Germany and becoming naturalized there.

The president now put the question on the acceptance of the treaty, and the whole Diet, with the exception of two or three Poles, who as it seemed to me only declined voting, rose to their feet with alacrity. All the proceedings were marked by the disposition to cherish the most friendly relations with the United States.

I send you herewith the debate as it appeared concisely in the North German General Gazette of last evening, and in the National Gazette of this morning.

On the fourth article I will add a few words. The American law exacts from the citizen who becomes naturalized a perpetual renunciation, by oath, of his former nationality. Hitherto the Prussian government has made no formal recognition of our naturalization laws; but now that it becomes bound by treaty to respect them, it could not have restored the returning Americo-German to his German citizenship had not the consent of the United States to his release from his obligation to them been given, as it is given, by the fourth article of this treaty.

I remain, sir, yours sincerely,

GEO. BANCROFT.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, April 21, 1868.

SIR: * * * * * * * *

A few days ago Mr. Aegidi and several other members of the Diet of North Germany brought forward a proposition to instruct the chancellor of the North German Confederation (Count Bismarck) to introduce into treaties with friendly powers the principle of the freedom of private property at sea in time of war, so that the principle may become recognized as a part of international law. On Saturday last the final deliberation on the subject took place, and the proposition which had the approval of the administration was unanimously or all but unanimously adopted.

The opinion here is that the abandonment of privateering by public ships as well as by private ones will establish effectually the freedom of the seas, and put an end to the arrogant supremacy of any one great maritime power, and that nothing else will do it so effectually. The interests as well as the moral sentiments of the United States are here supposed to be, on this point, perfectly in accord with those of North

Germany. Indeed, the measure was adopted in the hope that the United States, in conformity with the annual message of the President to Congress of December 4, 1854, would readily meet North Germany on the broad ground of "proposing, as a rule of international law, to exempt private property upon the ocean from seizure by public armed cruisers as well as by privateers." I cannot but hope that the President will permit this principle to stand as a part of the commercial treaty with North Germany.

The consular department of North Germany has at once assumed a character of great importance. A member of this government on the part of the King is now treating on the subject with the Italian minister here. I have been invited to enter upon a similar negotiation. As soon as the treaty with Italy is completed, I will send you a copy of it and ask for such instructions as may be necessary for my guidance.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, May 23, 1868.

SIR: The Customs Parliament was closed to-day by the King in person. The ceremony, at which I was present, took place in the usual manner at the palace.

The result of the session has been on the whole favorable to German unity, although no formal action in that direction was taken by it as a body.

A debate, which quite incidentally arose on the 18th, gave occasion for several warm expressions of national sentiment, and called forth some effective words from Count Bismarck. The enthusiasm reached its climax when Dr. Völk, deputy from Bavaria, closed an eloquent national appeal with these words:

Spring has come in Germany, and, though some may yet for awhile throw snow-balls at each other, that will not last much longer. The advancing spring will insure that material is soon wanting to the snow-ballers.

The patriotic sentiment aroused at this sitting was further stimulated and strengthened by two entertainments, given to the parliament in honor especially of the Southern German deputies—one by the bankers at the exchange, where Count Bismarck and Prince Hohenlohe made speeches, and one by the merchants and other citizens of Berlin at the Tivoli garden, where Berthold Auerbach was a principal speaker. And that the southern members may not fail to return to their homes with the pleasantest impressions, the entire parliament and council are, after a reception this evening by the Crown Prince in the illuminated grounds of Sans Souci, to proceed as guests of the government by special train to Kiel, on the Baltic, there to be entertained by the admiralty of the North German navy.

Your dispatches, to No. 59 inclusive, have been duly received.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 18, 1868.

SIR: On the 14th January last, the consul general of Würtemberg, at New York, presented, in behalf of his government, its complaint of the construction put by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Frederickson vs. The State of Louisiana, (23 Howard's R., 446,) on the 3d article of the treaty of April 10th, 1844, (8 Stat., 588.)

In the case referred to, a native of Würtemberg having been duly naturalized, and having died in Louisiana, bequeathing legacies to kindred residing in Würtemberg, and subjects of its King, the legacies were subjected to a tax of ten per cent. This was under a statute of Louisiana, which imposed that tax upon successions devolving on any person not domiciled in that State and not being a citizen of any other State or Territory of the Union. The Supreme Court held that the decedent, being a citizen of the United States, his estate was not within the provisions of the treaty, which was intended only to convey the case of a subject of Würtemberg bequeathing property in this country, or a citizen of the United States dying and leaving property in Würtemberg.

The claim of the government of Würtemberg was, "that every subject of his Majesty is entitled to be placed on the same footing with an inhabitant of the United States if he becomes the heir, legatee, or donee of a citizen of either in respect to personal property within the United States." It was stated that this construction of the treaty is applied by the authorities of Würtemberg in exoneration of citizens of the United States who succeed to the property in that kingdom, either of its subjects or their fellow-citizens, of the tax to which they would otherwise be subject.

This government having no power, as you are aware, to act upon any other construction of the existing treaty than that adopted by the Supreme Court, signified to the consul general of Würtemberg its readiness to negotiate a new convention in conformity to the interpretation which his government puts upon that now in force, and with a proposition to that effect which he submitted.

On the 24th of July, 1868, the consul general, by the direction of his government, withdrew the proposition for a new convention, and claimed in its behalf "the adhesion of the government of the United States to the interpretation of the existing treaty, by which the royal government have held themselves bound since the compact was made," and requested "that the government of the United States will enforce the performance of the obligations assumed on behalf of the entire Union, in every part of that territory where their sovereignty is acknowledged, and will prevent any misconstruction of its provisions by the legislatures or the States of any member of the confederacy."

You are instructed to communicate to the minister of foreign affairs of Würtemberg the views of this government upon the subject. You will state that this government cannot admit, nor does it perceive, that the Supreme Court has misconstrued the existing treaty. It recognizes the truth that the more liberal method of dealing with the interests of citizens of the United States in property situated in Würtemberg, which the enlightened government of that kingdom has adopted, is accordant with the spirit of modern civilization and deserves to be reciprocated. You will explain that this just reciprocity can only be effected, so far as this government is concerned, by entering into a convention by which its terms shall be unmistakably defined, thus being the only mode in which the legislative power of the several States in regard to the transmission of property in their respective jurisdictions can be affected by the action of the federal authority. We renew the expression of our willingness to treat for that purpose.

The consul general desires to be informed whether any other States of the Union have adopted statutes similar to that of Louisiana. No complaint has reached this government of the legislation of any other State in the particular under consideration. Proper inquiry will be instituted if such a complaint shall be presented. As there is no obligation upon the State authorities to report their actions upon matters within the sphere of their local and domestic legislation, it is not regarded as proper to institute an inquiry until some case shall arise where such legislation may be supposed to conflict with the supreme obligations of the federal Constitution or the treaties made in pursuance thereof.

SIR: * * * * *

To-day I inclose to you a circular of the minister of justice of the 5th of July last, with a translation. You will judge of the beneficent effect of the treaty from the fact that the cases of those who obtain by it remission of penal sentences against them are too numerous to be considered one by one. I add, also, the circular of the minister of the interior of July 6, which proves to you how fairly this government proceeds in executing the treaty. I commend it to the attention of the President, as evidence of the strong desire of the North German Confederation to cultivate with the United States the most friendly relations. * *

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Circulars of the minister of justice and minister of the interior of the North German Union, concerning the treaty between the United States and that government respecting the nationality of emigrants, concluded on the 22d of February, 1868.

CIRCULAR OF THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

In concluding the treaty of the 22d February of this year (Bulletin of Laws of the Confederation, p. 228) agreed upon between the North German Union and the United States of America respecting the nationality of emigrants, it was the prevailing intention—

That, in conformity to the second article of that treaty, the punishment incurred by punishable emigration is not to be brought to execution on occasion of a return of the emigrant to his original country, if the returning emigrant has obtained naturalization in the other country in conformity to the first article of said treaty.

In consideration whereof, in every case where legally valid condemnations of this kind exist against such persons, an official report is to be made to the minister of justice respecting the remission of the declared punishments and costs by way of grace, and, in order to shorten and simplify the matter, these recommendations are to be consolidated in a table if the number of cases is large enough to justify a tabular form of report.

BERLIN, July 5, 1868.

The minister of justice,

DR. LEONHARDT.

To all royal courts of appeal, to all royal supreme courts, and to the state attorneys general in Kiel, Cassel, Wiesbaden, and Frankfurt a. m.

CIRCULAR OF THE MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.

In concluding the treaty of the 22d February of this year (Bulletin of Laws of the Confederation, p. 228) between the North German Union and the United States of America, it was the prevailing intention—

That, in conformity to article 2d of this treaty, the punishable action committed by the unauthorized emigration of a citizen of the Union to the United States of America should not be made ground for a penal prosecution upon the return of such person to his former country after absence of not less than five years, and that the punishment for such action, even though already legally declared, should not be consummated if the person has acquired in America the right of citizenship in conformity to article 1 of said treaty.

The royal government is therefore instructed, in the cases indicated, to abstain from recommending trial and punishment, and in general from every kind of prosecution, whenever the person in question is able to produce the proof that he has become a naturalized citizen of the United States of America in conformity with the first clause of article 1.

The proper judicial authorities will be furnished by the minister of justice with an instruction, in all cases where legal sentences of this kind exist, to report officially the remission, by way of grace, of the declared punishments and costs.

BERLIN, July 6, 1868.

SIR: The change in title of the Austrian Emperor and empire, of which I gave you notice in my No. 72, in advance of all information from other quarters, has now been officially announced. The new titles recognize the co-ordinate character of Austria and Hungary. Henceforward the Emperor's title is, Emperor of Austria, King of Bohemia, &c., and Apostolic King of Hungary. The &c. in the title marks the division between Cis-Leithania and Trans-Leithania. The shorter title is Emperor of Austria and Apostolic King of Hungary, or his Majesty the Emperor and King, or his Imperial and Royal Apostolic Majesty. The collective kingdoms and lands are named, alternately, the Austro-Hungarian monarchy and the Austro-Hungarian empire. These names will appear in our naturalization treaty, if we succeed in making one, and I have instituted such preliminary inquiries as will soon determine whether such a treaty can be made.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, November 20, 1868.

SIR: From the time of my arrival here I have uniformly, and on the best authority, assured you of the sincerity of the King of Prussia and of his ministers in their desire of peace; and I have also always given it as my opinion that peace was the choice of the French people and of their Emperor. There is now a lull in the rumors of war, and they will not very soon be revived; but as the pacific intentions on the part of France are qualified by the intimation of a policy hostile to any further improvement of the unity of the German people, it can only be said that the danger of war is indefinitely adjourned. The interests of France and of Germany, the interests of the United States, and the principles that are dear to the United States, are all so involved in the subject, that I deem it proper to offer some remarks for your consideration.

1. A war undertaken for the avowed purpose of preventing the peaceable improvement of the German constitution by the joint act of the German governments and people, would be a war of revolution; for the principle that it is the right of a people to reform their government so as to advance their safety and happiness is now the received principle of international law, first proclaimed by the United States, next by France, then by Great Britain, practically in its several unions of its kingdoms and its reforms in like manner by the Swiss Confederation, and now formally by Italy, Prussia, and Spain, and practically by the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. A war directed against that principle could not but convulse the world. The claim of right to forbid a government and people to improve their political condition is in itself an act of hostility to the human race, and therefore must necessarily fail; but a war founded upon it would be attended by incalculable disasters, so that to deprecate such a war is a proof of friendship for France.

2. Should such a war assume the form of a war for aggrandizement, the war must become a world-wide one; for all the great powers of Europe are pledged to the neutrality of Belgium and of Luxembourg, and gave their assent to the present frontier of Germany.

3. Such a war must be accompanied by an abdication of the influence of France in the east, and especially a renunciation of the results of the Crimean war; for a life-and-death conflict between France and Germany would leave to one great power an undisputed control in the southeast of Europe; a result which no friend to France would desire.

4. If in the three points to which I have here directed your attention the United States have no immediate interest, it is not so with regard to maritime rights and the liberty of the seas, which would be exposed to violation in a war that must take the character of a naval conflict on all the oceans. Here the United States, now one of the great powers, inferior in numbers to no European country on the continent of Europe east of the Vistula, and inferior to none in wealth and resources, would have a right to be heard, and in all probability the duty and necessity to make themselves heard. It is then an act of friendship to France to wish to avoid any possibility of conflict, in their common interest as defenders of maritime liberty.

5. Still more would the mercantile interests of the United States be exposed to peril and interruption by a war to prevent the improvement of the political institutions of Germany. The intercourse between the United States and Germany is immeasurably more important to the United States than its intercourse with any other continental power. Were German emigration from the ports of Bremen and Hamburg alone to be interrupted, it would occasion a loss of that which nourishes the life-blood of the nation. The loss, when weighed merely as a diminution of annual wealth, would be one of the greatest blows which could be inflicted on our prosperity.

On these grounds, among others, I congratulate you upon the continuance of European peace, and cannot but hope that under the influence of our example, and of the principle which, as a nation, we have always professed, the right of a people, especially in harmony with its government, to reform its institutions, may never be questioned, least of all be resisted by war or the menace of war.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 20th November, No. 85, has been received. I am greatly obliged to you for having placed before me in so clear a light the tendencies of existing European interests in favor of the continuance of peace between North Germany and France. Certainly all friends of progress and civilization must share with you in deprecating a conflict the mere apprehension of which has produced universal anxiety in Europe.

The procrastination of reconstruction in Spain seems now to forbode a civil war in the peninsula. It is not believed that other nations of western Europe can feel sufficiently at their ease, in view of such a conflict upon ideas, to engage in contests for mere political advantage or supremacy.

No. 14.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, December 24, 1867.

SIR: On Sunday last the houses of Parliament held their last session under the old constitution of 1861. At the opening of the session of the lower house [the Abgeordneten-Haus] in the morning, Baron von Beust, chancellor of the empire, announced that the fundamental laws amendatory of the constitution [Staatsgrundgesetze] had received the imperial sanction and entered on that day into full force.

The president of the legislative body, Dr. Geskra, one of the ablest leaders of the new constitutional movement, who, under the former system, was appointed by the Crown, immediately left the chair, and in an eloquent and significant address declared the office vacant by operation of the new law. The house at once elected him president by a unanimous vote. He resumed his seat, accepting the honor shown him as a demonstration of adhesion to the principles of liberty and progress, to which he promised to devote himself in the future as in the past.

The house then proceeded to the election of members of the delegation, which (according to the law numbered 146) is to meet a similar delegation from the Hungarian Parliament, to discuss and legislate upon matters common to both halves of the empire. The house, after passing without debate the government proposition in regard to the next quarter's budget, was then prorogued by the chancellor, in accordance with the imperial command, until the 29th of January next.

In the evening Baron Beust also announced to the House of Lords the prorogation of the legislature and the promulgation of the fundamental laws. I send by this mail an official copy of these most important statutes. They embrace, 1. The law relating to the representation of the empire; 2. The law relating to the common rights of the citizens; 3. The law relating to the institution of an imperial court; 4. The law relating to the judicial power; 5. The law defining the limits and operation of the executive authority; 6. The delegation law.

With the publication of these laws Austria enters upon a new era of constitutional life. There can be no question of the sincerity and devotion of those leading minds of the empire who by the labor of years have at last brought about this result, nor do I have any doubt of the intentions of the present government to carry out in good faith the policy thus indicated by the representatives of the national will. The new system is launched under good auspices. Austria was never so completely the mistress of her own destinies. The unfortunate wars of last year, if she is wise enough to profit by them, will be her salvation. She has less than any nation in Europe need of an army or of foreign alliances. Her loss of Venetia has gained her immunity from a standing menace in the south, and her isolation from the political questions which agitate the rest of the German states gives her leisure for the full development of her enormous but neglected resources. The favorable results of this state of things already begin to appear. Commerce and agricul. ture have taken a new impulse. Manufacturers are busy and prosperous. The gold premium is continually diminishing in spite of the vicious state of the national finances.

There is evidently still a too great complexity in their political system. But it seemed impossible to avoid the dualism insisted upon by Hungary, which rendered necessary the consequent separation of the financial systems of the two halves of the empire, by which, as at last arranged, Hungary is to pay 30 per cent. of the common expenses and 29,000,000 florins a year in full of her liabilities for the common debt. It is somewhat remarkable that both Austrian and Hungarian statesmen denounced this arrangement, while they voted for it as a necessity of the situation, the former admitting that the passive resistance of Hungary could only be vanquished by this concession, and the latter, in their speeches recently made in the Diet at Pesth, insisting that Hungary was a kingdom completely shut in by two great empires, Prussia and Austria, and could not exist without alliances; and that the alliance indicated both by tradition and the nature of things was the Austrian. Even the moderate Hungarians made no concealment of their conviction that it was entirely within the competence of the Diet to make or reject the so-called alliance. Hungary has now an independent Diet and a responsible ministry, to which it is thought that Croatia will probably be joined. The rest of the Austrian dominions are united under the imperial Crown, with a Reichsrath or imperial Parliament and a responsible government, whose formation has been as yet delayed by unforeseen difficulties in the personnel. There is still a third Parliament, or delegation, the members of which are elected by the Hungarian and Austrian Parliaments respectively, with a separate ministry, who are to regulate matters concerning the two halves of the empire jointly.

These governments are the fruit of many compromises. There are many statesmen who hope to see all these Parliaments and governments fused into one in the course of a few years, and on the other hand there is a strong disintegrating spirit of race at work, which if allowed free course would break the empire up into as many governments as there are languages and nationalities represented in it. This forms a most difficult question for Austrian statesmanship, as it is hard to say whether this clannish spirit is most nourished by concession or opposition. Hungary, for instance, has obtained nearly all it ever demanded, yet the government awaits the issue of the next elections in that kingdom with very serious concern.

JOHN HAY.

No. 15.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, December 31, 1867.

SIR: The three laws which together comprise the financial arrangement with Hungary have received the imperial sanction and entered into effect. The law for the emancipation of the Jews in Hungary has also been approved and promulgated.

Last week the Emperor issued imperial rescripts, by which, while relieving Baron von Beust and Count Andrássy from the positions they have provisionally held during the transition period of last year, he takes occasion to thank them publicly for their arduous and successful labors, which have resulted in the present relations between Hungary and Austria. He also constitutes at the same time an imperial ministry for matters jointly concerning both halves of the realm, by re-appointing Baron von Beust (who still remains chancellor of the empire and minister of the imperial household) minister of foreign affairs; Baron von Becke minister of finance, and Field Marshal John minister of war. Count Andrassy remains minister resident of the Hungarian government.

To-day it is understood that the parliamentary ministry for the government of the lands and provinces represented in the Reichsrath, or Cis-Leithan ministry, as it is more concisely called, has at length been formed by Prince Carlos Auersperg, and the list having been submitted to the Emperor has received his sanction. It embraces Prince Auersperg, president; Count Taaffe, vice-president, national defense and public safety; Dr. Giskra, interior; Dr. Herbst, justice; Dr. Brestl, finance; Dr. Hasner, worship and instruction; Mr. von Pleyer, commerce; Count Potocki, agriculture; and Dr. Berger, minister without portfolio.

This new ministry is composed of some of the most prominent liberal statesmen and orators in the Austrian Parliament, with a sufficient infusion of the conservative and aristocratic element to defend it against the reproach of being an exclusively democratic government. The frequent recurrence of the title of doctor indicates the preponderance of academic and legal talent. You will see that the important branch of the police has been taken from the department of the interior and added to the bureau of Count Taaffe, doubtless as a conservative concession. As a favor to the Polish province of Galicia, the department of agriculture has been created for the acceptance of Count Potocki, one of their leading representatives.

The formation of the ministry has not been unattended with serious difficulty, and it is understood to-day that several of the members accepted the arduous positions assigned them with the express understanding that thorough and searching reforms should be introduced in several branches of the public service. The expenses of the military organization and the bureau administration must be greatly curtailed, the sphere of educational activity widely extended, and the chains forged by unsystematic legislation must be struck from the struggling commerce of the country, before the nation can hope to realize much practical benefit from their amended constitution.

These laudable ends will now become the object of the labors of the new government. That they will be pursued with skill and energy and honest devotion, the names I have given you are a sufficient pledge. But he would be a rash man who would pretend to predict with any certainty the result of the momentous experiment. For the successful accomplishment of the purposes of that enlightened and patriotic body of constitutional liberals who have thus far proceeded on the work of national reconstruction, it is necessary that the nation shall be allowed to devote itself exclusively for awhile to its internal concerns. War and diplomacy are luxuries in which Austria cannot for the present afford to indulge. Yet these are the only two careers in which for ages the ambition of Austrian nobles has found a reward and their energies a field of exercise. It will be hard for them to see their occupation gone, or to direct their efforts at once into another channel. There is a vague and ill-defined fear of entangling alliances. The officious warning which the French consul general at Belgrade is said to have given to the Servian government, that it should take no measures to compromise the interests of Austria, has not contributed to allay this apprehension. The air of protecting friendship towards this empire which pervaded the recent speech of Mr. Rouher in the French chamber, is regarded by Austrians with whom I have conversed as equally sinister and offensive.

The question of the concordat is still hanging undecided. The House of Lords has not yet acted upon the so-called confessional laws, (relating to civil marriage and public instruction,) and Count Crivelli has gone to Rome, it is said, upon the apparently hopeless errand of obtaining the Papal sanction to an act which can only be regarded at the Vatican as legislative sacrilege. As long as this weighty matter remains in suspense it will be a fruitful source of disquiet and distrust.

Another inherent difficulty, to which I have before alluded, is the inveterate spirit of race, which as yet shows few symptoms of giving way to a harmonious impulse of national union. When, in obedience to a general conviction of the necessity of the case, dualism was granted to Hungary, it was intended as the last concession in that direction. But the success of the long and patient struggle in Hungary has apparently only encouraged the other ethnological divisions of the empire to more clamorous demands. The most serious agitation now, in this sense, is that which is universally going on in the C-zech population of Bohemia, which loudly demand the autonomy of the provinces formerly embraced under the crown of St. Wenceslaus, a separate ministry, and the solemn installation of the Emperor at Prague as King of Bohemia. This is attended with what may be termed an "animated flirtation" with the Emperor of Russia, some of the manifestations of which have been the Panslavic pilgrimage to Moscow, the playing of the Russian anthem in the streets of Prague, and the like. These, however, are mere eccentricities of party. I do not think the more influential and intelligent leaders of the movement have any serious intention of inviting the intervention of a foreign power.

I need not speak of the chronic deficit of the treasury as the first and most palpable lion in the path. These difficulties are fully recognized by the liberal majority, and while they disclaim responsibility for them as legacies which have descended from former aristocratic administrations, they announce their purpose to deal with them as promptly and effectually as possible. Many of the leading conservatives confidently anticipate an early failure of the liberal government, and the accession to power of the reaction. If this be so, it will be only one more instance of the disregard which history sometimes pays to the common law maxim, that no one shall take advantage of his own tort. And in the long run I suppose no one ever does.

JOHN HAY.

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 24th of December, No. 14. Your account of the reorganization of the empire under its amended constitution is very interesting. It is gratifying to see that the national mind is cheerful and hopeful, and that prosperity revives so speedily under this great reform.

Whatever may be the fate of the further compromises which have been projected, certainly no one who considers the constitutional reforms that have been already accomplished can deny to Austrian and Hungarian statesmen the merit of great loyalty, patriotism, intelligence, and enterprise.

JOHN HAY, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Hay to Mr. Seward.

No. 19.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, February 5, 1868.

SIR: The government of Austria pursues steadily its work of improvement and reform. The minister of the interior, Dr. Giskra, has issued to the civil functionaries of the empire a circular in which, while inviting them to take the oath of allegiance to the new constitution, he states in a most impressive way that this is not a mere formality, but that they will be expected to labor in good faith for the practical realization of the liberal aims of that instrument. The circular has been very well received by the great majority. By the party of reaction it is regarded as a new insult and affliction.

The government, acting in harmony with the spirit of this circular, has, at his own request, removed the Ritter von Toggenburg from the governorship of the Tyrol, and transferred him to the permanent retired list. He has been long known as one of the most prominent of the ultra conservatives holding high civil position, and his retirement affords significant evidence of the thoroughness of the intended reforms.

The vacancy in the presidency of the House of Lords, occasioned by Prince Auersberg's appointment as minister resident, has been filled by the imperial nomination of Prince Colloredo-Maunsfeld, a nobleman of pronounced liberal tendencies.

The minister of war, Baron von John, has resigned, on account of a disagreement with the majority of the government, who could not assent to his ideas of the necessity of greater armaments, and his place has been supplied by General von Kuhn. The ober-commando of the army, an office hitherto vested in the Arch duke Albert as general-in-chief, has been incorporated with the responsible ministry of war. The prince retains his position as inspector general. This brings the military administration into harmony with the constitution.

The two delegations, representing respectively the Hungarian Diet and the Austrian Reichsrath, have been a fortnight in session, and have as yet made little progress in serious business. I find my impression growing stronger that this machinery of communication between the two halves of the empire will be found too cumbrous for the speedy and satisfactory dispatch of public business. It was a compromise founded too much upon mutual distrust, and too little upon mutual confidence to thoroughly succeed. Already some time has been lost by a peremptory interpellation of the Hungarian left, demanding explanations of the title reichsministerium, minister of the empire, which they said should have been "ministry for common affairs." They were pacified by an explanation which, as there was nothing to explain, explained nothing.

The business now before the delegations is the war budget for the coming year. The impression among the Austrians was that the propositions of the government would be accepted, virtually in the state in which they were received, with a proviso declaring that this was to be considered merely a provisional arrangement, and that a fixed basis for the future should be at once discussed and settled. This is the besetting sin, as it appears to me, of Austrian politics—this tendency to accept measures with which no one is entirely satisfied, contenting their consciences with protesting against the precedent. But in this indolent plan of the provisorium they reckoned without the Hungarians.

The Magyars are a race endowed with a genuine passion for political matters. Their zeal and stubborn tenacity form a striking contrast to the easy and compromising character of the average Austrian. The Hungarians have by no means given up the idea of having their national Landwehr made independent of the Austrian commands in its organization. They know their liberties would be far more easily assured if universal peace could be made certain; and disarmament is peace. These motives, therefore, have doubtless inspired their opposition to the government military budget, which they claim is much too high for the peace establishment. Instead of 76,000,000 florins, which the government demands, they seem inclined to vote no more than 50,000,000. This, the Austrians say, will only suffice for an effective force of 150,000 men, instead of the present army of about 400,000. The secret answer of the Magyars is so much the better; we are then sure of peace, and the regular army will form merely a skeleton to be filled if needed by the reserve.

It is not in my power to predict the result of these debates. But I cannot help hoping that this time, at least, the tenacious Magyars may carry their point. The great calamity and danger of Europe to-day are these enormous armaments. No honest statesman can say that he sees in the present attitude of politics the necessity of war. No great power is threatened. There is no menace to peace that could not be immediately dispelled by a firm protest of the peacefully disposed majority of nations. There would be, therefore, no danger to any people, but a vast and immediate gain to all, from a general disarmament. It need not be simultaneous. It is idle to say France fears invasion from Prussia or Prussia from France, and an honest understanding among the western nations would keep the peace from the eastern side. Why, then, is this awful waste of youth and treasure continued? I believe from no other motive than to sustain the waning prestige of kings. Armies are to-day only useful in Europe to overawe the people in peace, or by groundless wars to divert their attention from domestic misrule. With the disappearance of great armies the welfare of the people would become the only mainspring of national action, and that false and wicked equilibrium, by which now the interests of one man weigh as heavily as those of millions of his fellow-creatures, would be utterly destroyed.

It would be singularly suggestive if Austria, so long the leader of the forces of reaction, should now come forward to set for the world the magnanimous and courageous example of a constitutional state, based upon the popular will, and refusing the support of bayonets.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, May 27, 1868.

SIR: The official Gazette of yesterday contained the text of the laws in regard to schools and civil marriage, commonly called the confessional laws. On the 24th of October last I announced to you the passage of the first of these measures through the lower house of the Reichsrath. On the night of the 21st of March the city of Vienna was illuminated, the ministers serenaded, and the national hymn sung by a vast concourse of people around the statue of Joseph II, in honor of a favorable vote in the same matter in the House of Lords. But it was only on Monday last that these measures received the imperial sanction and became laws of the empire. By a singular and touching coincidence, the promulgation of these laws took place on the same day with the funeral of Dr. Mühlfeld, who was their principal framer and most strenuous advocate in the House of Representatives. He died on Sunday, unconscious that his great work was at last completed.

No intelligent persons, whom I have seen, have at any time seriously doubted that the Emperor would sanction these measures. Since he has entered upon the new constitutional path which he is now treading, he has acted with the utmost propriety and good faith, in submitting his personal sentiments and desires to the regularly expressed wish of the people of the empire. But the very long delay in the matter; the mysterious silence of Count Crivelli in Rome, from his arrival there until his sudden death; the presence at Pesth-Ofen of members of the imperial family of notorious reactionary sympathies; and the ceaseless activity of the higher clergy in Austria, all combined to excite a vague feeling of distrust among the people, which is now finally relieved. There is, however, no enthusiastic demonstration over the result. The effervescence ended in March, when the Herrenhaus voted.

Baron Meysenbug started yesterday for Rome, to resume the negotiations with the Pope, which were broken off by the death of Count Crivelli. It is not thought that the Papal government will push matters to an open breach with this court. They will more probably prefer to accept the inevitable state of things—saving all their rights or claims by a strong protest, and trusting by their still great influence, in every class from palace to hovel, to prevent the recent legislation from inflicting any practical damage upon the ecclesiastical power.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.Mr. Hay to Mr. Seward.

No. 27.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, July 16, 1868.

SIR: The Papal government seems to have committed an irreparable blunder in the allocution fulminated against Austria for the breach of the concordat. It was thought by the more zealous that this utterance of the Pope would have a powerful effect upon the court, the aristocracy, and the masses of the population in Austria; and for a few days the champions of reaction were in great glee over it. The prince and bishops came out one after another, in pastoral letters, which were nothing less than seditious, declaring the objectionable school and marriage laws null and void, and denouncing those who should avail themselves of their provisions as "public transgressors." This spiritual exaltation appears now to have entirely died away. The clerical organs use much more moderate language, declaring that they never meant to attack the legal efficacy of these laws. And it is said that the reports now sent to Rome from the higher clergy, and from the apostolic nuncio himself, are of the most discouraging character. The Pope is reported to have said a few days ago that he had no idea that the pernicious sentiments of Joseph II had taken such deep root in Austria; that we must hope for better days, and pray for the passing away of the religious indifference that is so marked a characteristic of the times.

The government of the Emperor has presented a protest to the Papal government against the allocation, which is not as yet made public, but is understood to be couched in firm but courteous language. The people of Austria have responded to what they consider an unauthorized foreign dictation in a remarkably energetic and unanimous manner. In numerous municipal bodies resolutions denunciatory of the allocation have been passed. In the diocese of Gratz several of the town councils have refused to the archbishop, who has rendered himself obnoxious by his opposition to the confessional laws, the usual public receptions in his tour of confirmation. In Vienna, a large public meeting was held last week, where the allocation was read and torn in pieces by an excited orator amid general applause. An election has just been held in this city to fill the place of representative in the Landtag, or general assembly of Austria proper, left vacant by the death of the distinguished liberal, Dr. Mühlfeld. It was thought there would be a trial of strength between the clerical and liberal parties. But Dr. Giskra, minister of the interior, the liberal candidate, received every vote but one, the professors of the benedictine establishment going in a body to the polls and voting for him. In the south the warmer Italian blood of the population of Trieste has given occasion to regrettable scenes of riot in the streets. Disorderly crowds have almost daily, during the past week, disturbed the peace of the city with cries of "down with the Pope!" and boisterous demonstrations against the monasteries and other religious establishments.

Even in the court and among the higher aristocracy there seems no disposition to defend the arrogant and aggressive attitude of the Papal government. By this act, which was intended to strike opposition dumb, and rescue the church from all its perils, the clerical authority has probably been more weakened in Austria than it could have been by years of liberal agitation.

Baron Meysenbug, under secretary of state, who has been since May in Rome, endeavoring to settle the differences between the two courts, is expected to return to-day, having utterly failed in his mission. He belongs to the clerical-feudal party, and was selected for this mission as a persona gratissima to his Holiness. But it is thought that this very fact, and the concessions which in his private capacity he was ready to make to the views of the Pope, prevented his presenting with any energy the views of his government, and encouraged the Papal curia in its attitude of blind resistance. It is now thought that the embassy in Rome will be abolished, and that Austria will be in future only represented there by a chargé d'affaires.

JOHN HAY.

SIR: I saw General Menabrea this morning at his weekly reception of the members of the diplomatic corps, and said to him, that, though I was not authorized to demand explanations in regard to the objects of the Italian naval expedition now fitting out, as is said, for the waters of the La Plata, yet I was sure that my government would receive with pleasure any information on the subject which he might choose to impart confidentially either through me or through Mr. Cerruti.

General Menabrea replied that he was quite willing to be entirely frank in relation to the objects of the expedition; that its primary purpose was to relieve the Italian squadron now cruising in the South American seas, but that a somewhat imposing character was given to it on this occasion, because it was thought that the presence of a considerable naval force would facilitate negotiations for the liquidation of the claims of Italian subjects against the republic of Uruguay; that claims analogous in principle, on the part of British and French subjects, had been allowed and paid by that state; and that the Italian government thought it due to itself and its subjects to insist on equal justice to its own people; but that no idea of conquest, or of intervention in the internal affairs of any South American government, or in any differences between any two of them, had been for a moment entertained. He added, that he did not suppose that there was any probability of the necessity of a resort to force, and he was convinced that the display of a material ability to maintain the national rights and honor was all that would be required.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have conversed with Mr. Barbolani, secretary general of the ministry of foreign affairs, who has been some time in that branch of the Italian public service, and with other persons conversant with the state of things at Tunis, in relation to the subject of Mr. Heap's dispatch, a copy of which accompanied a late instruction of yours.

Mr. Barbolani said that his government had been very cautious in offering advice to the Bey of that regency, and he did not appear to be aware that any European government had gone so far in the way of remonstrance against the severities lately and still practiced by the Bey's administration as Mr. Heap's information would lead one to suppose.

The statement of facts by Mr. Heap and his predecessor is certainly not exaggerated, but the Italian government expects little good in that quarter from moral means, and its interests, and those of its subjects, have not yet called for the employment of material force.

There are 5,000 or 6,000 Italians residing in the basklik, and the commercial relations of Tunis with Italy are more important than with any other Christian state. On the other hand, our commerce with that country is insignificant, and we can hardly be said to have any other political relations with the Bey's government than are implied in its recognition of our consular agents. It does not seem probable that a government so remote as ours could accomplish much for the cause of humanity in Tunis, by resorting to measures which European powers have found ineffectual, or which they have not thought it expedient to adopt, and no information which I have obtained leads me to suppose that the desired end would be advanced by any special action on the part of the American government.

There would, however, be little risk in authorizing Mr. Heap to unite with the European consuls, at Tunis, in any general moral measures which their governments may instruct them to adopt.

You will pardon me for suggesting that Mr. Cerruti, by official residence on the Barbary coast, and by long service in the ministry of foreign affairs at this court, is better qualified to advise on this subject than any person known to me here, and as his intelligence and good faith are altogether to be relied on, I have no doubt he can give you valuable information on the subject.

General Menabrea told me yesterday that he should write fully to Mr. Cerruti on the subject of the Italian naval expedition to South America, and I infer from his remarks that this government would gladly accept the good offices of our own with that of Uruguay. I think it probable that Mr. Cerruti will suggest this to you, and, in any event, I have no doubt an offer to that effect from you would be received as a gratifying evidence of amicable sentiments towards Italy. * * *

SIR: Admiral Farragut and suite arrived at Florence on the evening of Friday, the 7th instant, and left town this morning. As soon as his arrival was known he was invited by the King to a great military dinner, and afterwards received a similar compliment from a large number of members of Parliament, of every shade of political opinion. He also attended evening receptions at the houses of the president of the council and the Turkish minister, and entertainments were given to him by Mrs. Marsh and by Colonel and Mrs. T. B. Lawrence. In short, he was received with a cordial hospitality rarely shown, in the same degree, to strangers of any nation, and I believe that everything was done in his honor and for his enjoyment, both by the Italian government and by the American and other foreign residents at Florence, that the shortness of his stay permitted.

On all these occasions the most friendly and respectful sentiments were manifested towards the government and people of the United States, and I can say, with entire confidence, that during my residence in this kingdom no foreign visitor at the Italian capital has made a more favorable personal impression upon all who have been brought into contact with him than our great naval hero and patriot, Admiral Farragut.

La Spezia, where the Franklin and some other ships of the squadron are lying, is at too great a distance from all the large Italian towns to allow of the vessels being visited conveniently by many official or private persons who are interested in naval architecture; but there will be ample opportunity for this purpose during the admiral's stay at Naples, and it is not impossible that the King and his court may make a visit to that city at the same period.

SIR: The new army bill, after being discussed for several weeks in the house of representatives, passed that body on the 13th instant, by a vote of 66 to 35, the only important modification in the original proposition of the government being a reduction by it to 2,000 addition to the annual contingent instead of the 3,000 men asked for. The sentiment seems to be very decided that, in view of the preparations for war on all sides, Belgium must put herself in a better condition of defence for the event of war, and also to suppress disorders in time of peace, and several influential members of the opposition have aided with their votes to swell the majority of the government.

The necessity of an army to quell domestic disturbance also, which the minister of finance insisted upon in his closing speech, has been painfully illustrated in the past few days.

On the 26th an outbreak of workmen occurred in the thickly peopled mining and manufacturing district of Charleroi, caused by a reduction of wages and diminution of time of labor by the employers of the coal miners; the troops were called in to quell it, some 2,500 in all, and 8 or 10 of the people were killed and a number wounded. Tranquillity is for the moment restored, but the cause of its disturbance remains—insufficient wages and work in a time of unusual distress and dearness of provisions.

The disturbance has no political character.

SIR: I was present at a dinner at the palace yesterday given by their Majesties in honor of the Prince and Princess Hohenzollern Sigmaringen, parents of her royal highness the Countess d'Flandre, and at which, besides the three royal families, all the heads of foreign missions here and many of the high dignitaries of the country were present.

As the invitation on its face bore the usual designation for ceremonious occasion, "en uniforme," I deemed it proper, in view of the comment which has been excited over the "unavoidable circumstances" which were announced as preventing our minister in a neighboring country from being present at court on the invitations of the sovereign, to say in my reply of acceptance to the grand marshal that my diplomatic uniform was now citizen's dress.

The 70 guests all wore the uniforms prescribed by their respective courts; the servants were, of course, in livery; the only person, therefore, in plain clothes was the representative of the United States, who was received by his Majesty with his usual kindness, and was treated by the court with as much respect and courtesy, I presume, as if he had worn a coat embroidered with gold, or one, like Joseph's, "of many colors."

I have to crave your indulgence for referring to a subject in itself trivial, but to which the clamorous perversity or ignorance of some of our countrymen has given undue importance, where it would otherwise have been taken as a matter of course by those who are popularly supposed to have most interest in the matter, viz: foreign governments. No European official of rank, I will venture to say, has ever, as such, presumed to call in question the right, nay, more, propriety of our government's prescribing, as all other governments do, the costume which, in accordance with its usages, the representatives of the United States shall wear on official occasions, much less of those representatives conforming thereto. I have never known such exception to be taken during my twenty-one years' experience abroad. Newspaper gossip at home has been reprinted and circulated in Europe, exciting comment, and thus it has happened that since Secretary Marcy's circular of June, 1853, the subject has been frequently referred to in my presence, and with the result above indicated; and more, for I have heard the principle generally commended, and also by representatives of nearly every European power, as being in keeping with our institutions and practice at home, and more dignified than the varied fancy costumes adopted by some of our ministers abroad.

In conclusion, I venture to express the hope that this subject, again made conspicuous, may now be finally and forever set at rest by legislation or instructions which will leave no loophole for shirking or perversion; and if the law were so amended as to admit of no exception in favor of ex-officers of the army, it would add to the uniformity in dress on official occasions of our representatives and make it more in keeping with its civil character, and can detract in no way from the influence or consideration of our ministers.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,
H. S. SANFORD.

SIR: The Moniteur of this morning contains in the part headed "non-official" a communication, including several documents therein referred to, relating to the difficulties existing between this government and Mecklenburg-Schwerin, by reason of the non-payment by the latter of the quota ascribed to it in the capitalization and extinguishment of the Scheldt dues.

It may be remembered by the department that Mecklenburg did not take part in the treaty of 1863, and its vessels coming into Belgian ports have since, under the terms of the law of 13th June, 1863, authorizing the King to make the treaty, had an additional tax of five francs imposed upon them.

Long and fruitless negotiations have followed, during which Mecklenburg proposed to the equivalent of 600,000 francs net in lieu of the 1,036,320 francs established at the outset as its share on the basis paid by the other powers.

She has now become a member of the Germanic Confederation, and as such its ships bear its flag. They are, however, still subjected to verification and the payment of the tax in Belgian ports, and the subject has been brought before the German federal council by this government, and is still pending there, this government declaring that it cannot recognize the flag of the North German Confederation, save with the reserve of assuring itself that it does not cover Mecklenburg vessels. * *

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Brussels, May 27, 1868.

SIR: I have already taken occasion to refer to the act pending in the Belgian Parliament touching extradition.

It became a law on the 5th ultimo, and I have the honor to inclose herewith a translation of the same.

By the first article the government may deliver up to foreign governments, on condition of reciprocity, any foreigner indicted, accused, or convicted by the courts of said countries for any of the numerous acts specified in the subsequent articles.

The manner of extradition, transit, provisional arrest, limitation, acts of Belgian citizens and of naturalized citizens, are treated in the following articles, and I beg to call the attention of the department to this important law, the more particularly in view of the fact that we have no extradition treaty with Belgium.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,
H. S. SANFORD.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

EXTRADITION LAW.

Leopold II, King of the Belgians, to all present and to come, greeting:

The houses have adopted and we sanction what follows:

ARTICLE I.

The government may deliver up to the governments of foreign countries, on condition of reciprocity, any foreigner indicted, accused, or convicted by the courts of said countries, for any of the acts hereafter enumerated that may have been committed on their territory:

1. Murder, poisoning, parricide, infanticide, manslaughter, rape.
2. Arson.
3. Forgery, or counterfeiting public stock or bank notes, public or private titles, issuing or circulating such forged or counterfeit stocks, notes, or titles, forgery in writing or in telegraphic dispatches, and using such forged, counterfeit, or falsified dispatches, stock notes or titles.
4. Coining, including counterfeit and adulteration of coin, issuing or circulating counterfeit or adulterated coin, as well as fraud in the choice of samples for the verifying of the standard and weight of coin.
5. False witness and false declarations of appreciators or interpreters.
6. Robbery, swindling, peculation, embezzlement committed by public functionaries.
7. Fraudulent bankruptcy, and frauds committed in bankruptcies.
8. Associations of malefactors.
9. For threats of violence against persons or property, punishable by the pain of death, hard labor, or confinement.
10. Abortion.
11. Bigamy.
12. Acts of violence against individual liberty and the inviolability of the dwelling of persons.
13. Abduction, concealing, suppression, substitution, or supposition of children.
14. Exposing or abandoning children.
15. Abduction of minors.
16. Outrage on chastity committed with violence.
17. Outrage on chastity committed without violence on the person of a child of either sex, under 14 years of age.
18. Outrage against morals by exciting, facilitating, or habitually favoring to satisfy the passions of others; debauchery or corruption of minors of either sex.
19. Blows given, or wounds inflicted wilfully, with premeditation, or having caused a disease apparently incurable, a permanent disability of personal labor, the loss of the absolute use of an organ, or death without the intention of causing it.
20. Abuse of confidence, and deceit.
21. Tampering with witnesses, experts, or interpreters.
22. Perjury.
23. Counterfeiting or falsifying seals, stamps, and marks, using counterfeit or false seals, stamps, and marks; and using for hurtful purposes real seals, stamps, and marks.
24. Bribery of public functionaries.

25. Destruction of buildings, steam engines, or telegraphic apparatus; destruction or damaging of tombs, monuments, works of art, documents or other papers; destruction or damaging of produce, merchandise, or other movable property, and opposition to the execution of public works.

26. Destruction or damaging of crops, plantations, trees, or grafts.

27. Destruction of agricultural implements, destruction or poisoning of cattle or other animals.

28. Abandoning by the captain, except in cases provided by the law, of a ship, or trading or fishing boat.

29. Running aground, loss, destruction by the captain or officers and crew, turning astray by the captain of a ship or trading or fishing boat, throwing overboard or destroying without necessity of the whole or part of the cargo, victuals or effects on board, false direction, borrowing without necessity on the body, victualing or equipping of the ship, pledging or selling the merchandise or victuals, or making use in the accounts of supposed damages or expenses, sale of the ship without special power except in the case of unnavigability, unloading merchandise without previous report, except in case of imminent peril, robbery committed on board, adulteration of victuals or merchandise committed on board by the mixture of noxious substances, violent attack or resistance against the captain by more than one-third of the crew, refusal to obey the captain or commanding officer for the safety of the ship or cargo, with blows and wounds, plot against the safety, liberty or authority of the captain, capture of the ship by the sailors or passengers by fraud or violence against the captain.

ARTICLE II.

Extradition shall only be granted on production either of the judgment or sentence of condemnation, or of the order of the chamber of council, of the decree of the court of indictment, or of the deed of prosecution proceeding from the competent judge, formally decreeing or lawfully committing the prisoner or accused before the repressive jurisdiction, the said documents delivered in the original or in authentic copy, and after having taken the opinion of the indicting chamber of the court of appeal in the jurisdiction of which the foreigner shall have been arrested. The trial shall be public unless the foreigner ask for closed doors.

The public accuser and the foreigner shall be heard; the latter may be assisted by counsel.

Within a fortnight after the reception of the documents, they shall be forwarded, with reasons in full, to the minister of justice.

ARTICLE III.

Extradition by means of transit over the Belgian territory may, nevertheless, be granted without taking the opinion of the indicting chamber, on the mere production in original or in authentic copy of one of the deeds of prosecution mentioned in the preceding article whenever it shall be required by a foreign state, for the advantage of a foreign state, both bound to Belgium by a treaty comprising the infraction giving rise to the demand of extradition. and when it shall not be forbidden by Article 6 of the law of October 1, 1833, and Article 7 of the present law.

ARTICLE IV.

The foreigner may be arrested provisionally in Belgium for one of the acts mentioned in Article 1, on the exhibition of a warrant issued by the competent foreign authority and rendered executory by the chamber of council of the tribunal of first instance of his place of residence or of the place where he may be found, and, in case of urgency, on the exhibition of a warrant issued by the judge of instruction of his place of residence or of the place where he may be found, and substantiated by an official notice given to the Belgian authorities by the authorities of the territory where the crime or offense has been committed. Nevertheless, in that case, he shall be set at liberty if, within the delay of ten days, reckoning from his arrest, when the latter shall have been operated at the request of the government of a contiguous country, and within the delay of three weeks, when of that of a distant country, he does not receive communication of the warrant, issued by the competent authority. After the order or arrest, the judge of instruction is authorized to proceed according to the rules prescribed by Articles 87 to 90 of the code of criminal instruction.

The foreigner may claim to be set at provisional liberty in cases wherein a Belgian enjoys that faculty, and under the same conditions. The claim shall be submitted to the chamber of council.

The chamber of council shall also decide, after hearing the foreigner, whether there be reason or not to transmit, wholly or in part, the papers and other objects seized to the foreign government asking for the extradition. It shall order the restitution of papers and other objects not directly connected with the act imputed to the accused.

ARTICLE V.

The foreigner provisionally arrested shall be set at liberty if, within two months, he does not receive notice, either of a judgment or sentence of condemnation, or of an order of the chamber of council, a decree of the indicting chamber, or a deed of criminal prosecution issued by the competent judge, formally decreeing or lawfully committing the accused for trial before the repressive jurisdiction.

ARTICLE VI.

The treaties concluded, in virtue of the present law, shall be inserted in the Moniteur; they cannot be carried into effect until ten days after the date borne by that journal.

ARTICLE VII.

Extradition cannot take place if, since the imputed act, prosecution or condemnation, prescription of the action, or of the penalty is acquired according to the laws of Belgium.

ARTICLE VIII.

Articles 2 and 3 of the law of December 30, 1836, on the repression of crimes and offenses committed by Belgians abroad, are applicable to the infractions provided for by Article 1 of the present law.

ARTICLE IX.

They are likewise applicable to infractions in matter of forest; country, or fishery.

ARTICLE X.

The foreigner who, after committing, out of the territory of the kingdom, any of the infractions provided for by Article 1 of the law of December 30, 1836, and by Articles 1 and 9 of the present law, shall acquire or recover his quality of a Belgian citizen, may, if he is in Belgium, be there prosecuted, tried and punished according to the laws of the kingdom, within the limits determined by the said law of December 30, 1836.

ARTICLE XI.

The law of July 7, 1865, relative to foreigners, is moreover applicable to the foreigner residing in Belgium who has been prosecuted or condemned abroad for any of the infractions provided for by Article 1 of the present law.

ARTICLE XII.

The disposition of the law of October 1, 1833, with the exception of Article 6, are abrogated.

We promulgate the present law, order it to be sealed with the seal of the state, and published through the medium of the Moniteur.

Given at Brussels April 5, 1868.

SIR: The house of representatives adjourned sine die on the 18th. The senate is now in session, but has about terminated its labors.

The only act of special importance of this Parliament is the law for the reorganization of the army, reported to you at the time of its passage.

On the 9th proximo elections take place to provide for the removal of one-half the members of the house, where terms expire at that date. There is nothing to indicate any change of importance in the present condition of parties. The provincial elections which were held four days ago would so imply. Great interest was felt in those elections at Antwerp, and there appears to have been expectation on the part of the liberals that a change would be wrought in the representation of that city. The result, as indicating that the local and persistent opposition to the government that has characterized the representation of Antwerp is to be continued, is, I have not doubt, a source of considerable disappointment to it.

SIR: The Franklin arrived at Flushing yesterday, and Admiral Farragut is expected at Antwerp to-morrow on a steamer sent down by this government to conduct him up the river.

On receiving word from Lisbon of his intended visit, I requested Mr. Vanderstichelin to inform his Majesty, who had previously expressed to me the pleasure it would give him to receive the admiral, and to-day the grand marshal of the court has called to invite him and twenty-five of his officers to dine with his Majesty on Monday.

The Ticonderoga is expected at Antwerp in two or three days.

SIR: Admiral Farragut arrived here on the 8th, and with his staff and other officers dined with the King at the palace on the same evening. All the members of the cabinet were present, with this legation, at the beautiful banquet given in honor of that gallant commander. On the following day the admiral went, by invitation, with his staff, Captain Wyman of the Ticonderoga, and Mrs. Farragut, to breakfast at the palace at Laeken, where they were received by the Queen, who was not present at the entertainment at Brussels, where I also accompanied them with my family.

Last evening the ministers of the Crown, the high officials of the court, and the representatives of those countries where the admiral has been received with especial courtesy, met him at dinner at this legation.

To-day he has left for Leip to visit some of the manufacturing establishments there, and he proceeds thence to visit the steel works at Essen, expecting to be back here in time to receive the King on board the Franklin off Ostend, about the 22d instant.

The most cordial desire has been manifested on the part of his Majesty and the officials of the government to treat the admiral with due consideration and make his stay here pleasant.

The Ticonderoga, which reached Antwerp on the 10th, is still lying in the Scheldt before that city.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,
H. S. SANFORD.

SIR: The King and Queen, accompanied by all the members of the cabinet save one, and by several of the foreign ministers, members of the royal household, &c., went down by special train to Ostend yesterday morning and visited the Franklin and Ticonderoga, which had come off that port for their reception.

Their Majesties were received by Admiral Farragut and his officers with due courtesy and attention, and after spending several hours on his ship witnessing various exercises, target practice, &c., and partaking of lunch, returned to Brussels. I accompanied them, and their Majesties expressed to me repeatedly and most heartily the pleasure which the visit and the cordial and hospitable reception they received had given them.

The ships left this morning for Southampton. The visits of our ships of war to Belgian waters produce an excellent effect, and they are cordially welcomed by the authorities and people now as they were during the war, when the ports of neighboring states were practically closed to them. I hope their visits will be continued.

SIR: I have not heretofore felt called upon to make mention of the rumors touching a projected Belgo-French Customs Union, which have, of late, occupied the French press, but the prominence the subject has acquired in the public mind leads me now to refer to it.

I have reason to believe that no propositions or overtures looking to such a transaction have been made to this government by that of the Emperor Napoleon. It is not, however, a new question, but has been the object of careful examination by the two governments at various times under various administrations during the reign of Louis Philippe.

The same reasons that prevented carrying out the project then, would, doubtless, be quite as potent now. The political concessions to France, such as jurisdiction of French tribunals and authorities in customs matters and the exercise by French custom-house officials of their functions in Belgium, which were expected in return for the advantages that, in a commercial and industrial point of view, would be on the side of that power, with the more extended market for their products, would hardly be granted by this government or acceded to by the people.

The persistency of the rumors would seem to indicate that the public mind is being prepared for some movement of the kind on the part of France; my opinion is, that if made, it will not be successful.

There are those here, and I lean to their opinion, who ascribe the agitation of this subject to the war party at Paris, which is powerful and grows more active and openly enterprising as the colossal military preparations of France approach their completion, and who appear to be on the alert for a foreign question to work upon.

While the press here is generally silent with regard to the possible disturbance of peace by France, there is not, among thinking men whom I come in contact with, entire freedom from apprehension on that score.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

H. S. SANFORD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Copenhagen, February 12, 1868.

SIR: An interesting question discussed at the present session of the Danish Rigsdag has been the proposal to introduce and adopt the trial by jury for the administration of justice in criminal causes and political offenses. Here, as in France and some other countries of Europe, the custom is adhered to of questioning the accused, a practice so inadmissible under the reasoning of the common law. And here, in the ancient cradle of the jury system, the accused depends upon the judges before whom he is tried for his acquittal or condemnation. The jury system, which had been falling into desuetude for some time previous, almost entirely disappears from the Danish code of 1683. The present course of justice in Denmark is so careful, painstaking, and in the main so impartial and satisfactory, that the proposal to restore trial by jury is believed not to be made so much with the expectation of improving its administration, as on account of the supposed value of the trial by jury as a political element and safeguard. The party of advanced liberalism in Europe are not mere levellers, indiscriminating and frantic worshippers of equality, suffrage, and democracy. Many of them are learned jurists, duly conservative as well as liberal. They know the political influence which trial by jury has exercised in developing, and, at times, saving liberty in the countries where that mode of trial had been introduced by Scandinavian invaders and immigrants many centuries ago; and it would now be a curious historical incident, an almost unexampled restoration of a jurisprudential polity once changed or abandoned, if Denmark should now borrow or rehabilitate that which she had given to others and lost to herself.

The new constitution of Denmark, adopted in 1866, provides for trial by jury in criminal causes and political offences. The French text in the published translation authorized by government is: "Le jury sera appliqué en matière criminelle et pour les délits politiques." I can form no opinion of the original Danish text, but it appears that the present government regards the constitutional provision as enabling, as being a grant of legislative power, and not as an obligatory command. The cabinet feel disinclined to sudden and material alterations in the forms and means of judicial procedure, alterations which certainly should be received with great caution in every country, and, without rejecting the proposal to introduce trial by jury, they do not feel prepared to indorse any formulation of it which has been offered, and while there is a considerable party advocating the measure in the Rigsdag, it seems probable that no proposition can be adopted without ministerial support. The discussion has ended in such way as to indicate that nothing more will be done this session.

The jury system, in different forms, can be traced among the Gothic Scandinavian nations as far back as there is any authentic history or tradition of their institutions. It is not improbable that the germs of it were brought from central western Asia, between the north bank of the Indus and the eastern shore of the Caspian sea, as a tribal institution, by the followers of Odin. This can never be known with certainty, though contended for by learned scholars. But it is known that for centuries after the arrival of these fierce, liberty-loving people in northern Europe, personal combat and vengeance, family and hereditary feuds, natural and individual warfare, were so common as to be deemed an evil even by tribes who deemed it disgraceful for a man to die a natural death—falling in war being the surest admittance to their mythological heaven. The “price” paid for wounds and various other injuries, the origin of our fines and damages, and the judgments of the “Things,” said to derive their name from the function of speaking or pronouncing, are the first rude points around which civil law and social order, as distinguished from organizations for predatory warfare, began to form themselves, and by means of which the unbridled natural remedy of personal warfare was gradually taken from the individual and consolidated into the right and duty of society to punish for all offences. Things were of different sorts; some political, some judicial, but more generally, as the Althing, combining the two capacities. The judicial Thing was nearly always composed of men who acted both as witnesses and jurors, being preferred on account of their knowledge of the facts, though the requisite qualifications of disinterestedness, and being a “housekeeper,” are as old as the faintest lights of northern history.

These Gothic Things, so long existing among the Normans, Danes, Jutes and Angles of Scandinavia, (all of whom may correctly be called either Goths or Norsemen,) the custom of selecting “good men,” at first to hear the law recited and then decide the facts, but later to decide both law and facts, then to declare or ascertain the law, then again to amend the law, to “swear” (adjudge) the truth in disputed cases, and at times to grant, not to levy taxes or subsidies, are indisputably the origin of the English and American grand and petit juries, and are nearly as plainly the mother germ from which has sprung our entire system of organized representative government. The convention or parliament of selected twelve, called by the conqueror to ascertain and authenticate the Saxon laws in force previous to his advent, the House of Commons, Congress, every State legislature, every township council or board, are the political fruits of this ancient Gothic institution. The ethnological term “Anglo-Saxon” may be correct enough for general designation when applied to the mass of the people of England and the United States; but as a political term applicable to English and American institutions, it is not accurate. The Saxons were certainly allied, both in blood and institutions, to the pure Goths of Scandinavia. But among the Saxons on the continent, and even among the Anglo-Saxons when they had succeeded the Romans on the island, there was more of aristocracy, more of slavery, less of the jury system, less of vox populi than existed during the same ages among the Northmen, Danes and Jutes, and who, by their irruptions, settlements and temporary conquests, planted their institutions among the people of England. As an institutional or political term, Anglo-Gothic, Anglo-Norman or Anglo-Scandinavian, would either of them be more accurate than Anglo-Saxon.

The unanimity required in the verdicts of English and American juries was not required among the Gothic nations, where majorities rendered the verdict, except among the Normans after they went to Normandy in France, but was very probably borrowed from that other and quite different institution, the “wager of law,” by which the accused could acquit himself by procuring a certain number of men, selected by himself, to swear unanimously that he was not guilty, which generally meant that they did not believe he was guilty, a form of trial made more common among the Saxons than the jury, and was also known in Scandinavia, where it was not deemed so "lawful;" that is, not having so much of the force of a law as the verdict of a jury had.

In Sweden the jury exists to-day as it has for a thousand years or more. A verdict is given by one-half the jury, or any greater proportion, and the judge, or by a unanimous jury against the opinion of the judge, there being no verdict when a majority are opposed to a minority and the judge. From Norway the jury was carried by emigrants in the ninth and tenth centuries to Iceland, and by Rollo and his followers to Normandy. In the Sagas, the repositories of the history, the law, the tragedy, the poetry and the literature of the Icelandic republic, the freest and most cultivated community of the dark ages, there are regularly reported trials a century before Hastings was fought, and several centuries older than the oldest Year Book of English cases. In these curious and mixed records the summons of the jury, arraigning the accused or the defendant in a civil action, challenge of the panel, challenge for cause, the declaration, pleas, demurrers, non-suits, outlawry and shrewd objections to the competency of witnesses and of evidence, all distinctly appear, delivered orally by men learned and renowned in the land. The replication, the rejoinder, the rebutter and sur-rebutter do not appear, but enough is seen to indicate unmistakably where our system of common-law pleadings comes from. It is known that some of the neighboring provinces and cities in France borrowed their intricate but accurate pleadings from Normandy, while the Normans were learning to dress their own law and pleas in the rude French dialect of that province, the conquerors, as usual, imposing their own laws and learning a new language.

If the jury system of Scandinavia has not performed the pointed part which it occasionally has in England, as in the trial of the seven bishops and the prosecution of the publisher of the North Briton, No. 45, it has yet sown the seeds from which have sprung and been slowly developed all the most valuable of modern political institutions. In most of the states we have discarded the English custom of the judges "summing up," sometimes artful, sometimes insolent, generally fair, and seldom of any real service to justice. We could now consider whether absolute unanimity may not safely be dispensed with; whether, after all, the value of the jury is not mainly political and not judicial; whether it is not less a necessity in a perfectly free community than in one composed of the three orders; whether its functions have not in great part been discharged, and that in future it is to be simply a preservation and safeguard instead of a forming and guiding influence—that is, whether its future function is not conservative instead of progressive, and therefore whether we may not well limit its application to penal, criminal, and political causes and actions arising in tort, leaving all matters of account, contract, title, and estates to the courts.

I beg your pardon for the great length of this paper. Strict official duty did not require it; but in giving an account of an interesting question here, confessedly of a semi-political character, I was naturally led into some observations upon the origin and history, the uses and defects, of the jury system.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. H. YEAMAN.

No. 135.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Copenhagen, February 18, 1868.

SIR: I pursue in this dispatch a subject kindred to the one treated in my last. Since 1795 there has been in operation in Denmark a judicial institution of a peculiar and important character, some account of which must have an interest for those accustomed to study the administration of justice.

The bench and the bar of England and the United States have long ceased to accept our fabric of common law and equity as a perfect system of reason, or of justice based on reason, and have sought to enrich it, supply its defects, and mould it into a system at once symmetrical and plastic, by bringing to its aid the reasoning and the rules of other systems and codes, especially of the Roman civil law. While attention is now perhaps sufficiently awake to the importance of this, it is possible we have not derived that benefit which we might have obtained by studying more closely the judicial machinery also of other enlightened states.

The Danish institution to which I refer has given such entire satisfaction, has so thoroughly proved its value by its working and its results, that neither the government nor the people could now be persuaded to renounce it. Its name may best be translated, and its functions best described, in the English language by calling it the court of reconciliation. It is not arbitration and award, it is not simple accord, and it is not purely a judicial court, because the judgment rendered is always based on consent.

In Copenhagen, it is composed of one judge, who is a member or justice of the regular court of superior and appellate jurisdiction, and two assistants, generally members of the city government or administration. In the provinces or country districts, it is composed of the judge of the regular court of superior jurisdiction, and two assistants who are non-professional citizens. Before this tribunal, thus composed, every cause, great or small, every complaint upon which a civil action may be based, is required to be brought and heard before any litigation, properly so called, can be had upon it in the regular courts of justice of compulsory jurisdiction. Those courts have no power to hear and determine, and, the objection being made, will dismiss any action, unless it appears that the cause has been heard in the court of reconciliation, and that the advice there given has not resulted in an understanding or a judgment by consent.

The substance of the proceeding is that the complaining party lodges a plain, untechnical statement of his complaint in the court of reconciliation, where both parties are then required to appear at an early day, in person and without counsel, and generally without witnesses, though when deemed necessary witnesses are heard. I am not familiar with the process of procuring the attendance of the defendant or party complained of, nor if his attendance is discretionary, with the full effect of his willful absence after notice or citation. But the disadvantage of having the cause heard in his absence and stated by the adverse party only, and the certainty that the complainant would at least be allowed to litigate the case in the courts of compulsory jurisdiction, seem amply sufficient to secure attendance.

In court, face to face, the parties state their own cause, and are also questioned by the judge so far as he thinks necessary. This generally closes the examination of the case, but the court can allow or require witnesses to be called. The court having thus acquired the facts as far as agreed upon, and the statement of each party upon disputed matters, as well as other evidence when it is deemed requisite, the judge carefully explains to the parties the law which he thinks applicable to the case, and explains what he deems the strict legal right; and then the whole court, upon the whole case, legal and moral, make such suggestions, and give to the parties such advice, as is deemed appropriate in the premises. Having heard this advice, it is entirely optional with the parties to adopt it or not. They may adopt it exactly as given, or they may reject it entirely and come to no agreement; or they may come to an agreement entirely of their own making, or to one based in part on the views of the court and in part upon their own conclusions. If no agreement or reconciliation is reached, that fact is announced and noted of record, and the parties go their way, with perfect liberty to abandon the matter or to put it in course of regular litigation. But if an agreement is had, that agreement, whether it be that the matter is reconciled and abandoned, or that one party recovers of the other, is entered as the judgment of the court, is final, and is in all respects as binding and efficient as the judgment of any other court. Execution may go upon it, and it may be pleaded in complete bar of any other or further proceedings for the same complaint or cause of action.

The theoretical criticisms which can be made, from the common law point of view, upon a tribunal thus organized, are sufficiently apparent. Besides these there is another objection which, relating only to the organization of the court, would be easily remedied; that is, that the judge who presides over the court of reconciliation ought not to be the judge or a member of the court of coercive justice, before which the matter may be afterwards litigated, as he might carry into the hearing there some feeling of stringency, if not of harshness, against a party who, in the judge's opinion, may have perversely or in bad temper resisted all efforts to adjust the matter in dispute in accordance with the advice of the court of reconciliation. But all theoretical criticism seems unavailing in the presence of the facts, in view of the practical operation of the court and of the universal satisfaction which it has given. It has in a wonderful degree simplified the adjustment of disputes, lessened litigation and lessened the cost, both in time and money, of the administration of justice, while its judgments are felt to be as satisfactory in the main as those reached after the most tedious and costly litigation. The most astonishing feature of its operation is the number of judgments, in proportion to the whole number of cases heard, which the court renders.

The Foreign Office has furnished me with a tabular statement, herewith inclosed, of the statistics of this court from the year 1860 to 1864, inclusive. By reference to section No 1 of this statement, it will be seen that the total number of appearances or causes presented to the court throughout Denmark for the five years named was 183,628: of which were reconciled and adjudged 123,897; postponed, or continued for further hearing, 2,544; permission given for further and formal litigation in other courts, 57,187; actually litigated, 25,967. Thus only about one-seventh of the disputes arising in the kingdom being finally and formally litigated in the courts of law. These statistics, when compared with our own mode of litigation, may be in some degree misleading. It is quite possible that parties may often take before this friendly, expeditious, and inexpensive tribunal disputes which in its absence they would not venture or would not care to litigate, just as good legal advice and friendly offices sometimes prevent litigation in other countries. Yet there is enough in these figures to excite the curiosity and even the admiration of jurists and statesmen. By examining the numbers, which are given separately for each of the five years named, it will be found that while the whole number of cases brought to the courts of reconciliation is decreasing, the proportion determined there is increasing; this proportion is always considerably over half of the whole number heard, while of the number which, by the result in this court, may be further and regularly litigated, considerably less than half are actually so litigated. These results are more than satisfactory. They are a serious and important lesson to other peoples.

Section 6 of the same table gives the statistics of this court for the Danish West Indies for the same years, from which it will be seen that the number of cases in those dependencies was 2,408: reconciled and adjudged, 1,700; permitted to go to further suit, 708; of these last were actually litigated, 281.

These figures, showing the operation of the institution in a remote and isolated part of the kingdom, with a population almost entirely different, while giving results slightly more favorable even than in Denmark proper, give the same general showing, and very nearly in the same proportions, which would seem to indicate that there is something in the working of the system which would everywhere tend to produce the same general results.

GEO. H. YEAMAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Copenhagen, March 6, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches to No. 81, of the 18th February, inclusive.

Touching political affairs here, very lively interest and discussion have been excited by a proposed law amending the organization of the established church. By constitutional recognition the Lutheran is the established church, and the constitution or organization of this national church is required to be regulated by law. But liberty of dissent is complete, and every citizen has the right to unite with any society or communion for divine worship, according to his own conviction, subject only to the restriction that their doctrines are not contrary to good morals and public order.

The clergymen of the several parishes and congregations of the Lutheran church are appointed by the authority and under the superintendence of government. The principal feature of the change now proposed is, that whenever in any parish 20 or more families unite in the desire to select their own pastor and of themselves form a congregation for religious worship and teaching, they may do so, but without thereby dissolving their connection with the Lutheran or established church, and may continue, as constituent parts of that church, to be entitled to all the rights and privileges, civil and ecclesiastical, of its membership.

This has given rise to very animated discussions among the people, who are divided upon it, about as would be natural to expect, viewing it in its political aspects; among the bishops, who are nearly all opposed to it; by the public press, which is nearly unanimous for it; and in the Rigsdag, where it has passed the Folkething by a large majority, and where it meets with very great opposition on the Landsthing.

The cabinet are united in its support, not so much, I think, on account of the importance they attach to it, as on account of the belief that it is harmless if not advantageous, and that making this concession now may prevent further agitation and other demands much more serious. It has been, so far, made a ministerial measure, and therefore a cabinet question, that the continuance in office of the present ministry appeared to depend in a large measure, if not directly, upon the adoption or rejection of the law by the Landsthing. But recently the minister of religion and instruction, under whose special charge the measure falls, has, owing to his very feeble health, tendered his resignation, which the King will probably accept, and then the matter will not likely be further urged until the selection and nomination of another minister of similar views. * * * * *

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: Captain T. Morris Chester, the corresponding secretary of the Garnet League "for the education and religious elevation of the freedmen," has recently visited Copenhagen in the prosecution of his agency in soliciting pecuniary aid for the accomplishment of that humane and commendable object. He has heretofore visited England, Russia, Holland, and Hamburg, for the same purpose, and with encouraging success. Such efforts have no relation to the government, and very little to the duty of its diplomatic agents abroad, their action in the matter being more an affair of disposition and choice than of official duty. But I take pleasure in noting the fact that he has been received in Denmark with distinguished kindness and liberality by the people, by the chief officials of the government, and by the King, who accorded him a very friendly and interesting audience. And this favorable reception here was not merely or entirely personal to him, as an intelligent and cultivated man, as the representative in blood and race of a people still laboring under the effects of their late condition, but it has also been the expression of a very lively interest in the labor to which he devotes himself. He has, in this community, reflected credit upon the people from whom he is sprung and whose cause he pleads, and his visit has brought to view in this capital a kind and enlightened interest in their development and elevation. That such views should so rapidly attain throughout the most civilized parts of the world must be as pleasing to the government of the United States as it is encouraging to a newly emancipated people.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Copenhagen, April 29, 1868.

SIR: On the 22d instant Count Frijs, president of the council and minister for foreign affairs, indicated definitively to the Landsting that the cabinet would feel bound to offer their resignation in the event of the rejection of the ecclesiastical law, of which I gave an account in my No. 136, of the 6th March; and for several days it seemed very doubtful what the result would be, and seemed probable that the law could pass only by the silence or absence of some of its opponents. Now, however, an amendment of the law has been agreed to in the Landsting which partially satisfies both parties—at least is accepted as a compromise—and which the opposition prefer to a dissolution of the cabinet, by which the right is not made absolute for 20 families to organize a congregation for worship, and to select their own pastor, but the power is vested in government to grant such privilege at its discretion, on application being made. This, for the present, settles the controversy in the Landsting; but the amendment makes it necessary that the law shall go back for approval, in this amended form, by the Folkething. Should this approval be obtained, of which there seems at present but little doubt, all immediate anxiety on account of a dissolution of the present government will be relieved.

Some weeks ago the King was petitioned by several of the most prominent members of the Folkething to consolidate the two ministries of war and marine, placing them both under the direction of one minister, by which it was claimed the management of the army and navy would be more economical, more harmonious, and more energetic. The scheme was indorsed by a vote of the Folkething, but up to this time the King has taken no action upon it. I am satisfied, indeed I may state, that the cabinet do not favor the measure; and as they have probably expressed this opinion or advice to the King, it may be predicted that he will not grant the prayer of the petitioners.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Copenhagen, August 24, 1868.

SIR: By the treaty of Vienna, terminating the duchy war of 1863-'64 between Denmark and Germany, and by the provisions of which Schleswig and Holstein were ceded to Prussia and Austria, it was stipulated that they should pay to Denmark an amount equal to that proportion of the Danish public debt which should be to the whole debt as the two duchies were to the whole kingdom of Denmark before the war. The amount was to be ascertained by commissioners, who afterwards stated it at 29,000,000 rigsdalers. When by the treaty of Prague Austria ceded her interest in the duchies to Prussia, the duty of performing this stipulation of the treaty of Vienna naturally devolved on Prussia. Accordingly the payment of the whole amount of 29,000,000 has recently been completed, having been heretofore partially effected. The payment was made principally in two forms: in Russian four per cent. stocks, and in such securities representing the Danish debt as were found in the hands of charitable, educational, and monetary institutions in the two duchies, and for which Prussia substituted her own securities—the policy of this measure being, no doubt, to identify the interests of the duchies more perfectly with Prussia. The payment to Denmark has been made without reference to other questions pending between the two governments, and has no relation to any further steps in the negotiation about the fulfillment of the fifth article of the treaty of Prague, providing for a vote of the people of North Schleswig to ascertain whether they would remain with Prussia or return to Denmark.

SIR: Yesterday the Rigsdag voted an address in response to and in harmony with the King's speech at the opening of that body. In the Landsting, or upper chamber, the vote was unanimous. In the Folkesting, or lower house, it was moved to amend so as simply to congratulate the King on the betrothal of the crown prince with the princess of Sweden, without expressing any expectation of great and beneficial results from this union of the two royal families; and also, in reference to the matter of North Schleswig and the treaty of Prague, to avoid the use of the word hope or its equivalent, and simply to express a desire or wish for auspicious results, without expressing or relinquishing any expectation thereof. These amendments were rejected by a vote of two to one, so that the address, as voted and presented, is in perfect accord with the royal speech. Viewing the speech as the result of ministerial advice and consultation, this action of the Rigsdag may be taken as proof of present entire harmony between the cabinet and the representatives of the people.

No. 175.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Copenhagen, November 28, 1868.

SIR: * * * There has been, for some weeks past, an unusual dearth here in political and diplomatic matter of interest to other governments, political discussions having turned almost exclusively upon internal and domestic affairs.

One of the matters which have attracted public attention here, and elicited some feeling, is a proposed amendment of the military organization seeking the abolition of the exemption from military service heretofore extended to clergymen, and requiring them to serve, as all others are now required to do, absolutely for a given length of time; the right of substitution having heretofore been abolished.

This amendment, thus affecting the clergy, is favored in the Folkething and opposed in the Landsting—votes already taken having developed so marked a discordance of opinion that it seems probable the law can only be passed, if at all, in some modified form, to be accepted by both houses as a compromise.

The measure is advocated and urged by what is known here as the agricultural party, their representatives in the Rigsdag being sometimes familiarly spoken of as the "peasants," and with us would be called small farmers. Indeed, peasants, properly so called, and as known in the past, can hardly be said to exist any longer in this kingdom.

Rigid as the proposed law may appear, it has its hopeful aspect, and its humane as well as its political and military significance. The exemption of the clergy from military service could only be abolished because such service being deemed onerous and unpleasant, as the duty to render it is deemed of universal obligation, the exemption is found to be a special favor and benefit, and war being both disagreeable and onerous, such favor or benefit derived from the exemption is deemed an inequality. In other words, war, if sometimes a duty, is always a hardship, and exemption from it is considered as valuable and as unequal as any other special privileges, or as the exemption from any other dangerous and disagreeable thing would be.

Thus the proposal of such a law, while bearing upon its face the appearance of a most stringent military measure, may at bottom indicate a growing distaste and disinclination for war, and may be one of the many indirect forms in which that humane aversion is now manifesting itself in many parts of the world. The character, habits, interests, and instincts of the party urging the measure here would seem to support this view as to one of its meanings. Its local political indication is made greater by the fact that the church is a government establishment, though Protestant, and the clergymen are practically commissioned government officers.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. H. YEAMAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lisbon, January 3, 1868.

SIR: The ordinary session of the Cortes was opened yesterday by the president of the council of ministers, in the name of the King, who at the last moment determined on not going in person, as had been publicly announced.

No royal address was delivered, although such a document is said to have been prepared, and the ceremony was confined to the reading of a royal decree declaring the session as duly opened.

The fact was known yesterday, and the official paper contains the announcement to-day that the whole cabinet has resigned, the Duke of Loulé, formerly president of the council, having been charged with the formation of a new ministry.

The late cabinet had created great dissatisfaction among the whole population, by endeavoring to put into execution certain laws levying new taxes on articles of daily and indispensable consumption among the poorer classes, such as wine, bread, meat, rice, &c., and great opposition was made by the populations of Lisbon and Oporto especially.

In the latter town great agitation prevailed, and all the shop-keepers subject to the new tax, which commenced to be enforced on the 1st instant, shut up their stores, and obstinately and passively refused to give in any declarations for levying the tax.

In Lisbon mass meetings have taken place; the troops were called out, and in some instances, while trying to stop several deputations from going to the royal palace, charged the people, causing several casualties. It appears certain that the late ministry intended to advise the King to adjourn the Cortes till the end of February, a measure which was to have been carried into effect yesterday, after the reading of the royal address at the Cortes; but his Majesty, being well aware of the agitation in the country, refused to adopt this measure, and the cabinet resigned.

The town is still in a considerable state of ferment; the garrison is under arms in quarters, and the streets are being patrolled by mounted police, and until a new cabinet be formed and of such a nature as to insure the desired change in the obnoxious laws, the present excitement will not probably subside.

I shall have the honor of communicating any new event on this subject, the probability being that the Duke of Loulé will not succeed in forming a suitable cabinet, and either the Marquis de Sa'du Bandeira or Count d'Avila may eventually be called upon to reorganize the situation.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Lisbon, January 8, 1868.

SIR: In my dispatch No. 458, of 3d instant, I had the honor of informing the department of the resignation of the cabinet in view of the general discontentment in the country, and the extraordinary fact of a ministry resigning office with a large majority in the Parliament, and when carrying into execution some of the laws voted by the Cortes.

The Duke de Loulé and Marquis de Sa'du Brandeira, having both, although applied to, formally refused to form a cabinet, the Count d'Avila, who was Portuguese minister at Madrid, and has before acted as minister, undertook and succeeded informing a ministry on the 4th instant. * * * * *

The new cabinet presented themselves at the two houses of Parliament yesterday for the first time, and the president of council, in the name of his colleagues, declared that they would immediately propose certain modifications in the law of administrative division and the working of the law on articles of consumption, both which have been the immediate cause of general agitation.

For the present the country is quiet, and the popular political associations await, with a certain amount of reserve, the acts of the new ministry.

It is believed that, should the new cabinet not count upon a favorable vote in the Cortes to carry out their proposed measures, recourse will be had to a dissolution of the House of Deputies, and an appeal to a new general election, and such an event is more than likely to happen, as it is not to be expected that the present representatives will now be inclined to recant the laws which they voted by large majority but six or eight months back.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Lisbon, February 13, 1868.

SIR: The government of Portugal has entered into a contract with E. Meddlecot and Thomas Rumball, the former a respectable merchant long established in Lisbon, and the latter a civil engineer, for the laying down of a submarine telegraphic cable from Falmouth to Oporto, thence to one of the Azores, and finally to the coast of America, at a point not yet fixed on.

The decree of concession is dated on the 28th January last, and within eight months the plans of the lines and respective stations are to be delivered in; the government is then allowed two months for examination and approval, and two years are then granted to complete the lines to the Portuguese ports, with two years more to bring the American continent into connection.

The period of concession will be fixed by the Cortes, and rates or tariff of prices for telegrams are not to exceed the present rates of telegrams between this country and Great Britain, in proportion.

The government will, at its own expense, connect Lisbon with the station at Oporto, and is to receive a tax or bonus of one per cent. on the net proceeds of the traffic.

Although the point on the American coast where the proposed line is to be established is not yet fixed, still I consider this enterprise of sufficient importance to give the department all the information on the subject which is at present known, and I shall have the honor to transmit any and every other fact connected therewith which may transpire.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lisbon, March 24, 1868.

SIR: The general election for a new Chamber of Deputies took place on the 22d instant, as previously ordained by public decree, and the result thereof, as now ascertained, gives an immense majority of voters to the existing cabinet; and notwithstanding that, owing to the late excitement in the country, some disturbances were expected, the general result passed off without any important breach of order, and thus confirming the general aversion to the politics of the cabinet which preceded the present councillors of the Crown.

The finances of the country are still, however, in a very embarrassed condition, and recourse must eventually and naturally be had to increased taxes, in order to diminish as much as possible an enormous deficit in the public budget, and at the same time to provide for the running expenses.

The country is laboring under great distress, and the general appearance of the growing crops is very alarming, owing to a long drought; last year's crops were likewise very short, and the consequence is that much distress is being felt in the provinces; labor is becoming scarce, and government, for want of sufficient means, cannot employ the numerous bands of wandering laborers by applying them to public works in sufficient numbers to allay this serious state of things.

It will, therefore, be a difficult matter to demand increased taxes of an impoverished population, who but a few months ago got in arms to abolish a law of taxes, and were led to believe that by putting down that law no more taxes were to be expected of them.

The present government have a difficult task before them, and the measures which they propose bringing before the Cortes on their approaching session will tend to show how far they may be expected to succeed in extricating themselves from their present difficulties without danger to the peace and quiet of the country.

SIR: In my dispatch No. 467, of March 24, I had the honor of alluding to the trouble caused to the government of this country by the large number of operatives out of work, and much annoyance has been created in the town of Lisbon by demonstrations got up by certain parties here, who, under the guise of sympathy for the distressed workmen, have tried to induce disorder and confusion, causing a good deal of agitation and alarm among the population of this town. On Sunday, the 12th instant, a public political club, whose chiefs and directors have not hesitated in openly discussing the propriety of calling for a change in the ruling charter, in adopting the so-called constitution of 1838, which establishes the national guard, and insuring more extended popular liberties, got up a demonstration by collecting a mob of so-called operatives out of work, who were led to the department of the interior, and being admitted to the respective secretary of state, vociferously and in a menacing manner demanded work and relief. The military and police were called out, and about 20 of the ringleaders were arrested. The remainder broke up into small bands, and on that and the next day began demanding, and in some cases enforcing, alms from shopkeepers, the banks, and principal private banking houses. These proceedings naturally alarmed the population, as in some cases threats were not spared that forcible means would be had recourse to for obtaining relief. For a couple of days all business was stopped, stores and offices were shut up, and were it not for the energetic and efficient measures adopted by the government, serious consequences might have resulted. For the present order appears to have been established, but the government has thought proper to convene the Cortes at once, instead of waiting for the day previously fixed on, the 27th instant, and on the 15th his Majesty the King opened the session in person. I have the honor of inclosing a translation of his Majesty's speech on the occasion.

The circumstances alluded to therein, of her Majesty the Queen's departure for Italy, took place on the 12th instant. Besides intending to be present at the marriage ceremony of her brother, it is believed that her Majesty's health requires her temporary absence abroad.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

C. A. MUNRO.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Most worthy peers of the realm and messieurs deputies of the Portuguese nation:

It is always with great pleasure that I comply with the duty imposed on me by the constitutional charter of the monarchy by coming in person to open the legislative session, and to find myself in the midst of the representatives of the nation.

In virtue of an invitation from my august father-in-law, her Majesty, my esteemed spouse, has departed for Italy, there to be present at a family ceremony which is to be attended by all the princes of the royal house of Savoy.

I feel assured that the Queen's visit will afford an efficient means of binding in a still closer manner the relations of friendship now existing between the two countries, and that her Majesty's return to the kingdom will not be long delayed.

The amicable relations between my government and all foreign powers continue to exist in an unaltered form.

The extraordinary circumstances which supervened at the commencement of the year obliged me to consult the national suffrage, which responded to my appeal in complete tranquillity, at the same time that they induced my government to adopt certain measures which were beyond the ordinary limits of executive power, but urgently called for by the exigency of the moment.

I feel convinced that, in taking cognizance of these acts, you will discuss them with that impartial spirit which your enlightened judgment will naturally suggest. I consider it my duty to direct your care and attention to public instruction, especially primary education, to high roads and locomotion, and to the army and public force in general, which by its discipline and obedience has proved itself a sure guarantee of tranquillity; but, among all the subjects of public administration, the question of our finances is doubtless that which ought more particularly to call for your attention.

The secretary of the treasury will lay before you the budget of public receipts and expenditures, accompanied by a faithful account of the state of the treasury, together with the necessary proposals for an efficient administration and recovery of the revenue, for the improvement of the public credit, and for the organizing of the state finances.

Most worthy peers of the realm and messieurs deputies of the Portuguese nation, the noble mission which you are called upon to develop is worthy of you and of the confidence which the nation and I intrust to your care.

The aspirations of our country, my earnest hope and cordial desires, are that you may fully realize this confidence.

The session is opened

Mr. Munro to Mr. Seward.

No. 480.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Lisbon, July 21, 1868.

SIR: On the 13th instant the president of the council of ministers, Count d'Avila, with all his colleagues, resigned office, owing to the rejection by the council of state of certain ministerial proposals to adjourn the Cortes to November next, when opposition was anticipated to some of the financial measures, it being intended in the interval to assume discretionary or dictatorial powers, and to enforce these measures as laws, and counting on a bill of indemnity from the proposed adjourned session. Although in the voting of some less important measures lately proposed by the cabinet the Cortes showed a majority in favor of government, it would still appear that this majority could not well be counted on for carrying through the more important laws to be submitted to their consideration, and which formed an essential part of the ministerial programme.

His Majesty the King forthwith accepted the proposed resignation, and called upon the Duke de Loulé to form a new administration. After three or four days' consultation with his political friends, the duke found it impossible, under existing circumstances, to make up a cabinet, and resigned the appointment; and up to this moment, although several other eminent men who have before been at the head of the administration have been called upon, no ministry has been organized.

Although the country is enjoying tranquillity, still, as alluded to in some of my previous dispatches, it is feared that great opposition will certainly be brought forward against any laws for increased taxation. Besides a floating debt of about $13,000,000, the public budget for the year 1868-'69 shows a deficit of nearly $7,000,000 on a total amount for expenditure of about $24,000,000.

The financial position of the country is therefore precarious; and although property in this country is not taxed too high and might easily bear a higher rate, still, unfortunately, the distribution of such taxes is made with a good deal of partiality; the large landed proprietors who, in the provinces, have much local influence at election times, are made to pay little or nothing, whereas the poorer and less influential part of the population bears all the burden, and is sued and distressed for their proportion, whilst they see their powerful neighbors free of vexation or trouble on this head. It is asserted by a respectable local paper, and has not hitherto been officially denied, that the amount of taxes uncalled for by the authorities, and which may be said to represent the allowance for electioneering services, is over $4,000,000.

It would certainly require great moral courage for a cabinet of well-intentioned individuals to face and reorganize such a state of things, and no doubt this has been one of the many difficulties in finding proper parties to form the new cabinet.

The administration under Count d'Avila has not fallen under the opposition of the chambers; to the contrary, they have hitherto had a majority in their favor; consequently the opposition, not sufficiently powerful or important as a party to come forward, cannot be called upon, nor is it possessed of any programme or system, to assume the government of the country. It is hazardous, therefore, to foretell in what manner the country will resolve the problem, and this extraordinary state of suspense is beginning to cause alarm among the well-disposed part of the community.

In the neighboring country, Spain, great agitation seems to prevail; many of the most distinguished generals and eminent statesmen have been quite lately sent out of the country on a very short notice. The Queen of Spain's sister, the Duchess de Montpensier, with her husband the duke, who have for many years lived unostentatiously near Cadiz, were sent out of the country at a few hours' notice, and a Spanish frigate of war was placed at their disposal forthwith, and they entered the Tagus on the 17th instant. These distinguished parties, friends and related by family ties to the King of Portugal, continue to live on board the Spanish ship which brought them, as some of the representatives here of foreign powers have tried to represent to the King the difficulty of publicly or officially receiving these princes as such, when they have been banished from their own country. It is certain that, although they come on shore every day in a private manner, they return every evening to their ship; but it is supposed that, notwithstanding the opposition of the parties above alluded to, they will eventually be allowed to land, as Portugal, having always adopted an enlightened and liberal policy towards all foreigners who seek an asylum within its boundaries, without regard to their political creeds, will no doubt in this instance adopt the same measures which have been put in practice towards subjects of the same dynasty. It is not accurately known, here at least, what reasons existed for the prompt and severe measures recently carried out so energetically by the government of Spain; but that the conspiracy, if such existed, was planned on a large scale, and eventually would affect Portugal, is not to be doubted, and I have good reasons to know that the Portuguese government was, in a telegraphic communication from the cabinet of St. James, asked what position they proposed assuming, on view of the politic crisis in the Spanish peninsula; and that Great Britain, as one of the heaviest creditors of Portugal in the way of the large amount of Portuguese bonds and scrip held by Englishmen, and further, as one of its oldest allies, cannot and will not allow Portugal to lose any part of its territory.

Under all these circumstances it is, therefore, all important that the individuals forming the King's councillors should be men of patriotic feelings, enlightened principles, and firm resolution.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

C. A. MUNRO.

No. 484.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lisbon, September 1, 1868.

SIR: The Cortes have adjourned, after a protracted session, until January next, which necessarily insures the existence of the present ministry until that time, unless some unexpected event should happen. What may occur after the re-assembling of the chambers is difficult to predict. The House of Deputies were chosen upon an appeal to the country by means of dissolution, by one of the late predecessors of the actual president of the council, and although they sustained the principal measures of his ministry, they may or may not be reliable when new and more urgent tests shall be applied.

In truth, there is a spirit of restlessness and discontent throughout this whole peninsula, which seems to be the culmination of that dissatisfaction which has been described in my dispatches during the last three or four years particularly. What may be called a chronic disease is evidently approaching its crisis. The expedients and alteratives of the past are unequal to the grave and pressing phase of an old and obstinate disorder, which has been growing from bad to worse, and which unskillful treatment has only served to aggravate.

Three ministries have succeeded each other here in almost as many months, and a fourth can be included in less than a single year. One of them succeeded in electing a chamber of deputies after its own idea, and in an exceptional manner. Yet, when brought face to face with the "situation," it had to give way, to be followed by another, whose existence was numbered by days, which in turn yielded power to that which is now making the experiment of extricating the government from most serious embarrassments.

But there is large debt and increasing deficits to be confronted. They involve augmented taxes, and taxation, which has touched many tender points already, is here, as elsewhere, a most delicate task for any government that may have the responsibility of imposing it. The people may be told, and perhaps with literal truth, that the per capita is less in Portugal than in most other states of Europe, but they are not told at the same time that the ratio of productive industry is correspondingly less also.

Arguments, however well conceived, do not diminish public burdens; and when men who live by ill-requited labor find the necessities of life taxed beyond former experience, they do not seek for consolation in the logic which strives to prove that Portugal is more favored in this respect than various other nations.

The great obstacle to any substantial relief has been the failure to meet the real question, which must be met sooner or later. All the policy has been temporising, directed to the exigencies of the day, without seeing that the sacrifices required for the time being only accumulate the difficulties to be adjusted in the near future. Ministries cannot expect to stand which promise impossibilities.

It is clear to all observing minds that if the system of taxation here was properly re-organized, and then fairly executed, the burdens which now press most irksomely would be diminished, and abundant means would be provided for the wants of the country. The mass of the population feel that they are made to bear an undue proportion of the load, and that the great landed proprietors are a favored class, who by their fortunes and influence so shape legislation and the administration of the laws as to protect their own interests. Hence the bad spirit exhibited on several recent occasions, among a people naturally docile, patient, and tolerant, but who when roused are determined, brave, and persistent in purpose.

The events which appear to be imminent in Spain have, as might be expected, produced effect here. The same natural boundaries are common to both countries. The same chain of mountains and the same noble river mark the lines of separation between the respective territories. The languages, though entirely distinct, spring from a common origin, and are reciprocally understood. But the two peoples are entirely different in character, with the advantage greatly on the side of the Portuguese.

As I have tried to explain heretofore, the parties in this country may be said to be divided between the liberal and the more liberal, each contending for the palm of progressive liberalism as understood in Europe—in other words, constitutional government in the broad sense, the sovereign being more titular than substantial, and the governing power residing in the popular branch of the legislature. Portugal obtained this proud position, which, considering the means of education, is second to no other European power, in the hard school of civil war, from which she emerged impoverished, but enlightened and emancipated.

Spain passed through long and bloody trials without attaining the same result. Military chiefs contended for ascendancy which brought no advantage to the country, no matter which side triumphed. At length a movement is started, which seems to strike deeper than ever before, and to enlist the popular sympathy. It is not my province to comment upon that demonstration, except in so far as it may affect Portugal.

A suggestion has been thrown out, perhaps as a means of political diversion, that it might become desirable for Spain to attempt to recover the foothold which she lost in this country several hundred years ago.

The bare mention of such a proposition excited general indignation throughout this kingdom, especially as the policy of the two governments of late years has been professedly most friendly towards the independence of each other; and indeed it was believed that peculiar relations had been established between them under a recent ministry, when the Queen of Spain came to visit this court.

The advanced ideas of Portugal and its liberal politics have been urged as an example on the one hand, and as a reproach on the other, by a certain party in Spain, which has provoked not only the antagonism of the other, but the rash menaces referred to. I have never been able to realize any probability of Portugal being united to Spain by compulsion, while the possibility of an Iberian union or nation with one government has not appeared altogether improbable.

It would be hazardous to say who, in such a contingency, might become the ruler; but we are not left in doubt as to some of the expectations which are entertained if that event should soon come to pass.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES E. HARVEY.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, February 3, 1868.

SIR: The two chambers of the Diet of this government met on the 17th ultimo, at the grand hall of the palace, to be formally opened by an address from the throne. The members of the diplomatic corps were present by invitation, and every courtesy extended to them.

The address, of which enclosure No. 1 is a copy, and No. 2 a translation, was read by the King. It presents no remarkable feature to be commented upon, unless it be perhaps the acknowledgment of an extreme solicitude on the part of the government to perfect its armament by means of the latest improved breech-loading rifles, which were obtained from the United States, and to put the country generally in a better state of defense. This, as stated by the address, was rendered necessary by the increase of the armed forces in nearly all the countries of Europe.

The destitution in the north of Sweden, spoken of in the address, is very severe, yet everything has been done for the sufferers that it is possible to do, until navigation opens. The people of several of the contiguous countries sent contributions which reached the distressed district before the close of navigation, and the south of Sweden have responded nobly to the cry for relief. The government sent ships with supplies, which were first taken to the extreme northern ports and distributed as the ice drove them southward. A full knowledge of the extent of the famine did not reach me until it was too late for any relief to come from the full granaries of our country. Next spring, however, much good could be rendered them by the sympathizing benevolence of our countrymen. Yet I doubt very much if Sweden is not as able to take care of its own poor as any of the countries of Europe. This famine being confined to a single district of the kingdom, from loss of three consecutive crops, is brought more immediately, in all its terrible details, to the notice of the world than as though the suffering were general throughout an entire country. Therefore, while we sympathize with the poverty here, we overlook an equal amount at present existing in almost every country in Europe.

Sweden, with its rich agricultural south, and vast northern mineral resources, under an enterprising development which has recently inspired capitalists and laborers to greater exertions, is able to sustain three times its present number of inhabitants.

There is a noticeable increase of liberal sentiment evinced by a large, and perhaps the controlling political party of the country, which if carried very much further in the direction of democracy, will soon leave but the shadow of past royal prerogatives for the throne, and make the line of demarcation between a monarchical and republican form of government so dim as to be inconsistent with either.

In diplomatic circles, the difference between our government and England, arising from the Alabama and other claims, is often the subject of conversation. There is but one expression, which is, that England would not be justified in jeopardizing the political and commercial interests of the whole world by refusing an indemnity, which, in their several opinions, our government has more or less right to demand. The payment of our claims is considered vastly disproportionate to the terrible consequences of a war between the two countries. The English minister at this court is not an exception to this general expression of opinion, but freely admits that his government had better pay at once and allay the agitation which daily widens the breach between the two countries.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH J. BARTLETT.

[Translation.]

SPEECH OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING, AT THE OPENING OF THE DIET, JANUARY 17, 1868.

I highly appreciate, at this moment, the provision finally introduced into the fundamental law, by which, without the delays established thus far, I find you again reassembled about me, to participate with me in proper measures to insure the welfare of the country.

My relations with all foreign powers continue to be satisfactory, and marked with sincere friendship. The general political situation, and the zeal shown in nearly all the countries of Europe to increase their armed forces, imposes equally upon us the duty to organize our means of defense conformably with the necessities of the times.

The multiplicity and constantly increasing administrative business demands a more suitable distribution of matters to be referred to the council, especially if we would arrive at a desired simplification of preparatory work in subordinate departments. Consequently, I have resolved to propose to you a change in the constitutional statute, by means of which may be instituted, with other prescriptions relating thereto, a new ministerial department for agriculture, manufactures, and public works.

The joint committee named for the revision of the compact of union between Sweden and Norway has handed me its important work, and the project is at present the subject of important preparatory deliberations.

A very limited crop, absolutely insufficient in the northern provinces of the kingdom, has produced a considerable increase in the price of the first necessities of life, threatening the very existence of the poor population. By employing the funds you placed at my disposal, I have endeavored to aid them; and private benevolence, not only at home but from kindred peoples, as well as from foreign countries, has promptly and generously been offered for the relief of this unfortunate population.

In spite of the difficulties which unforeseen expenditures and the diminution of revenue, resulting from the dearness of subsistence, could not fail to produce, the general situation of finances, however, permits us to renounce, commencing with next year, the special tax, which at the last Diet you voted for, arming our military forces, without any increase of other tax being necessary to satisfy the necessities of the government.

The underestimate which, on account of the circumstance I have just mentioned, could not be avoided, for the present year will be supplied, partially, by funds in hand, and might have been fully, if the excesses of preceding years had not been absorbed by their use in railway constructions—sums exceeding the total of loans made for this object.

I have been unceasing in my active solicitude for the organization of our means of defense, and I hope to be able, in the course of this session, to communicate to you a plan upon which, I think, they should be based and established. Starting upon the principle also expressed by yourselves, that it is the duty of every citizen to take part in the defense of his native soil, I have adopted, in conformity with your advice, and with a view to lighten the sacrifices which, in time of peace, spring from a general duty, a plan for the preservation of well-exercised and permanent frameworks to form the nucleus of our army. After mature deliberation, I have found that frameworks sufficient, in every respect, could, with the least felt expense, and without offensive injustice, be most suitably formed upon the base of old national institutions, characteristic of our country and adopted in our customs.

It is my intention to maintain them in their fundamental principles, proposing, at the same time, to introduce therein useful reforms.

With a view to furnish our troops with arms of an improved construction, I have adopted measures which, though the fulfillment of contracts made abroad experienced delays, contrary to my expectations, insure us a satisfactory certainty for an uninterrupted manufacture of these arms at home.

The projected changes in important branches of legislation, and the more equitable application of duty, which for a long time already have been under consideration, have not yet been brought to a requisite maturity to be submitted to you. I have resolved, however, to present to you a proposition for the abolition of arrest of debtors of good faith.

I shall ask allowances for public works with a view, particularly, to aid immediately those provinces where labor offers equally the advantage of assuring the existence of a great number of needy, and shall also ask your support for the voting of necessary funds for the active continuation of railway works, destined to connect the capitals of the united kingdoms.

At the universal industrial competition, opened at Paris during the past year, Sweden honorably maintained her rank by the side of countries which lead in the development of peaceful callings.

No far as statistics show, the progress of our industry, in spite of difficulties with which the most part of our manufactures have had to struggle during the last year, has acquired a progressive extension.

Resting upon this accomplished fact and upon multiplied indications denoting that Sweden establishes herself more and more upon the sound base of economical independence—that of measuring her necessities with her resources, and of renouncing expenses which are neither indispensable nor justifiable—we can face the future with the full conviction that the obstacles to which we have been exposed will have taught us salutary lessons, and will thus become the source, not of discouragement nor of the prostration of our strength, but of their new development for a substantial well-being.

Convinced of your enlightened zeal for all that can insure the public good, I invoke for your work the benediction of Divine Providence, and in declaring, in conformity with the constitution, the present session open, I renew to you, gentlemen, the assurance of my friendship and of my royal affection.

Mr. Bartlett to Mr. Seward.

No. 23.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, October 9, 1868.

SIR: The subject of Norwegian Finmark is, with the Swedish government, one of continual anxiety and jealous watchfulness. Their great neighbor, Russia, who has wrenched from them Finland, now only awaits the color of an excuse, as their fears argue, to grasp that belt of land lying north of Russian Lapmark, and extending west to the open sea. This acquisition of territory would give to Russia large accessible harbors, free from ice the whole year, on the northwest coast of Norway. The nomadic tribes of Russian Laps, in considerable numbers, cross the border every spring with their reindeer herds to seek the better feeding grounds of Norwegian Finmark. The fishermen also sail to the Norwegian fiords and pursue their calling by the side of the Norwegians. This has been so long permitted by the government of Norway, that it is not surprising that it should now be demanded as a right. Last year, however, they attempted to put some restrictions upon the encroachments of the Laps, both on sea and land, which, I believe, were not very successful, but led to many collisions between the stranger tribes and the natives. At that time the Swedish papers pursued the subject with a bitterness of hatred towards Russia, which seems to have been augmented rather than diminished by the lapse of time since their loss of Finland. I believe it is the general impression among the Swedes that Russian agents are constantly on the ground stimulating the tribes to further aggression, and reporting to their government the need of protection.

You will observe by this statement that anything bearing upon this question in the remotest degree is eagerly seized upon by the press and argued into an approaching reality of their long-nourished fears.

The subject has been recently again brought before the public by the press, and it appears that I am one of the innocent causes. During the months of June and July I made the voyage to the head of the Gulf of Bothnia, and thence by land to Över Tornea, for the purpose of seeing the midnight sun from the mountain Aversaxsa. On my return I left the steamer at one of the northern ports, and traveled inland through Sweden back to Stockholm. The Swedish journals professed themselves at first flattered by my desire to see so much of the country that all Swedes love with an ardor I have never seen equaled outside my own. But, a few weeks ago they had, it appears, discovered the real object of my journey. I had, it seems, advised my government that in order to make the alliance between the United States and Russia more effective in case of war, it was absolutely necessary that Russia should have the ports on the northwest coast of Norway. (Inclosure No. 1, translation from the Aftonbladet, Stockholm, August 18, 1868.) Later, one of the journals of the interior, I was told, made the discovery that the Emperor of all the Russias did not cede the open ports of Russian America to the United States without having in return a bond securing to him their assistance to get ice-free ports on the Norwegian coasts.

I at first paid no attention to these attacks; but after considering with how much jealousy not only the government, but all the people, viewed this subject in whatever form it might be presented to them, I decided to call the attention of Count Wachtmster, the minister of state and foreign affairs, to the articles mentioned, and assured him that so far as they concerned myself, they were the ridiculous inventions of sensation writers, and that I at first thought I would give them no attention; but upon considering how many people whom I would daily meet might believe them, to the detriment of my government and of my influence here, I had decided to call his attention to the subject, and leave him to deal with it in the manner he should consider most proper towards my government. His excellency, who had never believed in the truth of the articles, said he would officially deny them in the official paper of the following day. I inclose (No. 2) the translation of the denial in the Post Och Inrikes Tidningar, Stockholm, August 24, 1868. I also inclose (No. 3) a translation of an article which appeared in the Aftonbladet September 15, 1868, which is in every way corroborative of the fact that even tourists, of whatever nationality, may be subject to such attacks in connection with Norwegian Finmark. The Prussian officer alluded to in inclosure No. 3 is General Schweinitz.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH J. BARTLETT.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

No. 1.

[Translation from the Aftonbladet, Stockholm, August 18, 1868.]

One word to call the attention, we will not say to the Scandinavian interest, but to the interest of Europe, in that question which does not date from yesterday, for one may call it an old petition annulled in all jurisdictions.

The ports of the extreme north on the Norwegian coast do not freeze in winter, thanks to the gulf stream. Now Russia, as the celebrated Kalkof paper says, with a vigorous appetite, unknown in tradition since the time of Agres, has no port with good anchorage which is not closed by ice six months in the year. She has every interest, therefore, in procuring one upon good conditions, and at our expense, because she would quickly make it into another Cronstadt, from whence she could at all seasons of the year dart forth and threaten the commerce of France and England. "Now these two powers," the same paper adds, and appears to be astonished, "have always cried stop, to their project, and a singular fatality has prevented Russia, since Peter I. from putting her hands upon a position which might be at the same time a bridge of civilization (†) and a clearing port." (Here the interrogation mark is useless.)

It must be mentioned that according to a rumor which has not been denied, the American minister at Stockholm called the attention of his government to the necessity of aiding Russia, who cannot at her ease prey upon the commerce of England and France.

Respecting Denmark, the confessions of the Russian papers are, if possible, still more void of craft. "That mutilated country can no longer have an independent existence," says the Golos; "its fate is alone in the hands of Prussia and Russia; France has nothing to do with it." As for England, no mention is made of her.

In truth, to offer for sale the bear-skin still alive, is an habitual custom of Russia; but the bear who by passing sees his fur advertised, will do well to hold himself notified.

No. 2.

[Translation from the Post Och Inrikes Tidningar, Stockholm, August 24, 1868.]

In the Aftonbladet, August 18, 1868, it is stated that the United States minister at Stockholm called the attention of his government to the necessity of assisting Russia in acquiring a port in Norway. According to what we learn from good source, this statement is without foundation.

No. 3.

[Translation from the Aftonbladet, Stockholm, September 15, 1868.]

Speaking of Norway, and of the visit the royal family are about to make there, is it not worth while to speak of a personage of whom every step is traced as if it were a question of a crowned head? It may be simply a question of an inoffensive tourist, who has the mania to go about with a pseudo-Roman casque which you recognize.

However the case may be, the doings and movements of General S. is the whole subject of preoccupation. And this gives an opportunity to renew that important question of Norwegian Finmark—of that band of land which so much tempts Russia on account of those excellent ports there, which the ice in winter does not close. We touch again upon this subject the more for the reason that in the documents to which we have recourse, the fears are founded in a very clear, and, unfortunately, in a very plausible manner.

That one may profit by the question of nationality, and make use of it to put in practice the fable of the lists and its companion, the history of Sleswig superabundantly proves. Now, we have every reason to believe that in Finmark Russia thinks of following this example. Unfortunately an appearance of pretext appears to show itself. For instance, among the population spread over that district are found from 5,000 to 6,000 Quaines, belonging to the same nationality as the inhabitants of Russian Finland, and who evidently came from that province. Add also the nomad tribes, who, during the summer, pass into the Norwegian territory to feed their reindeer, and a large number of Russian fishermen who come to take advantage of the Norwegian fiords, and you succeed in grouping a small population that Russia might think herself obliged to protect. That numerous collisions take place between the natives and the strangers is natural, as well as that the latter are not always in the wrong. Many times it has been proved that the Russian authorities have shown a very great zeal in receiving complaints of their nationals. Genuine documents have been seen in their hands, and it is useless to add that agents are not wanting to them to observe and note the facts on the spot.

Here is the serious side of the question. A day may come when Russia will say, a part of the population (it is always the greater part for those precious statisticians who make statistics on cannon carriages) is composed of many nationals, therefore this territory is Russian. They are oppressed, therefore I come to protect them. As for these agents, and their manner, more or less open, of proceeding, that is a secondary matter. Last year a voyage very long and trying was undertaken by Mr. Mehelin, Russian consul at Christiania, on the border of Norway and Russia, which attracted anxious attention. Why did she awake on the subject of the excursion, probably quite innocent of an ex-Prussian general ornamented with a casque? It is said he was stationed a long time in regions like Sont Varanger, where tourists are rare if any were ever seen, and that he announced himself as come to study the military architecture of which Finmark ought not to offer many models, and from thence he went to the regatta at Stavenger. It was said that he met then the Russian consul-general at Christiana, but this last has just been contradicted. Nevertheless a number of ingenious conjunctions which may have no more foundation than this pretended meeting.

Though we make no note of persons, the question of Russian Finmark exists. It is very grave, and ought to call the serious attention of publicists.

Mr. Bartlett to Mr. Seward.

No. 24.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, November 7, 1868.

SIR: The system of maintaining the army and a portion of the marine in Sweden has many points of excellence, which could be adapted to our republican institutions with far greater advantage and with less burden to our people than here.

It is called "Indelnings Verket," the system of distribution, from the verb indela, distribute, that is, distribution of land assigned for the maintenance of soldiers. This system commenced as far back as the 12th century. By a mandate of King Magnus, the estates of any one agreeing to serve as a mounted and armed soldier, at his own expense, were liberated from all taxation. This was consequently a personal privilege, but could be transferred with the estate, the purchaser or heir becoming possessed of the same right, which is termed "frälse." Later the personal nature of this right disappeared, the owner being permitted to furnish a substitute. While at present this class of estates are relieved of the separate maintenance of a soldier by paying an inconsiderable sum.

The principal division of landed estates now existing is as follows: 1st. Krono, belonging to the Crown; 2d, Säteri, entirely free from taxation; 3d, Frälse, partly liberated from taxation; 4th, Skatte, tax paying.

Originally all the land was of the 4th class, belonging to private individuals and paying tax to the Crown. Most of the land still remains in this division and maintains the greatest number of the indelta soldiers, horse and foot, as well as båtsmännen or boatmen, corresponding to our landsmen in the navy. Krono is all the land that immediately belongs to the Crown as its property, which it has become in various ways, as, for instance, when the noble family of Wassa ascended the throne in 1521, all its estates became Crown property, through the confiscation of the church property after the reformation, &c., &c. Formerly the Crown divided its principal revenue from these estates, but on the more complete organization of Indelnings Verket, a great number of them were set aside for the support of the officers of the army. The right or freedom of "Säteri" formerly belonged to a few family estates of the old nobility and the King's private estate. It was, however, determined by a law in Gustavus Adolphus's reign, that a nobleman or knight could possess but one, a baron two, and a count three estates, with this "Säteri" right, which consists not only in absolute freedom of taxation, but in relief from the duty of maintaining one or more soldiers. Charles XI finding the revenues of the Crown very much diminished by this liberality, as well as the numbers of his soldiers, sequestered a large number of these estates, so that but few of them now remain, and those remaining are obliged during a war to furnish one or more soldiers.

Thus before the reign of Charles XI it will be seen that the system of Indelnings Verket, though differing materially from its present working, had so far been perfected as to form the nucleus of an army, which was increased by levies and conscription in time of need, at the will of the monarch, with the consent of the Riksdag. The infantry was obtained through levies of one man for every 20th fralse and 15th or 10th skatte farm—the proportion for cavalry being in accord with the greater expense of its support.

Charles XI finding the conscription of the levies to be a slow and inconvenient method by which to fill the ranks of his army, and especially so when abroad, advised and carried into effect a system of contracts between the Crown and subjects, by which peasants, as well as nobles, bound themselves to always furnish, equip, and maintain in the field one soldier, upon about the above mentioned basis. That is, farmers united to maintain one soldier, the number being determined by the size and value of their farms. A smaller number of the possessors of Skatte, and a greater number of possessors of fralse farms, also a different proportion for the infantry and cavalry. The cities were almost entirely free from this burden. Some of them kept a small number of båtman, but the greater number paid a money tax. These contracts were made upon the condition that the Crown renounced all right to procure more men by means of forced levies or conscription.

When the above mentioned contracts were made, the farmers set aside and apportioned a plot of ground and built a comfortable cabin, where the soldier might live and maintain himself and family in time of peace. During a war the farmers are obliged to till his land and care for his property. Besides this, as stated above, they furnish him with uniform, equipment, and arms, and if a cavalryman, with horse and horse equipments. The same system is in effect to-day. The estate or estates that furnish a foot soldier are called a "Rote," and those that furnish a cavalryman a "Rusthåll." The soldier's place, cabin and land, is called a "Torp." The word torp being a general name for every small tenant's place. These torps vary in size in the different provinces, in accordance with the fertility of the soil, proximity to cities or towns, &c.

When a vacancy occurs in a "Torp" or "Rusthåll," the owner or owners thereof procure a recruit, who is first inspected by the company commander, and afterwards by the regimental surgeon, regimental commander, and governor of the district, and finally approved by the general commanding the district, at the next general inspection. Rendezvous for drill are held every year. First with the officers and non-commissioned officers 12 days, generally in the month of May, with recruits 20 to 40 days in May and June, with the entire regiment 15 days in June. Sweden is divided into five military districts, each commanded by a general officer. The regiments included in these districts supply in turn garrisons for forts situated within the district—100, or at most 200 men. Such detailed service lasts four months, during which time the men are instructed by their officers in what is termed the school for corporals. Men may also be detailed at times to assist on government works. Thus, for example, was the Götha canal almost entirely constructed by soldiers. Charles XII, during his great campaigns in foreign countries, seeing that this system admitted of no expansion by which he might fill the ranks of his invasive army, demanded and obtained a conscription to enable him to continue his wars. This was effected, however, without releasing the existing contracts with the soldier-furnishing estates. It had the result, moreover, to create some years after the "bevåring," which was fully instituted by the Riksdag in 1809, when the new constitution was adopted. The "bevåring" is founded upon the principle that every male citizen should be liable to military duty from 21 years of age to 25. They are required to drill 15 days each of the first two years. Aside from this required drill, they can only be called out during the war, by the consent of the Riksdag.

The Indelning regiments are formed and officered so as to absorb the "bevåring" in time of war. The infantry regiments are divided into two battalions of four companies each. A company is generally 150 men, exclusive of officers and non-commissioned officers to the latter of which corporals do not belong. A regiment has officers and non-commissioned officers for three battalions, the third battalion to consist of "bevåring," or rather the "bevåring" is distributed among the old soldiers, and three battalions formed. The cavalry regiments are much smaller, and are divided into from four to eight squadrons of about 90 men each, but with so many officers that they also absorb the "bevåring." Officers of all grades furnish their own horses.

A full regiment has one colonel, three majors, (the senior having the title of lieutenant colonel,) and 12 captains, of which eight are company commanders, and four to command companies when the "bevåring" is added. All these officers, except the four "bevåring" captains, have "boställen," that is, farms furnished by the Crown, to live and maintain themselves upon. The subalterns and four "bevåring" captains get their pay in money. They must, however, all live within the district of their company and regiment.

All the non-commissioned officers, except the youngest in the infantry, have similar "boställen." The size and income of the "boställen" is generally suited to the rank of the possessor, but of course not always; good management and a fertile country will make a great difference. Thus some of the non-commissioned officers in Sköne, the most fertile district of the kingdom, have much larger incomes than many regimental commanders in the north of Sweden. The Swedish indelta army consists at present of about 3,300 cavalry, 20,239 infantry, besides 5,686 "Indelta båtsman." There are besides, two "bevåring" battalions, that is to say, officers and non-commissioned officers for two complete battalions, exclusive of those mentioned before. The "Indelta" regiments, besides having a number, are given the name of the province or district to which they belong. The regiments are so apportioned that in 24 hours any one regiment may be concentrated. In adding the "bevåring" to the "Indelta" in time of war, the effective force of the army amounts to a little more than 100,000 men. The balance of the army, which consists of only 6,800 men, are enlisted for six years, and are apportioned about as follows; 3,000 artillery, 1,000 marines, 400 horse guards, 600 cavalry, 1,800 foot guards, (1st and 2d regiments,) besides a small force of engineers.

This force alone receive their pay directly from the government, except the youngest officers of the "Indelta" infantry and the subalterns before mentioned, and are kept in permanent garrisons during peace. However, one-fourth of this enlisted force are on furlough, during which they receive no pay. The pay of infantry officers in the Swedish "Indelta" army is, for a colonel from 5,000 to 10,000 riks dollars; majors from 3,000 to 6,000 riks dollars; first captain from 2,000 to 6,000 riks dollars; second captain from 1,200 to 1,800 riks dollars; first lieutenant from 600 to 1,000 riks dollars; second lieutenant from 300 to 480 riks dollars.

It is somewhat higher in the cavalry, at least in the four lower grades.

It will be seen by this system of apportionment of land to the use of one who binds himself to bear arms for the government in time of need and to submit to all other military requirements, a poor country is enabled to maintain and have ever ready for immediate use an army of well-drilled and disciplined soldiers and officers, amounting to 30,000 men. By adding the "bevåring," composed of men of a certain age fixed by law, the army is immediately swelled to the considerable size of 100,000 men. Commanded by educated and experienced officers, the regiments are all named and numbered, and each man between the ages of 21 and 25 years knows where he will take his place when called upon to battle for his country. It is scarcely necessary to add that this kingdom, by any other system, could not maintain a standing army at all proportionate to its territorial extent or requirements.

It now only remains to show how far this system, that has stood the test of centuries here, can be made applicable to our own country.

This I shall endeavor to do, first, by directing your attention to the fact that an individual citizen of a republic composed of a great number of states must necessarily have a remote interest in the general government. This more especially applies to the class upon whose patriotism we rely in time of war to maintain our rights in the field as private soldiers. This remoteness of interest does not arise from any want of a proper and warm love of country, but from the fact of the numerous intermediate appliances for their government before they are brought under the cognizance of the higher law of the constitution and are made to feel that the entire country is one and indivisible. Nature has implanted in the breast of every man the sentiment of loyalty, which is exhibited in its fullest intensity in the love of his family and in the personal sacrifices he is ever ready to make for their defense and protection. Extending from this center it embraces his town, county, congressional district, and state; and finally includes in its outer circle the general government. With no intervening hinderances, or as between our own and another power, it gives itself with all its intensity direct to the head. But if there be intermediate differences the most conscientious and intelligent at least hesitate.

By this system one or more men in every township are made to feel a warmer interest in their own town, which provides them a homestead upon which they maintain themselves and families, and a direct interest in, and responsibility to, the general government. In our country, as here, these soldiers would many of them become important members of the society of their townships, and would greatly aid in removing the distant consideration of national affairs.

One or more of these soldier corps could be provided by each township, according to the number of inhabitants, at little expense to the tax-payers, as the government have always arms enough on hand to supply them. Each district could supply garrisons for forts, arsenals, &c., with an expense to the government for rations only. The officers are already serving in the army. This system would enable the entire force that it would be necessary to pay, as at present, to be moved at any time, to a man, on the frontiers, where they could be reinforced, if necessary, from the regiments of the "Indelta" which were nearest to the scene of action.

Second. Suppose the soldiers to be enlisted for a term of five years, at the average age of 21, three terms would expire when the soldiers of the first enlistments had but attained the age of 36 years. Thus there would always be a thoroughly instructed reserve in the country, in addition to the state militia, ready to bear arms in any emergency.

To this end there might be apportioned a certain number of acres in each township, surveyed and to be surveyed, of the great tracts of government lands yet undisposed of. This apportionment alone might be so managed that as civilization advanced towards the west, it would be found in a few years adequate to the support of a great army, without drawing a dollar from the treasury of the nation.

The minor details of this system, as applicable to our country, such as how many men shall be retained in the army to be paid as now; how many should be enrolled in the "Indelta;" whether, when called into active service, they should receive as much pay as the regular soldier, or whether they are to receive none at all; the number of days' drill each year, &c., &c., can be readily adjusted if the system is found worthy of consideration.

In this connection, and for the purpose of giving you some means of contrasting the actual expense in maintaining this army of 33,641 strong, with officers to command, and so organized as to absorb the "bevåring" in case of need, making its total effective strength 110,852, with our own system, I will give—

No. 242.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, January 9, 1868.

SIR: The Cretan question has of late assumed a more serious aspect. The want of success of the Turkish troops, and the apparent unanimity with which the insurgents and the Christian population have rejected the propositions made to them through the grand vizier, has provoked new demonstrations on the part of the great powers in favor of peace. The French ambassador, I am informed, on Saturday last presented a note to the Porte on the part of his government, in which, in very positive terms, a commission of inquiry is demanded to ascertain the sentiment of the Cretan people, with the view of allowing them to determine their future destiny. This commission is to be comprised of representatives of the great powers, with a Turkish commissioner adjoint. In this note the Porte is advised of the imminent certainty of a war by Russia against Turkey, and the declaration is made that in such a war France will remain perfectly neutral if the Porte rejects the proposed commission of inquiry. * * * *

England, indirectly co-operating with France, has, through her ambassador, Mr. Elliott, recommended the establishment of a principality, without, however, resorting to menace to support her counsel. The Austrian ambassador, a fortnight since, in behalf of his government, urged also a commission of inquiry. This particular proposition was first advanced last summer by France, Russia, Austria, Prussia and Italy as an alternative to their recommendation for the cession of Crete to Greece. It is of Russian origin. * * * *

The last advices from Crete report new disasters to the imperial forces, and that they have been unable to make any progress in the reduction of the rebellion. Sawas Effendi, an employé of the Porte, who has been made pasha of Spakia, left Canea with six battalions, about 10,000 men, for the purpose of taking possession of his pachalik. At about three hours from the point of departure, on the verge of the mountain district of Spakia, he was met by an insurgent force, and after a desperate combat of some duration the Turkish troops were driven back and were obliged to return with the pasha to Canea, or rather they accompanied him to a safe distance, whence he was enabled under escort to reach that town. Thus ends the attempt to revive the Turkish government in the famous district of Spakia.

Although 60,000 women and children, by the Christian charity of the great powers, have been transported to Greece, the suffering for want of food is very great in Crete, and many helpless non-combatants perish from starvation. The situation of this once beautiful and flourishing island is indeed deplorable, and it justly commends itself to the sympathies of the Christian world.

E. JOY MORRIS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that in co-operation with my colleagues of the diplomatic corps, I have addressed the Porte a note soliciting permission for sailing-vessels to pass through the Bosphorus and Dardanelles during the night. Although steamers are permitted to pass the forts at the entrance of these straits after night, the same liberty is not allowed to sailing-vessels. This is the cause of frequent disasters, as the anchorage outside is bad, and in case of storms it is almost impossible to find good shelter, or to escape shipwreck or serious damage. The interests of commerce, in the opinion of shipmasters, require the abrogation of this ancient regulation. Often, also, in consequence of a change of wind at nightfall, vessels are driven back from the Dardanelles, and are unable to reach the straits again for months afterwards.

I am happy to be able to state that in consequence of the action of my colleagues and myself, first made some two years since, a proper system of life-saving apparatus and of precautions against shipwreck are to be adopted in a short time at the entrance of the Bosphorus from the Black sea. That locality is the scene of many shipwrecks and much loss of life during the stormy months, owing to the difficulty of distinguishing the true mouth of the Bosphorus.

I am sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. JOY MORRIS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, March 11, 1868.

SIR: The grand vizier, Aali Pasha, having returned from Crete, I called on him with the other members of the diplomatic corps. His Highness was very cordial in my reception, and was in excellent health and spirits. In conversing on his mission to Crete, in reply to my remark that I hoped he had tranquilized the island, he replied that all would go on well if there was no interference from abroad. I inferred from this observation that his Highness did not regard the state of affairs there as altogether satisfactory, or that peace was re-established. Since his return, indeed, we have news of an important battle at Prosyaco, in which the Turkish loss is reported by Mr. Stillman as over a thousand. The whole division engaged in this battle would have probably been destroyed but for the timely aid rendered by a Turkish iron-clad, which took a position sufficiently near the field of battle to bring her guns in range on the Cretan forces.

Concessions of a very liberal character have been made to the insurgents by the grand vizier, but as these concessions follow a desolating war of two years' duration, they do not seem likely to produce any effect. Thus far, at least, the Cretans manifest no signs of submission. They fight with more spirit and resolution than ever, and the blockade-runners continue as heretofore to carry provisions and munitions of war from Greece to Crete. The Cretans evidently intend to prolong the contest until they can profit by complications in western Europe to realize their aspirations for independence and annexation to Greece. Thus far I do not see any solid advance that has been made by the Turkish forces in the subjection of the rebellion. The loss in battle and by disease, and the expenses of prosecuting this contest, are very great on the Turkish side.

The French papers abound in warlike reports from Roumania and Servia. There is no doubt considerable agitation in both those provinces, but not to the extent described by the Paris journals.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, May 21, 1868.

SIR: It gives me pleasure to be able to state that, yielding to the pressure of controlling circumstances and to the counsels of the protecting powers, the Porte has recently adopted several measures of a reformatory character, which, if faithfully executed, will have an important influence on the future welfare of this empire and its subjects.

A council of state has been established with almost similar functions to that of France. Its chief duty will consist in the revision and preparation of laws, the outlines of which have been submitted to it by the council of ministers. It will also assist that body with its advice, whenever required. As it is composed of nearly a hundred members, both Mussulman and Christian, selected from different parts of the empire, it may be able to exert a beneficial influence on ministerial legislation if its advice is respected and its independence is not interfered with.

A high court of justice has also been established charged with the decision, in the last resort, of all civil, commercial, and criminal cases. It is divided into two sections: one for criminal cases exclusively, and the other for civil and commercial causes. The presiding judge will be a minister, with the title of "President of the High Court of Justice." This court will have jurisdiction in civil and criminal affairs, in accordance with the general laws of the empire; first, in all suits which come before it regularly and according to law; and secondly, in all cases in which an appeal is duly made to it by any party in a civil, commercial, or criminal process, to the exclusion of first cases, which belong to the *Cheriat courts: secondly, those which specially concern new Mussulman communities; and thirdly, commercial causes which have been tried by the tribunals which have special cognizance of such suits. The high court is obliged to refer to the council of state every case between private individuals in which any contest may arise between one of the parties and the authorities. The proceedings of this court will be public according to its own discretion. The members of this court who are appointed by imperial irade or decree are irremovable, except when promoted to higher functions or convicted after trial.

Most of the attributes of this new court are already exercised by the existing supreme council of justice. With its enlarged functions it will facilitate the administration of justice, if its judges are men of perfect probity and of proper qualifications.

His Majesty the Sultan has recently, on the opening of the Mohammedan new year, in a formal address before the chief authorities, reaffirmed the pledges of the Hatti Haumagom of his predecessor, and announced his intention to abolish all invidious distinctions between his subjects, and his resolution to co operate in all measures necessary to the prosperity and regeneration of the empire. * * * * *

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, July 31, 1868.

SIR: The privileges of American citizenship are so much abused in this empire that I deem it my duty to bring the subject to the special attention of the department.

It has become quite a common practice for Ottoman subjects, chiefly Armenians, to go to the United States for the purpose of acquiring American citizenship, not with the view of residing there, but solely as a means of escaping allegiance to the Turkish government, within the territory of which they return to reside for the rest of their lives. Some of them merely take out declaration papers, and others perfect the forms of naturalization. In either case the proceeding is virtually fraudulent, as they have no intention of becoming resident American citizens. Upon their return to Turkey they enjoy higher privileges than the native born American. Unlike him they pay no taxes to the government of the United States, and yet may claim through it the expenditure of the blood and treasure of the American people for the redress of unsatisfied grievances. In time of war they are not, as the home-resident, subject to military conscription. They enjoy, in truth, all the rights of an American citizen, but are exempt from the duties, burdens, and obligations appertaining to the same.

I respectfully beg to be informed if I am to protect as American citizens persons of oriental origin, such as I have described, and who have no other claim of right to be regarded as such than declaration papers, and who, ever since the issuing of the same, have resided in Turkey? Am I bound to recognize as American citizens the children of original Ottoman subjects, naturalized in the United States, but who, since their naturalization, have constantly resided in Turkey, and which children have been born here? In many instances the children of such individuals have passed their majority and are engaged in business, never having visited the United States. Of course, they claim that their descendants, ad infinitum shall be considered American citizens. These distinctions against the native-born and home-resident Americans are obviously unjust and invidious, and ought to be corrected.

Many of the difficulties connected with this subject might be obviated by such a treaty as that lately negotiated by Mr. Bancroft with Prussia, and it may be worthy the consideration of the department if it be not expedient to negotiate a similar treaty with Turkey. In the mean time I solicit instructions on the above points.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 21, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 31st of July, No. 266, has been received. We have for some time been apprised of the abuses which are committed concerning the privilege of citizenship of the United States in oriental countries.

This department, as you must have inferred from some of its instructions, has been engaged in endeavoring to correct these abuses.

In answer to your present request for special instructions, I have to direct that you will extend the protection of the United States only to persons who are either native born or naturalized citizens of the United States. In case of naturalization the proceeding must not consist merely in a preliminary declaration of intention, but must show a judicial process fully complete and ended before the proper courts, and in conformity with the provisions of the laws of the United States. Wherever the naturalization papers presented are either manifestly fraudulent, or well suspected of being fraudulent, you will refuse to extend protection upon them until the case shall have been examined here.

When the person who demands protection claims it upon the ground simply that he is the child of a person who has been naturalized in the United States, you will look into the circumstances and see whether the claimant has, by relinquishing his residence in the United States, or by returning to Turkey or any other foreign country, practically waived his legally acquired but provisional title as an American citizen.

You will in no case interpose in behalf of a person whose objects appear to be immoral, or illegal, or frivolous, or whose title to United States citizenship is not clear and absolute; on the contrary, in such doubtful cases you will refer yourself to this department for special instructions.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, August 24, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to report the arrival of Admiral Farragut at this capital, in the United States steamer Frolic. This vessel being within the dimensions allowed to enter the straits by the treaty of Paris of 1856, my application for the requisite firman was promptly granted. Some days after the arrival of the admiral at Constantinople, his flag-ship, the frigate Franklin, was reported at the Dardanelles, whither she had repaired under his orders to await him, on his departure from this place.

I thought it due to so distinguished an officer of our navy that exceptional honors should be awarded to him. With this object in view, I applied to the Turkish government to suspend in his favor that article in the treaty of Paris of 1856 by which vessels of war of the dimensions of the Franklin are excluded from the straits. On my first and informal application, I was informed that such exceptions were only made in favor of princes of the blood. To this I made answer that under such a construction and administration of the treaty, the United States would not enjoy the same privileges as the aristocratic states of Europe, and that this provision of the treaty was partial in its application, and to the derogation of our dignity. If Admiral Farragut were not a prince of the blood, he was at least a naval officer of such pre-eminent fame and achievements that the sovereigns of Europe had treated him with princely honors, and had received him with a distinction rarely granted to other than royal personages. Having discussed the question at various times in personal audiences with the grand vizier and minister of foreign affairs, I was pleased to know that his Majesty the Sultan desired the entrance of the Franklin. At the suggestion of the minister of foreign affairs, I at this stage of the discussion addressed him a formal note, asking the requisite permission for the passage of the Dardanelles by the Franklin. On the receipt of this note, the Porte officially advised the representatives of the great powers of the wishes of the Sultan, and invited their assent to the provisional suspension of the exclusion article of the treaty of Paris, in favor of the flag-ship of Admiral Farragut. Having given their assent, I was advised by a note, of which the enclosed is a copy, that orders had been sent to the Dardanelles to allow the Franklin to pass up the straits.

In this instance the admiral has been treated with rare courtesy by the Turkish government, and in a manner altogether unexceptional. I have deemed it my duty to specially thank the proper authorities for the same.

Soon after his arrival I presented the admiral to the Sultan, by whom he was received with striking cordiality. His Highness Aali Pasha, grand vizier, subsequently gave him a grand dinner, at which all the ministers of the imperial cabinet, as well as other leading Turkish functionaries, were present. The Russian and English ambassadors also extended him the hospitalities of their tables. He was prevented from accepting an invitation of the French ambassador by illness. It is quite needless, I hope, to assure you that it has been a sincere pleasure to me to render the admiral all possible courtesy on my own part. His visit to Constantinople, accompanied as it has been by the arrival of his flag-ship, will, I am confident, prove a most auspicious one in every respect.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. JOY MORRIS.

SUBLIME PORTE, MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
May 20, 1868.

I have received the note which you were pleased to address me the 18th instant, and by which you express the wish that permission may be exceptionally given to the frigate Franklin, bearing the flag of Admiral Farragut, to pass the straits of the Dardanelles to Constantinople.

As you have been pleased to recognize in the said note, the existing treaties have established the principle of the closing of the straits. Although the dimensions of the vessel in question exceed the limits expressly fixed by the treaty of Paris, his Majesty the Sultan, my august sovereign, desirous nevertheless of giving proof of his deferential regard for a distinguished personage of the great American republic, has been pleased for this purpose, and in a manner altogether exceptional, to grant the permission asked for the passage of the frigate Franklin.

In informing you, sir, that instructions in this sense have been sent by telegraph to the Dardanelles, I beg you to take note of the exceptional character of the granted authorization.

Accept, Mr. Minister resident, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

SIR: Admiral Farragut sailed from this port with the Franklin and Frolic, the 29th instant, for the Piræus. On the 26th instant he gave an entertainment to the diplomatic corps in his flag-ship, and on the 27th the grand vizier, Aali Pasha, and the minister of foreign affairs, Fuad Pasha, made him an official visit on the part of the Sultan, to express the regrets of his Majesty for his inability to visit him on board the Franklin. They breakfasted with the admiral and inspected minutely the vessel. They expressed their admiration of the construction and equipment of the ship in the strongest terms.

The Turkish authorities have shown every possible civility to the admiral during his stay here. Among other acts of signal courtesy on the part of the Sultan was that of ordering Ali Viza Bey, introducer of ambassadors, to place himself at the disposition of the admiral, in order to facilitate his visit to the government establishments and to other objects of interest in the capital. * * * *

Circular on the prohibition of the passage of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus by foreign vessels of war.

SUBLIME PORTE, MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
September 28, 1868.

SIR: The prohibition of the passage of the straits of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus by foreign vessels of war is a rule which the imperial government in the exercise of a territorial right has at all times enforced.

The treaty of Paris, of March 30, 1856, has intervened only to solemnly affirm the resolution of his Imperial Majesty the Sultan, to invariably maintain, whilst the Sublime Porte is at peace, this ancient rule of his empire already declared in the treaty of London of July 13, 1841, and by which act the powers signers pledged themselves to respect this determination of the territorial sovereign.

This principle has always been maintained; and if on rare and exceptional occasions it has been permitted to some vessels of war to pass the straits, it was always in virtue of a special authorization accorded out of deference to the distinguished personages on board of them.

The Sublime Porte, however, recognises that a relaxation in the strict application of the aforesaid principle with respect to vessels of war, apart from the exceptions provided by articles 2 and 3 of the convention of March 30, 1856, would not be compatible with the declaration contained in the aforesaid treaty of Paris.

It has, therefore, been decided that, henceforward, there will positively be no exception but for vessels of war, which may have on board a sovereign or the chief of an independent state.

The preceding decision having been sanctioned by his imperial Majesty the Sultan I have the honor to beg you to report it to the government of the United States for its information.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

SAFVET.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, October 29, 1868.

SIR: Having on a previous occasion reported the reply of Fuad Pasha to my application for permission for Admiral Farragut's flag-ship, the Franklin, to pass the Dardanelles, I have now the honor to transmit inclosed translated copies of my two notes on this subject, and also the circular dispatch of his Highness Fuad Pasha to the representatives of the powers parties to the treaty of Paris of 1856.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. JOY MORRIS.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Morris to Fuad Pasha.

BUYNKDRE, August 18, 1868.

HIGHNESS: The flag-ship of Admiral Farragut having arrived at the Dardanelles, I have the honor to solicit that permission be granted to said vessel to pass the straits. Although vessels of war of the size of the Franklin are excluded from the straits by the existing treaties, exceptions have been made from time to time in favor of such vessels, when having on board a prince of royal blood. Hereditary dignities do not exist in the United States. If these exceptions are exclusively confined to princes of the blood, the historical personages of the United States cannot profit by the same, and an invidious distinction will thus be established against them by the Porte.

Admiral Farragut is the officer of highest rank in the American navy, and the most distinguished. His achievements in the late civil war greatly contributed to the salvation of his country and to the preservation of the American Union against its enemies. His fame has become cosmopolitan, and he has been received in all the courts of Europe with princely honors. Sovereigns have granted him extraordinary honors, regarding rather the facts of his history than his rank.

Admiral Farragut having been received with such distinction elsewhere, I venture to hope that his Majesty the Sultan, with his usual appreciation of distinguished exploits and services, will accord to him the exception heretofore only made in favor of princes.

The admiral desires to bring the Franklin to Constantinople exclusively for purposes of courtesy to a power with which the United States has always maintained the best relations, and with which it seeks to remain on the most friendly terms.

I beg your Highness to do me the honor to submit these considerations to his Majesty the Sultan, and to assure him that the concession of the desired permission will be regarded as a compliment to the American people, and to one of its most faithful and distinguished servants.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your highness the assurances of my perfect consideration.

E. JOY MORRIS.

Mr. Morris to Fuad Pasha.

CONSTANTINOPLE, August 23, 1868.

HIGHNESS: I have had the honor to receive the note by which you inform me that his Majesty the Sultan has granted permission for the passage of the Dardanelles to the flag-ship of Admiral Farragut. This exception to the provisions of the treaties relative to vessels of war which are allowed to pass the straits in time of peace will be esteemed as a proof of regard for the republic of the United States, and for the gallant officer who so worthily sustained the honor of its flag during the recent civil war. It will give me much pleasure to communicate this friendly proceeding to my government. It will, I am sure, have a tendency to improve the good understanding so happily existing between the two countries.

I avail myself, &c., &c.,

E. JOY MORRIS.

Circular dispatch of Fuad Pasha to the representatives of the powers parties to the treaty of Paris of 1856.

AUGUST 19, 1868.

The flag-ship of Admiral Farragut having arrived at the Dardanelles, the United States legation, admitting the principle of the closing of the straits as established by the treaties, has expressed to us the desire that the said vessel should be permitted to pass through the straits to Constantinople. The dimensions of the naval vessel in question are, it is true, beyond the limitations stipulated in the treaty of Paris; but his Imperial Majesty the Sultan, wishing to testify his regard for the great American republic, and to see this magnificent frigate, has for this purpose, and in a manner altogether exceptional, granted the requested permission. I have deemed it my duty to bring this fact to the knowledge of the representatives of the powers parties to the above treaty, and I beg them to take notice of the exceptional character of the granted authorization, which, I have no doubt, they will find sufficiently justified.

FUAD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, November 5, 1868.

SIR: The news of the election of General Grant to the Presidency of the United States was received here this day. I think it proper to report the fact that this event has given great satisfaction to the friends of the United States in this capital. It is regarded as a sure pledge for the future welfare of the republic, in the confidence that the same qualities which distinguished General Grant in the field, and which led to the triumph of the Union over its enemies, will be brought into the administration of the government, and will give to it new power for self-conservation at home, and for the maintenance of the national honor and interests abroad. The name and exploits of General Grant are well known and appreciated by the official world here; and they give reason to expect an administration which will extend American influence in Europe, and increase the influence and authority of the United States with foreign governments and communities.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, December 4, 1868.

SIR: In a council of ministers on Wednesday last, it was determined, in consequence of the tenor of dispatches from the Turkish minister at Athens, to break off diplomatic relations with Greece, to expel the Greek subjects from the Turkish territory, and to exclude Greek vessels from the Turkish waters. An imperial decree to this effect has been signed by the Sultan. The Turkish minister has been recalled from Athens, and the Greek minister at Constantinople has received his passports.

These measures have been adopted because of the alleged aid which the Greek government has of late rendered to the Cretan insurrection, and also because of the departure of new expeditions of volunteers from Greece to Crete, and of the difficulties placed in the way of the emigrated Cretans who desire to return to their homes. The uninterrupted voyages of the supply blockade-runner, the Enosis or Union, from Syra to Crete, is also another source of aggravation. * * *

The expulsion of the subjects of Greece from Turkey is an expedient of great severity, as they number more or less about 200,000, and in the capital alone 35,000. Here they are engaged in all kinds of avocations, and contribute much to the prosperity of the city.

* * * War seems imminent between Greece and Turkey as a sequel to these measures. If it breaks out, it will, I fear, lead to grave disasters in the east, and may produce complications that may expand into a great continental struggle. Should the Greek populations in Epirus and Thessaly rise in insurrection, the revolutionary spirit may extend to the Turkish islands of the Archipelago, inhabited by Greeks.

A squadron under Hobart Pacha sails to-morrow for Crete, and I have every reason to believe, if necessity requires it, will enter the Greek waters.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. JOY MORRIS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, December 6, 1868.

SIR: I was in error in stating, in my dispatch No. 277, that the Turkish minister at Athens had been already recalled, and that the Greek minister here had received his passports. The recall of the former and the dismissal of the latter depend upon the rejection of the ultimatum sent hence to the Turkish minister at Athens for presentation to the Greek government. This ultimatum requires the Greek government to prevent the expedition of volunteers from Greece to Crete, to facilitate the return of the emigrated Cretans to their homes, and to compel the supply blockade-runner, the Enosis or Union, which provisions the insurgent forces in Crete, to cease her trips to that island.

I think it very doubtful if the Greek government will accede to this ultimatum. Its acquiescence in the same would perhaps cause civil war in Greece, so strongly enlisted are the national sympathies in favor of Crete. Should the ultimatum be rejected, the provisions of the imperial decree referred to in my last will be put in force. The answer of the Greek government is expected within the next 24 hours.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. JOY MORRIS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, June 18, 1868.

SIR: On the 13th inst., as per copy herewith, I had the honor to report my arrival at this capital, making mention, at the same time, of the fact that the King and court were sojourning at Cephissia. On being informed of my arrival, his Majesty appointed Tuesday, the 16th inst., at the palace at Athens, for my official reception. At noon on that day, I presented my letter of credence to the King, who received me with marked cordiality, in manner and speech. In handing the letter of the President to the King, I employed the following language:

I have the distinguished honor of presenting to your Majesty a letter from the President of the United States of America, whereby I am accredited as minister resident near the government of your Majesty. In performing this agreeable duty, it is unnecessary for me to remind you of the friendship and sympathy so long subsisting between the two nations. These sentiments were expressed in more fitting terms than any that I can employ, on the occasion of the reception of your Majesty's representative at Washington, and they now, in virtue of a recent act of Congress, take visible form in the establishment of this mission. The people of the United States sincerely desire the prosperity and happiness of all peoples, under whatever forms of government their laws may be administered; yet, from the very nature of our own political institutions, we cannot but regard with peculiar satisfaction every successful result of self-government in Europe. In this view I may be permitted to consider as auspicious the period of my arrival in Greece. The supremacy of law and order during the excitement of the recent popular elections throughout this kingdom, and the submission of the whole to the voice of the majority, are, as regarded by the light of our own political experience, a test of free institutions. It is our abiding hope, that Greece, drawing from her imperishable past the principles of public liberty, and rejecting those conflicting elements which caused her decline, by a well-developed system of political economy and internal improvements, may, through patient peace, realize the just expectations of her patriotic and persevering people. Should my official residence near your Majesty's government serve in any degree to strengthen the friendship and give direction to the mutual interests of the two countries, my ambition will be more than gratified.

To which his Majesty responded as follows:

[Translation.]

MR. MINISTER: I thank you for the words which you have just pronounced. It is with a lively pleasure that I see a minister from the United States accredited near to me. The sympathies which unite the Greek people to those of the United States, date from the very period of the war which the former sustained to conquer her independence. Fully sharing in these sentiments of my people, I decided last year to send an envoy extraordinary to express them to the President of the United States. The reception of Mr. Rangabé by the Chief Magistrate of the republic, and by the American people in general; the mission with which you are at present charged; the hopes and sentiments which you have just expressed, are so many proofs of the feeling which animates the government and people of the United States in our behalf. My people and myself place a very high value upon the friendship of the United States. There is more than one point of resemblance between the two nations. With one, as with the other, the love of order and of liberty form the basis of their character. Both conquered their independence by a long struggle, and passed through many trials to sustain these two principles. Having heard of your antecedents, and of your talents, I am gratified, Mr. Minister, that the choice of your government for its representative near me has fallen upon yourself. I shall always receive you with pleasure, and I am sure that my government will hasten to establish intimate and cordial relations with you.

At the conclusion of this address, his Majesty entered into general conversation with me, and expressed much interest in the growth and prosperity of the United States. Referring to the remarks in my address upon the tranquillity of the late elections in Greece, he attributed the general good order which prevails with us during the period of elections, to the fact that labor and occupation engross the attention of the people; thus, by inference, intimating what indeed cannot fail to be perceived by the most casual observer in this capital, that the undue proportion of citizens who make a business of political agitation, is an element of great danger in this kingdom. Thus, at the present moment, although the results of the late elections have been known for weeks, the excitement of parties continues simply because there appears to be no wholesome practical occupations to engage the general mind. It is well known that the better classes do not pursue agricultural employments. Thus, an immense floating population, dependent upon government offices for support, is continually ebbing and flowing, as this party or that is in or out of political power. I refrain from further observation on this and kindred subjects, until more thorough examination ripens my judgment.

I may also mention, that to-day I was asked if I had any objection to receive a visit from certain Cretans, who, having come to Athens seeking admission to the Greek national chamber as "deputies," were, partly at the instance of the representatives of Great Britain and France, refused admission. Although informed that the proposed visit to me was not intended to be considered as official on their part, I thought proper to discourage the proceeding, expressing at the same time my readiness and pleasure to receive any and all who desired to see me in their individual capacity. I find it necessary to be cautious and circumspect, in my personal relations, with a community where party capital is manufactured out of very insignificant materials.

The affairs of Crete continue to be in statu quo. The Sultan's troops appear to be acting at present on the defensive, and blockade-running from this and other Greek ports goes on without molestation. According to the estimate of the prime minister, M. Bulgaris, with whom I had, to-day, a long and agreeable interview, the Cretans "under arms" in the island number about 12,000, and their opponents 20,000. M. Bulgaris states that the amount paid monthly for the support of the "refugee" Cretans now in Greece, and amounting to over 50,000 souls, exceeds the sum of 5,000 drachmas. This drain upon the treasury is very serious, and, in the present condition of the finances, cannot fail to excite apprehension for the future. There seem to be no signs of falling off in the determination of the government and people to sustain the cause of Crete—within the restraints imposed by the other powers. The present inactivity of Russia in the affairs of Crete serves to restrain the movements of those here who desire open interference, coûte que coûte.

The "verification" of the electoral votes—a long and tedious process, owing to the singular mode of casting the ballot at elections—still occupies the attention of the chamber. Much intemperate discussion has ensued, which yesterday, I regret to say, led to a personal rencontre in the chamber.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,
CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

No. 4.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Athens, June 25, 1868.

SIR: Two demonstrations of sympathy with the people of the United States, on the part of Cretan refugees in Greece, seem worthy of official mention.

A few evenings since a procession, consisting of about 900 orderly and well-dressed children, of both sexes, halted in front of the hotel where I am lodged. They were accompanied by their teachers, certain American missionaries, who have devoted much time and attention to the education of these refugees since their arrival, in a destitute condition, on the shores of Greece. After singing a hymn, they saluted the American minister with cheers. On being apprised that the object of this demonstration was to express to the people of the United States, through me, their heartfelt gratitude for the charitable aid which they had received from my countrymen at home, I addressed them briefly from the balcony. I commended their appearance and the means which they were pursuing to become intelligent and useful citizens, and expressed the opinion that if their benefactors in America could but witness the spectacle which they then presented, they would feel abundantly recompensed for such assistance as—amid great domestic suffering existing in a portion of our own country—they had been able to extend to the refugees in Greece. With a hearty cheer the assemblage retired in the same becoming order in which it had approached. A few days subsequently I was waited upon by a deputation of Cretans accompanied by the Bishop of Kissamos and two priests. With great simplicity and feeling these people expressed their gratitude to their friends in the United States for the sympathy and aid extended by the latter to the suffering women and children refugees in Greece, and invoked a blessing upon the government and people of the United States.

In addition to these manifestations, the local newspapers have teemed with kindly sentiments towards me as the representative of a people whom they have for a long period regarded, and now more than ever regard, as friendly to the aspirations of Greece. Since my arrival I have been visited by large numbers of representative men, inspired by the same friendly sentiments and anxious to express them. In many instances I have felt it necessary to check on their part a tendency to political discussion, which, if encouraged by me, would do no practical good and might lead to political misapprehensions. The numerous attempts on the part of others to introduce through me to the United States government "petitions" of Greeks, not subjects of this kingdom, indicate the extremity to which they are driven in the present position of affairs. Although not openly admitted, it is evident that the feeling of discouragement in Crete is very great. * * * *

From conversations with observing men, Americans, English and Greek, as well as Cretans, who have recently arrived from the island, it appears that the insurgents were never in a more hopeless condition. They have heretofore been regularly in the receipt of supplies and ammunition from their sympathizers in Greece and elsewhere. Now the shipments of supplies are less frequent and the want of ammunition is becoming very serious. The policy of the foreign powers in this juncture adds to the general discouragement. By Greeks and Cretans the United States is regarded as the only disinterested and reliable friend of Crete. The common people in Crete call "America" their "guardian angel who will eventually lead them to felicity." In what way this dream of the sufferers is to become a reality, or what may be the nature of the felicity hoped for, does not appear. I have, however, every reason to believe that the people of Crete would place themselves and their beautiful island under our flag, if means were open for the accomplishment of such an object. Those who are better acquainted with international law earnestly trust that before all hope is lost to them our government will address a remonstrance to the Porte, or an appeal to the three powers, whereby the independence of Crete may be hastened or assured. It is difficult for them to understand why, in perfect accordance with the spirit of our institutions and the policy of our government, we cannot, as a powerful and independent nation, use the force of argumentative appeal in behalf of a valiant and long suffering people whose sole desire is to govern themselves by right of nationality, religion, language, and liberty. I have very pleasantly discussed the "Cretan question," which is, in fact, the Greek question at present, with Photiades Bey, the Turkish minister, a very intelligent and agreeable gentleman. While his remarks did not materially confirm, they did not disturb an impression which I entertain, that the Sultan's principal objection to the relinquishment of Crete is the apprehension that the precedent would lead to insurrections in his northern provinces, and that, if he felt secure against what we must admit is a not unlikely consequence, he would, under moderate pressure, rid himself of a costly and annoying appendage. It is not difficult to imagine that the debt which Great Britain is permitting Turkey to accumulate may be extinguished by the peaceable cession of Crete to the former; a solution of the question which France, in view of her own possessions further east, might not consider it prudent to oppose.

As Greece is unquestionably the fountain-head of the insurrection in Crete, and from which its sustenance has been drawn throughout the struggle, there is not much probability that the people of this kingdom will abandon the cause which they have so long and ardently espoused.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Athens, July 4, 1868.

SIR: I have received from our consuls at Canea, in Crete, and at Syra, confirmatory reports of a recent act of atrocity on the part of the Ottoman soldiers in Crete, of which the French consul is said to have been an eye-witness, the details of which have been furnished me, as per copy herewith, by the Greek minister for foreign affairs.

I receive with very great caution many of the reports in circulation from that distracted region, and I certainly shall not bring any to your notice which do not appear to be supported by corroborative evidence. Such enormities as are here said to have been committed on defenceless old men, women and children, be the number of victims small or great, do not come within the "horrors of war," but seem to be the result of fanatical passions which the Turkish authorities, however much disposed to do so, cannot control. If, for want of means to continue the struggle, the Cretan insurgents are finally compelled to lay down their arms, I confess I do not see what protection to life and honor will be afforded them in the midst of a Turko-Cretan population who will be masters of the situation, and without moral restraints. Fortunately, or unfortunately for the people of Crete, the olive crop promises to be abundant, and in a few weeks will be ready to be gathered in. It is not however probable that the Turks will permit this harvesting on the part of their enemies. In such case will the temptation of oil and food be too strong to be resisted by the impoverished and half-fed Christians? If they continue the struggle in the face of such discouragements as are now gathering thickly around them, it will be an appeal for European intervention which the neutral powers can hardly withstand. A Greek gentleman called upon me yesterday with a letter from a member of the so-called provisional government of Crete, in which he is requested to ask me what would be the probable success of an appeal from the people of Crete for "protection from the United States." I reminded him that matters pertaining to the subjects of the Sultan do not fall within the province of this legation.

OFFICIAL ACCOUNT OF THE MASSACRE IN CRETE.

[Translation.]

News has been received from Heraclea (Candia) bearing date June 10-22.

The 3d-15th of that month the native Ottomans, numbering about 2,000, formed themselves under the eyes of the local authority, and even with its approval, into a corps denominated Zourida, i. e., free corps, with the well-understood intention of making an incursion into the province of Pediade. They wished to avenge themselves for their late defeats, and they thought that, by the pillage and massacre of those Cretans who had already made their submission, they might accelerate the termination of the insurrection.

In fact, these bandits fell upon the villages of Embaro, Panagis, Sgouro, Kephali, Kassano, Martha, Karavadis, Meliarades, and Kassemis, and after completely sacking them, carrying off all kinds of animals and property, they put to death more than one hundred persons of both sexes, and returned in triumph, the 5-17th of that month, to the city of Heraclea, where they sold their booty without molestation.

The 4-16th of the same month, a detached party of the same corps put to death, in the village of Bedia, seven other villagers. The number of victims sacrificed in this manner between May 31st-June 12th and June 12-24th.

P. S.—Recent intelligence from Heraclea informs us that after this massacre the general government of Candia proceeded to Heraclea, under pretext of making an investigation and of punishing the guilty parties, but really in order to attenuate the atrocities committed. But the French consul in Candia had also gone in person to the places, the 14-26, and after obtaining authentic information on their acts of vandalism, he was convinced that they were in fact perpetrated by Ottomans.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, July 10, 1868.

SIR: I have had occasion to bring to your notice the flattering reception which I have met with in my official capacity at the hands of this government and people. These manifestations of sympathy with the United States continue. Monseigneur Théophile, the metropolitan archbishop, the head of the synod, and the highest ecclesiastical authority in Greece, called officially upon me a few days since. He wore the robe and insignia of his office, and the visit was intended to be marked and significant. I inclose a newspaper report, which appears to be substantially correct, of the remarks of his Holiness on the occasion.

* * * * *

Within a few days the Chamber has completed the much-prolonged and disputed "verification" of the recent popular elections. The result is that out of the one hundred and eighty deputies, twenty-seven have been excluded from the national parliament. Of these, fourteen were of the ministerial party, and thirteen of the opposition. It remains to be seen what will be the result of the re-election which will now be ordered to take place in the disputed districts. The well-established popularity of several of the rejected deputies cannot fail to cause them to be returned by their constituents in spite of the efforts of the ministerial party to keep them out of the Chamber.

* * * * *

Mr. Erskine, the British minister, informs me that the reported massacre in Crete, which I brought to your notice in my last dispatch, is fully confirmed by subsequent investigation, although the number of victims, as usual in such reports, is exaggerated. The Turkish authorities on the island are said to have been "highly incensed" at the barbarous acts of their soldiers, and to have caused many of the troops to be imprisoned. The governor general has also issued orders of a pacific character, but the insurgents have no faith whatever in Turkish statements or promises of reform.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[From the Athens Courier, of July 3, 1868.]

[Translation.]

On the 27th of July, about noon, his Holiness the metropolitan bishop of Athens, accompanied by Dr. Gondas, as his interpreter, called upon his excellency Mr. Tuckerman, the United States minister. The customary compliments having passed, the bishop addressed Mr. Tuckerman as follows:

"YOUR EXCELLENCY: As a man who participated in our great struggle, which commenced in 1821 and which still continues, and as the head of the Greek clergy, I come to express to you, the representative of the great American nation, the gratitude of my companions in arms, not only those belonging to the orthodox clergy, but those of the entire Greek nation, for the many benefits of every kind which, not only during the old war, but during the present struggle in Crete, your countrymen have conferred upon the Christians of the east, who are fighting for religion, country, and liberty.

"I pray your excellency to transmit this expression of our deep thankfulness to your whole nation, and if it be possible, to every American citizen. Tell them what they have done for Greece is written in indelible characters on the Hellenic heart, and will be transmitted from generation to generation. The clergy of Greece will ever pray for the peace and prosperity of the world, but above all for these two nations, so closely bound together by the ties of friendship and of sympathy. Without the beneficence of America, the difficulties of our great struggle would have been much greater, and but for her generous aid many Cretan widows and orphans would have perished of hunger and of cold. May God bless the American benefactors of the Christians in the east!"

His excellency the minister resident of the United States thanked the bishop for his kind words, and expressed his sense of the honor conferred upon him by this visit. "The people of the United States," he remarked, "are well aware of the religious element in Greece, and how signally it was illustrated at the earliest period of her war of independence, when the patriotic archbishop of old Patras lifted the standard of the cross in the Peloponnesus, and inspired his countrymen with courageous determination. In the United States," his excellency continued, "although every form of religious worship is tolerated, perfect harmony exists; and although church has no connection with state, yet the safety of the state is based upon the religious and intellectual education of the people. It must be always so in Greece, and if ever peace and concord shall reign in the four corners of the earth, the result will be owing to the efforts of Christian teachers in spreading the influences of the gospel." The minister thought that perhaps an exaggerated importance is given to the sympathy of his countrymen for Greece. It is but the natural expression of the Christian mind, to conceal which would be an affectation.

In conclusion, his excellency the minister assured the metropolitan bishop that it would be his pleasure as well as his duty to transmit to the American people the words of sympathy and good will which had just been so feelingly uttered.

Mr. Tuckerman to Mr. Seward.

No. 8.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, July 18, 1868.

SIR: After an active debate, the Chamber, on Tuesday last, accepted the "Address to the King," as prepared and approved by the majority of the committee.

Within a few days the Greek government has come to an understanding with the Belgian company, Langrand-Dumoncean, whereby the latter agrees to construct three connecting lines of railroad within the limits of Greece proper, without expense to this government; the latter conceding the necessary land required therefor, and certain mining and other privileges, and participating in the profits of the enterprise with the ultimate right of purchase. The estimated cost of construction is 140,000,000 of drachmas, say $23,000,000, and the time seven years. These lines are to traverse the kingdom from Cape Sunium to the frontiers of Turkey, connecting the principal ports of the Peloponnesus with the isthmus of Corinth and with Athens, forming rapid communication with Brindisi, in southern Italy, and with the Austrian lines leading to middle Europe, and ultimately furnishing "the most direct and rapid route of travel between Europe and India." It would be interesting to dwell upon the details of this important enterprise, had not experience shown that "agreements" of such a nature, in Greece, are by no means guarantees of their accomplishment. This remark is no reflection upon the Greek character, since this enterprise, like that of the still uncompleted road between Athens and the Piræus, is exclusively in the hands of foreigners.

Mr. Stillman, in a recent dispatch from Canea, reports several conflicts between the insurgents and the soldiers of the Sultan, with results not wholly in favor of the former. The small steamer Enosis has again successfully run the blockade, delivering a cargo of food, clothing, and ammunition. A considerable portion of the first two articles was shipped by the "American relief committee." In the regularity and number of her trips the Enosis is likely to equal the famous Arkadi. While this pendulum swings between Greece and Crete the movements of the insurgents will not be suspended. It is estimated here that the Cretan insurrection has cost the Porte upwards of $70,000,000. A Turkish authority recently admitted to me that it had cost not less than $15,000,000. The revenue of the island of Crete, in time of peace, is stated at 10,000,000 of francs, or about $2,000,000. The conflict is disastrous to Turkey, Candia, and Greece beyond any calculation in figures, and humiliating as it must be to the Ottoman government to admit that the two years' waste of men and money is not likely to be compensated by the voluntary return of the Cretans to their allegiance, it is equally unfortunate for the people of Greece that this disturbing question is no nearer a settlement. It absorbs the popular mind, interferes with the circulation of national industry, and is productive of internal dissension.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Tuckerman to Mr. Seward.

No. 9.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, August 1, 1868.

SIR: The budget for 1868 has just been presented to the national chamber. The revenue is estimated at 33,508,000 drachmas—say $5,500,000—being an excess of 1,215,665 over that of last year, owing to the prospect of abundant crops and increased revenue from imports. The public expenditure is estimated at 34,047,986, being in excess of the expenditure of last year 3,410,516. It is not improbable, in view of additional appropriations for extraordinary purposes, that the public expenditure will fully reach, if indeed it does not exceed, 39,000,000 drachmas. I shall on a future occasion endeavor to give you a comprehensive statement of the financial condition of this kingdom; as no recent official statements have been made, I must await the promised report of the minister of finance.

The Grand Duchess Alexandra Joséfoona, the mother of the Queen of Greece, accompanied by her son, the Grand Duke Nicholas, are at present the guests of her Majesty. The imperial party was joined for a few days by the Grand Duke Alexis, third son of the Emperor of Russia. A series of fêtes has been given to the duchess and her family since their arrival, and the diplomatic corps has been formally presented to the distinguished visitors. On this occasion the grand duchess expressed to me her strong feelings of interest in the United States, and, adverting to the reception of our naval officers at St. Petersburg, hoped that we were satisfied with the hospitalities which had been extended by the government of Russia to these officials; to which I suitably responded.

In a previous dispatch I called your attention to the promising condition of the olive crop in the island of Candia, and suggested that it might affect the duration of the struggle for nationality. An end, however, has been put to any questions of this nature, by the acts of the Turkish soldiers, who, according to a report from Mr. Stillman, recently received by me, "have ventured on a course of devastation, which since Omer Pasha's time has been disavowed. Olive trees are destroyed by wholesale, and the loss is not that of the insurgents only, but of the island and the rich proprietors, who, as a general thing, have been averse to the movement." The Turkish government in Crete have ordered all Cretans who have families in Greece to bring them back, under pain of confiscation. I am not of opinion that this measure will have much effect upon the refugees here, who are disposed to remain while the government and relief committees continue to support them. A few families have, however, within a fortnight returned to Crete under the auspices, as he himself informs me, of Photiades Bey, the Turkish minister at Athens. A good deal of disease exists at present among the insurgents in Crete which relaxes the strength of the warfare. I append the copy of a petition which a portion of the insurgent military chiefs have recently addressed to Queen Victoria, but which others of the "general assembly of Cretans" are said to have disapproved of, as being a confession of weakness "unworthy a valiant people struggling for the right of self-government," and which virtually places them "at the mercy of Great Britain."

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[Translation.]

The undersigned, military chieftains of the Christian people of Crete, having assembled to-day, July 2, 1868, at Asomaton, in the province of Amari, and having taken into consideration the decree which has been submitted to us as a project, and which is conceived in the following terms:

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE CRETANS,

Confiding in the noble and liberal sentiments of the great English nation, and the Cretan people relying upon it, decrees:

The Christian people of Crete founds its entire hopes upon the noble and humane solicitude of her Majesty Queen Victoria, begs her to take into consideration the holiness and justness of its cause and the great sacrifices which it has always made for its triumph, and to give her immediate succor for the speedy realization of the national aspirations, and by putting an end to a struggle so sanguinary and so unequal, add another noble and generous act to those which grace her crown and the glorious history of the great English nation.

The provisional government of Crete is charged to transmit the present decree.

Having taken into consideration this decree and having fully examined it, we favor and demand its textual adoption by the general assembly of the Cretans, and its transmission without loss of time by the provisional government of Crete to its destination.

CRETE, July 14, 1868.

The military chieftains.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Athens, August 6, 1868.

SIR: At a late hour last evening, I received a dispatch from Admiral Farragut, dated on yesterday, "off Syra," informing me that he was on his way to Constantinople with the United States steamers Franklin and Frolic, and requesting me to telegraph for a firman for the latter vessel to pass the Dardanelles, with himself and staff; which I accordingly did. The admiral also informed me that he arrived off Syra "in time to join in the congratulations of the people of Greece to their sovereign, upon the safe delivery of her Majesty of her first-born." The birth of an hereditary heir to the crown of Greece, which formed the subject of my last dispatch, continues to elicit from the people and the press expressions of unaffected satisfaction. * * * A native-born prince, who indeed, if he reigns, will be in fact the first Greek King recorded in history; who, in conformity with the Hellenic constitution, must profess the tenets of the orthodox or "Greek" church, will do more to fix the wavering mind upon the inevitability of monarchism in Greece, than could any event or circumstance at the present time. Whatever dreams of republicanism may have at times disturbed the popular mind here, the true friends of the Hellenic race cannot but perceive that such ideas are incompatible with the character of the people and the political surroundings of the kingdom.

The ministerial counsel is, I think, more a unit than it has been, upon the necessity for providing funds for the support of the Cretan refugees, and thus indirectly supporting the insurgent movement in Candia. Some differences have heretofore existed on this head, not from want of interest in the struggling Cretans, but solely from financial considerations. The outside pressure has, however, overruled these objections and the refugees will continue to be sustained at the public charge. The opposition has pressed the government for an explanation of the apparent apathy on its part with regard to the affairs of Crete. The answer has been, that at a proper time the correspondence will show that no apathy exists; and that the present government has done more for Crete than the preceding ministry. With this answer the interrogators profess to be content. I have reason to believe that remonstrances to this government on the part of France have been of so unequivocal a character as to account in a measure for the seeming inactivity of the ministry in Cretan affairs.

I have the honor to be, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

The joint resolution of Congress in behalf of Cretan autonomy, which passed July 20, two days after your acknowledgment of my dispatch containing a suggestion of a similar character, has been received here with unqualified satisfaction, and great interest is expressed in the forthcoming letter of the Secretary of State to our minister at Constantinople, in pursuance of said resolution. This resolution of Congress, passed by a unanimous vote, was declared by Mr. Myers, representative from Pennsylvania, "to be responsive to the wishes of the American people." It is so regarded here, and hopes are being built upon it by the sanguine people of Greece, which I fear will not be fully realized. This expression, however, on the part of the United States, comes at an opportune moment. The apathy of Europe, as regards the Cretan question, the inability of the Greek government and people to offer material aid to the insurgents in Candia, and the wretched physical condition of those people, have of late driven them to a condition of almost hopelessness. In their despair they cry aloud for help and look towards the United States with an earnestness which inspires sympathy in the beholder. Indeed, it is impossible to hear, as I do almost daily, the passionate appeals of the representatives of these valiant and suffering people, without emotion. The political solution of the Cretan question becomes of far less importance than the immediate question of relief to these sufferers—sufferers whose cause, even if it were a bad one, has been upheld with such confidence, patience, and heroism, as to entitle it to the earnest consideration and decisive action of the neutral powers. As a citizen and public servant of the United States, I fervently hope that the appeal of our government to the Porte in behalf of the people of Crete will result in positive reforms, which sooner or later may lead to the entire independence of the island of Candia.

Referring to the enclosures herewith, I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES. K. TUCKERMAN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

NOTE.

The national assembly of the Cretans and the provisional government of Crete have issued the following decrees:

Considering the continual demonstrations in the United States in behalf of our sacred struggle, and the aid of various kinds that continues to be sent from America in support of our war of independence and for the relief of the victims of Turkish ferocity, the national assembly of the Cretans decrees:

1st. The deep gratitude of the people of Crete to the people of the United States of America shall be made known to our American benefactors.

2d. The provisional government shall carry into effect the present decree.

BRYSAI OF AMARION, CRETE, August 1-13, 1868.

A PAPPAYANNAKES,

President.

[Here follow the names of the members.]

The provisional government of Crete to the people of the United States of America:

The general assembly of the Cretans has charged us by its decree of the 1-13th instant to communicate to you, in the name of the people of Crete, an expression of our deep gratitude for the aid of every kind sent by you in support of our sacred struggle, as well as for the relief of the victims of Turkish ferocity. We thank you also for the boundless sympathy you evince in behalf of a people fighting for the recovery of their freedom.

The philhellenism now manifested in America reminds us of what was done in your glorious country during the panhellenic war of independence which commenced in 1821; and we perceive with the greatest pleasure that the children of the American philhellenes of that period have proved worthy of their parents.

With heartfelt gratitude to the American people for their generous contributions to Crete, we feel assured that you will continue to accord your material and moral support to the most sacred and legitimate of causes, a cause which, from its special character and the unprecedented sufferings attending it, has become worthy of the sympathies of every civilized nation.

BRYSAI OF AMARION IN CRETE, August, 1868.

General Secretary.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, September 10, 1868.

SIR: The United States flag-ship Franklin, under command of Admiral David G. Farragut, accompanied by the United States steamer Frolic, Captain Harmony, arrived at the Piræus, port of Athens, from Constantinople, on the afternoon of Monday, 31st of August. The acting United States consul immediately proceeded on board and was received with the customary salute. On the following day the admiral and suite visited Athens and at once called at this legation, where it afforded me the highest gratification to receive them. We soon after proceeded to pay the customary official visits, and the admiral and suite were presented by me to the prime minister, the ministers of foreign affairs, of justice, of religion, and education, and subsequently to the ministers of marine and of war. We also called upon all the members of the diplomatic corps resident at Athens. The admiral was received with great cordiality by all these officials, each of whom alluded to his illustrious career and expressed much pleasure at being brought in contact with him. On the following day the admiral and his family were visited by many of the residents of Athens.

Thursday, September 3d, being the day appointed for the public baptism of the prince royal, was observed with much pomp and ceremony; the buildings were decorated with flags and devices; business was suspended, and the people gave themselves up to general rejoicings. The ceremony at the cathedral was in the highest degree imposing. The edifice was crowded with the chief representatives of church and state, and presented a magnificent spectacle. Prominent places were reserved in the cathedral for the diplomatic corps and for the admirals and commanders of ships-of-war, all of which bodies were present.

The god-parents of Prince Constantine are the Queen and Prince Royal of Denmark, the Princess of Wales, the Grand Duchess Alexandra Josephovna of Russia, who held the child during the ceremony; the Duke Joseph, of Saxe-Altenburg, and the Grand Duke Nicholas. On the same day the King and Queen received the diplomatic corps at the palace, on which occasion, by previous arrangement, I had the honor to present Admiral Farragut and the officers of the Franklin to their Majesties. The King received each with a cordial grasp of the hand, and an expression of hearty good will. On approaching the Grand Duchess Alexandra, her Highness advanced from her position to take the hand of the admiral and to repeat the assurances of Russian sympathy with the United States, which have been so emphatically expressed to the officers of the United States navy whenever circumstances have brought them in contact with any of the members of the imperial household. On the same evening, the admiral and suite met the American residents of Athens at the house of the United States minister. On Friday, the 4th, Mrs. Farragut was presented to the Queen by the wife of the minister, and on that evening the admiral and suite were present, by invitation of the King, at a grand banquet given at the palace to the diplomatic corps, government officials, and other distinguished guests, on the occasion of the baptismal fête. The seats assigned at table to the officers of the Franklin were directly in front of the King. His Majesty, in compliment to these guests, wore the naval uniform. During the dinner he pledged their healths, which was the only toast drunk by him on the occasion. On Saturday, the 5th, I made my official call on board the Franklin, and received the usual salute. Later in the day, the Greek officials and diplomatic corps visited the ship and were saluted. The King having expressed his desire, and that of the Grand Duchess Alexandra Josephovna, to visit the Franklin, Monday, the 7th of September, at 1½ o'clock, was named by him for the visit. At the appointed hour, his Majesty, accompanied by the Grand Duchess and the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia, the mother and the brother of the Queen of Greece, went on board with their respective suites. I was present with the admiral and officers to receive the distinguished guests. The King was in the naval uniform. The Grand Duchess wore a necklace of precious stones, and upon her breast a ribbon, both decorations representing the emblematic colors of the United States. After the royal salute, the visitors were conducted over the ship, which they examined with interest, expressing admiration at the condition and appointments of the Franklin, which indeed reflect great credit upon the commanding officer, Commodore Pennock, as well as upon the admiral and the Navy Department. The royal and imperial party were then received in the admiral's cabin by Mrs. Farragut, and partook of a collation. The most significant point in this visit was its duration, the Grand Duchess intentionally prolonging her stay on board to nearly three hours, a circumstance which emphasized the national compliment, and which did not fail to cause comment in official circles here. This account would fail to be complete did I omit to mention that during the repast on board the Franklin his Majesty the King was pleased to drink my health with this sentiment: "To our perpetual friendship, and to the perpetual friendship of the two nations." On the same evening, Admiral Farragut honored me with his presence at dinner. Besides the members of his staff, there were present the ministers of foreign affairs and of marine, and the Turkish, British, and Russian ambassadors, with their wives. On the day of her arrival, and during the stay of the Franklin in these waters, she excited great interest among the Cretan refugees. Thousands of these poor sufferers lined the shore or gathered around the vessel in boats. Several petitions and addresses were presented to the admiral on their behalf, which were kindly received, and before sailing the admiral and officers made a liberal contribution in money and clothing, for the relief of the refugee women and children of Crete. On the 7th instant, in consequence of a telegram received from our minister at Constantinople, the admiral dispatched the Frolic, Captain D. B. Harmony, to the Turkish island of Scio, to investigate the circumstances of the arrest of a Greek, said to be a harbor-master, in the employ of the United States consular agent at that place. Captain Harmony returned yesterday from this expedition, and has reported the result of his investigations to Mr. Morris by letter. He is not of opinion that any further action on his part is called for in the premises. The admiral, with the vessels under his command, left the port of Athens this morning at an early hour for Trieste. I visited the flag-ship last evening, and expressed to the admiral and officers the great satisfaction which their visit has afforded to the government and people of Greece, the evidence of which is everywhere manifested. "Tell them," said an intelligent Greek publicist to me, "that Greece has to-day but one sincere friend, and that is the United States."

At the time of the Franklin's visit, there were lying in the port of Athens the French frigate Thémis, 50 guns, and French brig Rolando, the former having on board the admiral; also the Russian flag-ship Minerva, Admiral Bontakow.

I feel that, for obvious reasons, I need not apologise for having brought to your notice many of the details of Admiral Farragut's reception at Athens.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,
CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES.
Athens, September 19, 1868.

SIR: The reassembling of the Chamber of Deputies, the premature dispersion of which some weeks ago caused much discomfiture to the ministerial party, is now expected to take place during the coming week. The members who are now in Athens are, however, few in number, and it is apprehended that a majority will not be present for some weeks, in which case the vote on the budget will be yet further postponed. The newspaper reports of "conflicts" between the troops sent to the province of C tylon to preserve order, and the friends of M. Commoudouro, the opposition candidate, who wished to force an election, are unfounded. The government seems disposed to postpone to an indefinite period the re-elections in the disputed districts, and popular feeling is much excited thereby, but as yet there have been no serious disturbances of the peace.

A few hundred more of Cretan refugees have returned to the island, under the auspices of the Turkish legation at Athens. The embarkation of these people has been seriously opposed by their fellow-countrymen here, and it has been found necessary to employ a guard to protect their departure. From Crete itself I have detailed information, from a reliable witness, who has passed two months with the insurgents, that there is no evidence whatever of a falling off in the enthusiasm of the Cretan chiefs or soldiers. The whole body of the latter actually under arms, or in a position to be so at any moment, numbers but seven thousand. They, however, have possession of the greater portion of the mountain-ranges extending from a point on the southern coast near Sphakia, and extending easterly and northeasterly, including the range of Mount Ida in Central Crete. This shows, nominally, about one-half of the territorial surface of the island in the possession of the insurgents, while the flat country is held by the soldiers of the Sultan, against the cavalry attacks of which it would be impossible for the insurgent troops to stand. The mountain defenses being equally insurmountable by the Turks, it follows that, with a sufficiency of food and ammunition, this "guerilla," but not, as has been stated by the London Times, "thieves'" warfare, may be kept up for an indefinite period. Certainly, we may look for its continuance all the coming winter, should no foreign intervention occur. I think there exists no doubt of the fact that the Greek government and the "central committee" are in accord on the subject of the Cretan struggle, and that the popular pressure will force means of supply, in defiance of attempts on the part of the conservative element to let Crete alone.

The Cretan insurrection has probably cost the Greek government, thus far, 15,000,000 of drachmas, say $2,500,000, which is a very serious sum in view of the state of the treasury and condition of the finances.

The provisional government of Crete has received, as I am privately informed from an official source, an intimation from Mr. Elliot, her Majesty's representative at Constantinople, that the recent appeal of the Cretans to the British Crown will be ineffective. It is now proposed by the insurgent chiefs to address a joint memorial to the three powers. Much interest continues to be expressed in the note which, it is understood, Mr. Morris expects to receive from the Secretary of State in accordance with the resolution of Congress in behalf of Crete.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Athens, October 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your three dispatches of August 31, Nos. 7, 8, and 9.

The national Chamber of Deputies resumed its sittings on Monday last, and with a fair prospect of disposing of various important questions, which the unexpected adjournment of the chamber had left in a very unsatisfactory condition. It was evident at that time that a partial if not an entire change in the ministry must be effected, in order to reconcile parties on pending questions, many of which were to be made the handles for more violent personal attacks upon the ministry by the opposition. It was as evident to the partisans as to the opposers of the prime minister, that no important measure could be carried without more harmony also among the friends of the administration. Under pressure from the latter, Mr. Bulgaris consented to receive the resignations of Mr. Simos, minister of finance, and Mr. Barboglis, minister of justice. The successor of the former, Mr. Balassopoulou, and of the latter, Mr. Antonopoulou, have served in former ministries. Mr. Simos, the retiring minister of finance, is universally recognized as a man of marked ability and integrity, and one not easily replaced in the peculiar department in which he has served. Whether those who demand a more liberal employment of the public funds will be gratified in this respect by the new administrator, remains to be seen. An empty treasury, and full appropriations for every drachma of revenue, with a deficit of many millions, if the present "extraordinary" expenses continue, offer little opportunity for either extravagance or economy. One of the motives for the change of ministers—which does not appear publicly—is the necessity which exists for certain changes in the personnel of the judges, before the consummation of the act which makes the members of the courts of adjudication, of appeal, and of accounts, irremovable. This act goes into effect on the 17th of November next. Mr. Bulgaris is said to have made other concessions to his friends, particularly in respect to the "distinction of the powers," which have tended to strengthen his position. This was shown in the vote upon the question of the royal ordinance, which conferred upon the prince royal the title of the "Duke of Sparta." It was contended that this decree is contrary to that provision of the constitution which forbids titles of nobility in Greece, and that it is likewise "at variance with Hellenic manners and traditions." The president of the council, Mr. Bulgaris, declared that the constitution "opposed all inequalities of condition between Greek citizens; but this did not concern the members of the royal family." The minister was sustained by seventy-eight voices against twenty-six, a majority which, as indicating strength in more important matters, promises a longer continuance of the present ministry than was anticipated at the close of the last session. I think that I perceive in the government, as at present organized, a more independent action with regard to foreign affairs, and, if I mistake not, this will result in open expressions of displeasure on the part of England and France, whose material interest it manifestly is to stop Greek agitation, particularly on the subject of Crete. This seems, however, a hopeless task; both the struggle itself, and the agitation which initiated and keeps it alive, have become chronic. In Athens, the committees of relief have lately received fresh contributions of funds—from what source does not appear—and these seem to be sufficient to sustain the refugees in Greece, and the fighting Greeks in Crete, for several months to come. I am privately informed, and have reason to believe the statement, that a body of "volunteers" is being drilled and armed, with the intention of proceeding to Crete to aid the insurgents. This shows the revival of an element which was prominent at the commencement of the war, but which failed of success. But there is nothing in these circumstances which promises any material supremacy to either combatants. The insurgents in Crete have shown themselves unable to meet the conflict at arms on the open field and in the presence of Turkish cavalry. It is equally certain that the mountain-fastnesses are inaccessible to the Turks in any force likely to be sent to face such perils. The warfare may therefore be prolonged indefinitely. This fact should be considered gravely, in considering the action or rather the non-action of the three powers. As to Prussia, whose present weight in the political scale will force her, some time or other, to join in the European sentiment on Greek affairs, I feel assured that her lately increased commercial interests in Turkey will cause her to be found in accord with Great Britain and France. It is thus evident that the American idea with regard to Greece, to say nothing of Crete, is not that of Europe, and that it will be ineffective against such material interests as I have hinted at, unless pronounced in the most unequivocal terms and with an emphasis which shall command for it attention. The King is about to return from Cephissia, where for some weeks past he has remained in camp, living the life of a soldier, while in command of the regiments which have been encamped there during the summer. The Greek government has just signed a contract for fifteen thousand "Remington" United States rifles, for the use of the army.

I have the honor to be, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
 CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

No. 18.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, October 17, 1868.

SIR: The affairs of Crete have assumed a new phase, which, viewed from this point, is significant. An assembly calling itself "the representatives of the Cretan people," took place recently at Lividia, province of Milopotamo, in Crete, at which an address to the foreign ministers at Constantinople was signed by certain chiefs among the insurgents.

I inclose a translation of this address, or petition, which has not yet appeared in print. The chief point, as you will perceive, is, that these insurrectionary leaders express themselves willing, under certain guarantees, to acknowledge the sovereignty of the Sultan, and to abandon the project of the annexation of Crete to Greece. Although this appeal is signed by a portion only of the Cretan chiefs, while such prominent men as Criari, Koraka, Spakiaraki, and other chiefs of the insurrection, have not signed it, and very likely will publicly repudiate it, it cannot be denied that the moral effect of the measure will seriously prejudice the cause of the insurgents. The division of sentiment among those who direct their military affairs is of itself sufficient to awaken grave doubts as to further important successes in arms. With the great object of ultimate independence removed from before their eyes, it can scarcely be supposed that the vigor and determination which have heretofore characterized the insurrection will be sustained. The public admission on the part of even a small number of the chiefs, that annexation to Greece is no longer to be regarded as a sine qua non, will serve to relax the efforts of Greece in behalf of the insurgents, without whose inspiration the insurrection would never have been commenced, and without whose aid it would long since have failed from inanition. This movement in Crete is doubtless the result of English counsel, and shows it to be recognized as the expression of the general desire of the Christian population of the island. An effort will doubtless be made by the powers to effect a compromise with the Porte. It remains to be seen how far the more important leaders in the insurrection will be able to neutralize the effect of this action by a more emphatic declaration of their own intention to prosecute the war until the independence of Crete is acknowledged by Turkey. Meanwhile, notwithstanding an effort which is made here to treat this affair as of no particular significance, it is evident that unusual exertions will be required on the part of the insurgents in Crete, and the friends of "the cause" here, to overcome the public disappointment which the reception of this news has caused. But disappointment is not the word to express the feeling which would be aroused in Greece should the long-cherished idea of Cretan annexation to Greece fall to the ground in consequence of this appeal. Too many millions of drachmas and too much political energy have been expended by Greece, during the last two years, to achieve an object which, if frustrated without some compensating advantage, would lead to internal dissensions threatening the very safety of the state. It is easy to foresee that in the event of the Cretan failure, causes will be assigned not wholly consistent with the facts of the case, and that the shafts of the opposition will be leveled with redoubled power against the Greek government. This party has not hesitated for many months past to attribute the languishing condition of the Cretan warfare to the apathy of the present ministry, if not, indeed, to the premeditated intention of the prime minister to support the British policy. However bitter might be the feeling of the people of Greece towards their fellow-countrymen of Crete for having unnecessarily and ungratefully abandoned the contest, which if persistently pursued might have led to independence and annexation, they would probably refrain from irritating accusations, in the hope of yet attaining the desired object under more favorable circumstances. Certainly Greece will never abandon a claim which her sympathies and material interests have caused her to labor for with such persistent devotion for so long a period, and which her personal sacrifices have in a manner established as her right. Under these circumstances, I do not believe that any compromising measures can secure to the Cretan question a permanent solution, or that any form of allegiance to a government which these people detest can secure permanent peace to the nation or satisfy the requirements of the protecting powers. As the United States have openly advocated the right and the necessity of Cretan independence, so I believe it will be found that any measures short of this will, in the end, be unsatisfactory to Europe. Great Britain is, from her present position, the most fitting arbiter, so far as her influence upon the Ottoman government is concerned, in the question of Crete. Unfortunately, Great Britain entertains a contrary opinion, believing that her own interests are better conserved by the maintainance of the status quo. In this policy she apparently forgets the teaching of one of her own eminent statesmen, and which political experience has most thoroughly exemplified in the case of the Greek and the Turk, viz, that "forms and stipulations can never unite populations which are dissevered by sympathy."

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES K. TUCKERMAN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[Translation.]

The Christian people of Crete, who took up arms more than two years ago, determined to regain their liberty, and who have carried on an unequal contest against all the forces of the Ottoman empire, have witnessed with fortitude and self-sacrifice their sacred temples profaned and destroyed, their homes and lands pillaged and burnt, their innocent and helpless women and children either insulted and killed, or dying from hunger and cold, and their brethren and relatives falling in various battles, looked upon their national re-establishment and political union with free Greece as the only full compensation for their past and present efforts.

As, however, the Christian powers of Europe have not, up to the present time, agreed to put a stop to the shedding of blood and to carry out the national wishes of the Cretan people, they (the Cretans) have chosen as their representatives the gentlemen whose names are given below, and have authorized them to apply to those Christian powers of Europe who signed the treaty of 1856, at Paris, and to entreat them to negotiate that this people may obtain a form of government recognizing in reality the sovereignty of his Majesty the Sultan over the island, but established on a basis which will secure the equality, prosperity, and progress of both races. In accordance with the wishes of the Cretan people we, the undersigned, met together, and after mature deliberation have decided that the form of government suitable to the necessities and circumstances of the people, guaranteeing their prosperity and progress, and preventing similar misfortunes in future, is the one herewith inclosed, which we submit to your excellency, and through you to the government of the United States. We hope the government of the United States will take into consideration the past and present efforts of the Cretan people, and will act as it thinks best, that they may obtain their just demands and a cessation of hostilities, so that further misery and bloodshed may be prevented.

The Christian people of Crete, recognizing the deep sympathy of the American people towards them, and being deeply grateful to the noble nation for the assistance rendered to their suffering women and children, consider it their duty to communicate to your excellency the petition to the representatives of the six great European powers, and they hope that your excellency will use your influence to bring about a cessation of hostilities and the fulfillment of their just demands. To this end the following gentlemen, Corta, Voladaki, &c., have been instructed to forward this petition, and to continue the negotiations for our demands, and to receive an answer from the ambassador.

Your most obedient and humble servants,

SIR: * * * * *

The unsatisfactory condition of the Cretan question has embittered the public mind and accounts for much of the acerbity in the discussions of the Chamber. It seems to be the generally received opinion here that the disaffection of the chiefs, as recently reported to you, is a blow from which the insurrection can scarcely recover. Some unexpected political turn in the European combination may impart new vigor, but at the moment it looks as if the affair would dwindle to proportions which will permit a freer exercise of power on the part of the Turkish authorities in Crete than circumstances have for a long time past permitted; it may even go so far as the acknowledged recognition of the Ottoman supremacy; but unless the character of the people of Crete has been totally misrepresented and the aspirations of the Greek nation grossly exaggerated, the spirit of revolution in that island will but slumber, restlessly, until opportunity gives fresh occasion for revolt. This will be the conclusion drawn by the people of this kingdom, even should the war in Crete be officially recognized as being at an end. The independence of Crete and its eventual annexation to Greece is regarded as an absolute political necessity, the progress, and, indeed, the life of the kingdom being dependent upon its territorial enlargement. This may be considered as a tenet of the political faith of Greece, hence any check which the Cretan movement may receive will be a postponement, not an abandonment, of the struggle for independence.

* * * * *

A report, said to be official, of the actual number of Cretan emigrants in Greece, has been circulated by the French legation here; this shows but 39,269 left from the original number, generally reported at 60,000. It is known that many have died from exposure and want of food before the necessary arrangements could be effected for their well-being. This would account for, say, 5,000, principally children. The Turkish minister informs me that between 4,000 and 5,000 have returned to Crete under his auspices, which leaves some 11,000 unaccounted for. It is important to keep these statistics before the mind, in view of the contributions which America and other nations have made, and are still making, for the relief of these sufferers. * * *

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, November 7, 1868.

SIR: The National Assembly adjourned on the 5th instant, having voted the budget for 1868, amounting to about 34,000,000 drachmas for the ordinary, and about 12,000,000 drachmas for the "extraordinary" expenses of the kingdom, being greatly in excess of the expenses of any previous year, and leaving a deficit in the treasury of some 10,000,000 or 12,000,000, which can only be provided by a fresh loan. This loan for 25,000,000 of francs has been authorized by the Chambers at five per cent., but with whom can it be negotiated? It is understood that England will take it at the rate of fifty per cent., which would in reality be supplying the amount wanted immediately for current expenses at the annual interest of ten per cent., with an indebtedness added to the nation of twice the sum actually borrowed by it. The efforts of the government to compromise with the holders of the old five per cent. loan of 1824-'25, contracted under circumstances of great national peril at fifty-six and fifty-nine, are impeded by the opposition of the British minister here. It is not improbable that the loan now asked for may be negotiated in England at a better rate than is now offered, if the Greek government will modify its views regarding its ancient indebtedness. Before the adjournment of the Chamber the prime minister proposed a vote of thanks to the United States Congress and people, for their expressions of sympathy in behalf of Crete. The resolution passed unanimously, and the result was received with loud cheers.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Athens, November 14, 1868.

SIR: The result of the presidential election was received here by telegraph on the 9th instant. The triumph of the republican party and the election of General Grant are considered by the government and the people of Greece, so far as I can judge by the expressions of individuals and by the spirit of the public journals, as likely to tend to the restoration of public order at home, and the renewal of confidence abroad. The Greeks sincerely desire the perpetuity and grandeur of the United States, and the congratulations offered to me on this occasion by the members of the government and by leading citizens are but the expressions of the honest sentiments of the people. The name and public services of General Grant are familiar in Greece, and his good judgment, moderation, and firmness of character are believed to be ample guarantees for the future peace, unity, and prosperity of the United States. In this sentiment I most thoroughly concur.

The Greek minister of foreign affairs, her British Majesty's representative, and the minister of his Majesty the King of Italy, have called upon me officially to offer their congratulations on this occasion; and last evening, at a dinner at the Turkish embassy, the other members of the diplomatic corps referred to the quiet and successful election with similar sentiments.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, November 21, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches of October 24, Nos. 11 and 12, the contents of which are duly noted.

The King has convoked an extraordinary session of Parliament, which commenced its sittings yesterday. During this session the government will endeavor to pass certain measures of relief, necessitated by the present unfortunate condition of the finances. The most important of these is the proposed loan of a million of pounds sterling, upon which no definite action was taken at the last session. Should this fail, and the present unsatisfactory relation continue between the government and the national banks, it is not improbable that the former will carry out its threat to issue a paper currency, in the hopes of "tiding over" the existing deficiency. It is scarcely necessary to say that such a course, without a basis of national wealth to sustain these paper promises, would be suicidal. In imitating the acts of greater nations in their hour of need, the Greeks do not sufficiently investigate the differences of condition on the relations of cause and effect.

The public mind has been much disturbed lately by the increasing numbers of returning emigrants to Crete. The opposition hold the government responsible for the humiliating fact that Greece offers no inducement for these refugees to remain, but virtually plays into the hands of Turkey by favoring their departure. I do not think there is the slightest desire on the part of this government to yield a single point in the principle maintained by the Greek people in the Cretan question; but in view of the absolute necessity for economy, and the restlessness of the emigrants themselves, who are illy provided for, and whose friends at home encourage the idea of their return, the government offers no impediment to this backward movement. That these poor creatures desire any change from their present condition is evident from the fact that many hundreds have applied through this legation for passage to the United States. If transportation were practicable, these people are not of a class to benefit themselves or the country by such removal. The industrious Cretan need never be a beggar; unfortunately, these refugees consist mostly of persons who, by age or infirmities, are unable to help themselves. Within a few days public spirit has revived under the reports that a large army of volunteers are about to proceed from Greece to Crete to infuse new vigor into the insurgent cause. The fact is, that about three hundred armed volunteers have actually left, and this number will probably be increased from other parts of Greece to one thousand, under the leadership of a well-known chief. The new French minister, Baron Baudin, has submitted to the Greek government a proposal from a French company to cut a canal through the Isthmus of Corinth. Such a project, as you are aware, has been often mooted, but the present may possess elements which give it probability of fulfillment.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, November 25, 1868.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 25, in which I had the honor to hand you, in original, a decree of the Greek Chamber of Deputies, with accompanying documents, I now inclose translations of the same, together with my reply to the minister of foreign affairs.

The documents sent you last mail, were handed me in advance of the copies which I understand the government intends to forward to the Greek legation at Washington, that I might make such disposition of them as appeared to me best, and I was at the time verbally assured that the sentiments therein expressed applied also to myself as the "sincere and avowed friend of Greece." This decree of thanks originates in a deep-seated sense of gratitude in the hearts of the Greek people, and it would avail nothing were I to attempt to conceal the fact that this sympathy with the United States is heightened and intensified by a reverse sentiment towards the great powers of Western Europe.

Since my official residence here it has been my aim to investigate the political and social condition of the people, in the hope of arriving at an unprejudiced judgment. The efforts of interested parties to warp that judgment have been ingenious, and I may say unremitting; but to the frankness and confidence of the Greek people themselves I am chiefly indebted for an exposé of political defects, which their worst enemies could hardly have portrayed as vividly.

In spite of these evils in government and society, the great fact stands boldly forth that here exists, and in perpetual agitation, an original and distinctive people whose vital breath is liberty. This people can neither be crushed by their neighbor, whose principle is absolute monarchism, nor set aside by the great powers of Western Europe, by whom Greece is regarded as little better than a "political nuisance." These powers are at this moment exercising three distinct influences upon the kingdom; yet all unite in repressing the natural aspirations of her people. Russia's interest in Crete doubtless ends there. The possession of Crete by Greece, in other words, the separation of that island from Turkey, would assist the ambitious views of the Russian government, and so far weaken the anti-church influences of the Porte. It is impossible to say whether Great Britain has any ideas of future territorial conquest in the east of Europe; probably this is a matter of indifference so long as France shows no inclinations in that direction. If the assertions to me of their representatives here are of weight, then Great Britain and France are each "the only true friend which Greece has." The Greeks, however, do not place unbounded faith in such statements, but, on the other hand, knowing that the United States has no territorial interests in the matter and is simply and sincerely desirous that free institutions should succeed wherever they may be planted, give their unbounded confidence to that distant republic, instead of their nearer and less disinterested neighbors. Of that confidence I have been a recipient, as you are aware, from the throne and from the people; not in the way of self-exaltation on their part or flattery towards myself, but in the way of earnest consultation and appeal. On the other hand, I am forced to admit to you that, in spite of the assertion of friendship on the part of the representatives of England and France, I have never once heard from either, in our conversations on the subject, one single word of approbation for the Greek government or her people. The end and object of these powers seem at present to be to keep Greece quiet on external questions, which, if agitated, may affect the so-called "equilibrium" of Europe, but which, if not agitated, will, in the Greek point of view, keep her forever hemmed within limits which her natural aspirations compel her to attempt to expand.

What Greece requires, besides economy of political administration, is a friend whose example in good government shall be strengthened by material influences. Greece has not natural strength enough to rid herself of her own burdens. This strength may come to her, but she must be encouraged to seek it in the right way. She does not find this encouragement in Europe, or thinks she does not, and hence she is loth to let go the hold which she has on American sympathies. That the United States may be of essential service to Greece in her present position appears to admit of no dispute. Shall this service be strictly confined to votes of sympathy by Congress? The Greeks hope that, in the affair of Crete, the United States will feel itself justified in at least urging upon the Christian powers of Europe such interference as will protect the general interests of humanity where "infringed," as they believe in the present case they have been, "by the excesses of a barbarous and despotic government." (Wheaton.) On the other hand, the British minister, Mr. Erskine, expressed to me the other day his surprise that any such interference in the affairs of Crete should be desired on our part, on the ground that this course would be inconsistent with our emphatic remonstrances against interference with our own domestic affairs during the late rebellion in the States. * * * * *

The minister of foreign affairs to Mr. Tuckerman, minister resident of the United States of North America.

ATHENS, November 9-21, 1868.

MR. MINISTER: The Chamber of Deputies, on the last day of its regular session, passed a decree by which it expresses to the Senate, House of Representatives, and people of the United States, the most profound sentiments of acknowledgment for their generous solicitude for the Greek nation.

I have the honor to transmit herewith, in original, the above-mentioned decree; also the translation of the letter in which the president of the legislative body communicates to me the decree in question.

You will notice, Mr. Minister, the unanimous applause with which this decree was greeted by the representatives of the nation. The government of the King, animated by the same sentiments as those of the representatives, esteems itself happy to reiterate this assurance on this occasion.

ATHENS, October 25, 1868. (O. S.)

The Chamber of Deputies, inspired by a national duty, voted at its eighty-fourth sitting, on yesterday, a decree by which it expressed, in the midst of the warmest applause, its profound acknowledgments to the Senate, House of Representatives, and people of the United States of America, for the generous and benevolent sentiments which the great republic has at all times manifested towards the Hellenic nation, and especially in regard to the cause of Candia, and it has requested me to be the interpreter of this national decision.

In fulfilling with pleasure this mission, I have the honor to transmit herewith official copy of the above-mentioned decree, with the request that you will properly communicate the same.

Secretaries.

Copy of decree.

The Hellenic Parliament, in consideration of the generous sentiments which the republic of the United States of America has always manifested for the Greek nation, and moved by the humane and sympathetic words which have been uttered in behalf of Crete by the two houses of Congress, expresses to these bodies, and through them to the magnanimous people of America, its profound gratitude, and confides to the president of the Hellenic Chamber the duty of transmitting this national resolution.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to acknowledge the reception of your communication of the 9th (21st) instant, in which you inform me that the Chamber of Deputies, on the last day of its regular session, passed unanimously, and with enthusiastic applause, a decree of thanks to the Senate, House of Representatives, and people of the United States, for "their generous solicitude for the Hellenic nation." You also hand me, in original, a copy of this decree, accompanied by a copy of the letter in which the president of the Chamber transmits it to you, and you assure me that the government of his Majesty the King is animated by the same sentiments which are expressed by the national representatives.

I thank you, Mr. Minister, and through you the honorable gentlemen of the Chamber of Deputies, for this renewed assurance of international sympathy, as well as for the complimentary manner in which it is communicated through me to my countrymen.

The expressions of interest on the part of the people of the United States for the struggling Christians of Crete are but the utterances of those who would be faithless to the principles which made and preserve them a nation, did they refuse to extend the right hand of fellowship to others, wherever gathered on the earth's surface, who contend for the inestimable right to choose their own rulers.

The people of the United States will consider it a happy circumstance for all the people of eastern Europe, when the policy adopted towards them shall be in conformity with the sentiments which English statesmen have themselves admitted to be a political axiom, namely: Treaties can never unite populations which are dissevered by sympathies. Until this principle is recognized, peace may be maintained by expedients, but can never be secured.

Accept, Mr. Minister, &c., &c.,

CHAS. K. TUCKERMAN.

No. 27.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, December 5, 1868.

SIR: The recent departure of Greek volunteers for Crete, together with the delivery to them of two guns (Armstrong's, 40-pounders) known to have belonged to the national arsenal, threaten for the moment the peaceful relations of the Porte and the Greek government. I am of opinion that the present views of the Turkish ambassador, as expressed by him to me, will be modified. The Greek government denies, of course, any official knowledge of the delivery of these guns to the Cretan agents, and it would be a difficult matter in the present juncture of affairs to fix responsibility upon the authorities. Photiades Bey is apparently waiting to obtain the views of his government in the matter.

This "volunteer movement," be the numbers great or small, has given a less hopeless view to Cretan affairs, although the last news from the island was to the effect that an encounter between the Christians and Turks at Sphakia had resulted disastrously for the insurgents.

After a long reticence on the part of the British ministry with regard to eastern affairs, Lord Stanley, in his recent speech to the electors of Lynn, has broken silence by declaring that "the dangers which menace the Turkish empire to-day are internal," and that neither foreign alliance nor European guarantee can protect a government against financial collapse or rebellion within its own provinces. In those matters every country must be left to work out its own destiny. His lordship goes on to express his "sincere sympathies with the Christians of the East," whose aspirations he admits "may be natural," but he reminds them that "anarchy is not progress, and that it is not wise to pull down that for which they have not provided any substitute." Lord Stanley then addresses himself to Greece in a few phrases, which I embody in a note to this dispatch, together with the comments of the Greek press thereon, that you may see exactly how the English view of the "hellenic idea" is met and refuted by the Greek people. It is the current topic of the hour. The Chamber, since the opening of the new session, has accomplished nothing but the election of a presiding officer, Mr. Drossor, which, owing to divisions in the opposition, enabled the ministerial party to show a strong vote. The budget for 1869 has been submitted to the Chamber; its estimate is 34,423,973 drachmas expenses, against 37,620,200 receipts.

NOTE.

Extract from Lord Stanley's speech at Lynn.

More particularly I would say to Greece—that little state, about which our grandfathers were so enthusiastic, and which we in the present day are inclined, I think, rather unduly to depreciate—you might be the model state of the east; you might exercise over the Christian races there an almost incalculable influence, if, instead of indulging in vague dreams of aggrandizement, you would make your internal government more worthy of those destinies which you believe to be yours in the future. [Hear.] And I would also say, if you adopt a policy of fostering disturbance abroad, you are throwing away the substance for the shadow; you are losing that which you might command, and, after all, it is very doubtful whether you will obtain that which you seek. Gentlemen, that is advice which, tendered in a friendly spirit, may not be wholly useless, and we have interests enough in the east to make that advice worth giving.

[Translation.]

Remarks of "La Grèce," (Greek Journal.)

It is easy for the minister of foreign affairs of Great Britain to speak thus, and for the English people to applaud; but these counsels lose much of their force by being addressed by a people whose nationality is respected by the whole world to a people who suffer under outrages of which they themselves are the object. These outrages are the cause of insurrections breaking out at all times in the Greek provinces of the Ottoman empire. The insurrection in Crete is neither the first nor the last example. Lord Stanley has a heart too elevated to counsel the Greeks to plant cabbages, while their brothers are exposed to all the vicissitudes of a barbarous and unequal war. Diplomacy has been able to trace upon a map the arbitrary limits of the kingdom of Greece, but it has not been able to extinguish the national and fraternal sentiment of the Greeks of the kingdom towards those who are excluded. * * * If, instead of a truncated Greece, the kingdom included all the Greek provinces, then would the diplomatists have the right, and then only, to ask her to show herself capable of the art of government. "If you cannot govern what you possess, how can you hope to persuade Europe that you are capable of governing a larger kingdom." This is the cheval de bataille of the English diplomats. This reasoning, which is the measure of their intelligence, produces the same effect on us as if they said to a lame man, "Since you cannot walk with the leg which you have still left to you, do not regret the loss of the other. You would not know how to use it, if you had it."

EGYPT.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Hale.

No. 49.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 13, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 16th of December, No. 111, is before me. It furnishes the first information which has been directly received from Egypt concerning a change proposed there of the existing treaty arrangements between the western nations and the Ottoman Porte, and of the system of jurisprudence and adjudication in civil and criminal cases in which citizens and subjects of those nations are concerned. I give you herewith a copy of a communication relating to that subject which has been received, and of my acknowledgment thereof. The Grecian government has appealed to the United States to lend their influence in behalf of Greece, to prevent a consummation of the project. I have answered for the United States, that they will reserve consideration of the question until they shall have received some communication thereupon which shall have been authorized by either the Egyptian government or the Ottoman Porte.

In harmony with this line of policy, you will receive and refer to this department any propositions which the Egyptian government may desire to offer; and in that case, I shall expect to be furnished with such information as you may have concerning the progress of the discussion between the Egyptian government and the western powers, as well as your own opinions concerning the probable operation and results of such a change as the Egyptian government desires.

The United States, owing to their remoteness from Egypt, have less direct interest in the question than the European Christian powers. They have also, perhaps, more confidence in the safety and success of government reforms, even in those countries which have not been completely administered within the range of international law and established by Christian nations. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the irritability and jealousy which inevitably exists between Christians and Jews on the one hand, and the local government or authorities of the Mohammedan states on the other, have been augmented by the war in Crete, and by disturbances in the Turkish provinces and states, to such a degree as to render amelioration of the general policy of Christian nations in regard to any one Mohammedan state very difficult, if not inexpedient, at the present time.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CHARLES HALE, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Rangabé to Mr. Seward.

No. 139.]

WASHINGTON, December 22, 1867.

SIR: The intention of the Egyptian government, of which I had the honor to entertain you the other day, of substituting in its domains mixed tribunals to the consular jurisdiction, has been brought to the knowledge of the Greek government by the British minister in Athens, the Grecian consul at Alexandria not having been informed of this plan by the government of the Viceroy of Egypt, or invited to give his opinion or co-operate in its execution, although Greece counts by thousands her subjects established and trafficking in Egypt.

The British government seems not to disapprove this project, provided it is sought to obtain practical results, and the new system offers perfect security to the stranger; to which effect it proposes that a preliminary inquiry should be made by a commission composed of the consuls and lawyers of the principal powers, probably those most interested in the matter.

The views of my government, which it is not for the present called upon to communicate to that of the Viceroy of Egypt, having received no invitation to that effect, are, that so important a modification, and one touching so nearly the rights of foreigners in Egypt, seems to be premature, and that too much ignorance, too much fanaticism, and abuses too inveterate, obtained as yet in the indigenious element, for it to be called to exercise high judiciary functions. If the Egyptian government has been forced, as it complains, to pay 72,000,000 of francs for indemnities, this is surely not because of the judicial interference of the foreign consuls, but because of the arbitrary proceedings of its own authorities, which very often give birth to just claims. The Greek government, in expressing this conviction, is perfectly disinterested, as no part of the said indemnities has been paid to Greek subjects. On the other hand, the antipathy the Mohammedans nourish against Christians of all nationalities will make the indigenious members of these mixed tribunals always to pronounce themselves against the opinions of their Christian colleagues when this is favorable to the Christian party, which will accordingly suffer if they are the strongest, while, if they are not, they gain nothing by establishing the mixed tribunals.

Another question is, what language is to be preferred in these tribunals. The Arabic is not understood by the Christians, and there is no reason for one of the European idioms to be favored more than another.

The most practical course to adopt seems, then, to be that the Egyptian government should commence by correcting its code and judiciary procedure by forming or choosing enlightened and honest lawyers, and composing thereof its tribunals; then, but then only, when the Christian powers see these tribunals working in a way to offer guarantees for the respect of justice, they will consent to abandon the consular tribunals, which they had been forced to establish because of the moral and governmental condition of these countries.

Such is the opinion that the government of his Majesty the King of the Hellenes feels it its duty to express upon this subject, in the interest of the Christians established and trafficking in Egypt, although it would be the first to rejoice in any change that would tend to ameliorate the distribution of justice in that country, and would willingly co-operate, with all its might, to that effect, were it called upon to do so.

Believe me, sir, with high consideration, respectfully,

A. R. RANGABÉ.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 7, 1868:

SIR: Your note of the 22d ultimo, relative to the proposed modification of the form of judicial proceedings affecting foreigners in Egypt, has been received.

No. 115.]

AGENCY AND CONSULATE-GENERAL
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Alexandria, Egypt, February 29, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your instruction No. 49, under date of January 13, relating to the proposed changes in judicial arrangements here, which were the subject of my dispatch No. 111. Your instruction has received my careful attention. It is the purpose of the present dispatch to give you information of the progress of the negotiations relating to the subject.

I have prepared translations, hereto annexed; first, (marked A,) of the original proposition of Nubar Pacha, and secondly, (marked B,) of his remarks in explanation and qualification of the original proposition, these papers having been communicated to me by order of his Highness the Viceroy, just before your instruction was received. An extract (marked C) of a pamphlet written in support of the proposed changes by a lawyer in the employ of the Egyptian government, is also appended. These papers serve to show what it is that has been proposed, and how the proposition was supported by those appointed to defend it.

As you have observed by Lord Stanley's communication, certainly an able and statesmanlike paper, the proposition was, on the whole, rather favorably received by the British government. By the government of France, the proposition was referred to a commission consisting of French statesmen, including Mr. Outrey, the French agent and consul-general for Egypt, then and still remaining in Paris. Nubar Pacha, also in Paris, was invited to attend their deliberations in behalf of the Egyptian government. The commission made a report to the French minister of foreign affairs, which is regarded as unfavorable to the scheme.

The governments of Prussia, Italy, and Russia so far accepted the scheme as to express their willingness to appoint representatives to consider it at a conference which, it was supposed, would be held in Egypt, and it was understood that Austria would accord a like measure of assistance.

To these governments, or most of them, as explained in my No. 111, the scheme has been communicated by agents in Europe.

His Highness the Viceroy, in informing me in January that he had directed the papers already mentioned to be communicated to me, expressed the hope that the United States would be represented in such a conference should it be held. At a later date, as I understand, the same invitation was extended to my colleagues here, or at any rate to some of them, representing governments to whom the plan had not already been communicated. But no other steps have been taken, so far as I can learn, for convening the conference, nor has any time been appointed for assembling it.

Mr. Rangabé has told you of the dislike with which the scheme was received by the Greek community here, and it is proper that I should state that the same feeling of dislike was general among Europeans. The English newspapers were invited by correspondents resident in Egypt to oppose the plan, and to criticise what was supposed to be Lord Stanley's support of it; but this feeling of opposition, although almost universal, would no doubt be considerably mitigated if the scheme were better understood.

It is not now proposed to persevere in the proposition for any change in the hearing of criminal cases. As regards civil cases, it is certainly true that there have been complaints, not wholly without reason, of the existing state of things, some of the inconveniences of which are indicated in the papers annexed. Now, while an Englishman may very well view with distrust the justice of any other tribunal than that of his own consulate, it is well to remember that it is only in cases in which he is defendant of which his own consulate can take jurisdiction. For cases in which he may be plaintiff, having a claim against a native, or the subject of some other power, as matters stand he can have no better justice than may be meted out by tribunals which have no special claim to his confidence.

The problem to be considered by a merchant of any nation, therefore, is this: supposing a good and efficient tribunal could be set up, in which all cases might be brought without regard to the nationality of the parties, would it not on the whole be a convenience? Every merchant would gain the right to bring his claims against others before such a court simply at the expense of being himself subject to its jurisdiction. The fact that the English court here, for instance, is rigorously just, is a circumstance inuring less to the benefit of Englishmen than of subjects of other nations, so far as cases of mixed nationality are concerned. As regards cases between parties both of whom are subjects of the same power, no change in the existing arrangements is now proposed.

But I must not conceal from you that the difficulty most reasonably apprehended is not so much want of justice in the decisions of any new tribunal as want of confidence in a just and impartial execution of its decisions, and the "guarantees" proposed in the accompanying papers go but little way to abate an apprehension of this sort. The existing "tribunal of commerce," for hearing cases of Franks against natives, is composed of a native president, with two native assessors and two Frank assessors; the latter serve in turn by months, from a list chosen by the "notables" of the several Frank communities, the list of "notables" serving as electors being prepared by the several consul-generals. The operation of the tribunal is at best unsatisfactory, but a great and substantial grievance is found in the fact than even when the tribunal may have given judgment in favor of the plaintiff, there is no sure means for obtaining execution of the judgments against the native defendants; the case, if at all difficult or important, generally becomes a question to be urged by the consul-general against the Egyptian government, the decision of the tribunal adding but little substantial strength to the case.

On the other hand, I doubt whether the large European communities would willingly accept at present a measure which should arm any tribunal of the Egyptian government, however composed, with power to touch the persons or property of Europeans otherwise than through their respective consulates.

The difficulty of the position would appear, therefore, to be insoluble, unless it is met in some such manner as the following, which I beg to submit for your judgment, as the basis of counsel which we might offer to the Egyptian government, should you deem it convenient: Let the Egyptian government, should it wish to do so, proceed at once, without further consultation with other governments, to create a tribunal of five judges, of whom two or three should be able and learned Frank gentlemen of unspotted integrity, assured of permanent salaries for at least a certain term of years. Let this tribunal have certain jurisdiction only of cases brought by Franks against the government or against native subjects. Let the Egyptian government request the consulates to give the same assistance to this tribunal, in requiring the attendance of witnesses and other incidental proceedings, as is now accorded in comity by one consulate to another. Let this tribunal hear and determine cases of the kind that has been described, and whenever its decisions may be in favor of the plaintiff, let them be promptly and fully carried into execution by the Egyptian government. If this is fairly done, the tribunal would at once become among Franks the most popular institution in Egypt. Then let it be a part of the plan that the same tribunal might also hear cases in which subjects of different nationalities were parties, whenever both parties agreed in advance to accept its jurisdiction; and let the Egyptian government request the Christian powers to instruct their consuls to give prompt and full execution to the decisions of the tribunal against any of their respective subjects resident in Egypt, in such cases—that is, only cases in which the parties had accepted the jurisdiction before the case was heard.

I entertain a very confident opinion that if such a tribunal proved itself to be really honest and impartial—a genuine seat of justice—it would be eagerly accepted by suitors of different nationalities in a very great number of cases, in preference to the complicated jurisdiction of the consulates; nor would any very long time be required for it to earn a good reputation were such reputation deserved. In process of time it might, perhaps, be made the necessary resort of suitors in mixed cases; but it would appear to me unwise for the Egyptian government to insist upon this beforehand.

For obvious reasons, the Egyptian government might except from the jurisdiction of the tribunal cases against the government arising from transactions anterior in date to the time of its institution, and might make other proper limitations, such as those which restrict the jurisdiction of the United States Court of Claims. Perhaps, even in the beginning, the jurisdiction might be confined to cases against native subjects, excluding at first cases against the Egyptian government; but this would be far less satisfactory.

Not to protract this dispatch to too great a length, some points of detail which would require attention are not touched upon. As regards the question of a code, this need make little trouble; it would be open to the suitors of all nations coming before the tribunal to plead the laws and usages of their own countries as affecting the case in hand, and the court would allow so much weight to these as seemed just in each case. In process of time the series of decisions made by the tribunal would of themselves make a sort of code, or, at all events, furnish a basis for one, better than any attempt to evolve such a work as a preliminary.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES HALE.

[Translation.]

Note to his Highness the Viceroy of Egypt, on the proposed changes in the judicial relations between foreigners and natives.

The jurisdiction which governs the Europeans in Egypt and determines their relations with the government and with the inhabitants of the country, has no longer for basis the "capitulation." Of these capitulations there exists now only the name; they have been replaced by a legislation of custom which is arbitrary, the result of the character of each chief of agency, (principal consular officers,) a legislation based upon precedents more or less bad, which the force of circumstances presumes on one side, and the desire to give facilities for the establishment of foreigners in the country on the other, have introduced into Egypt, and which, in point of fact, leaves the government without strength and the population without regular justice in their relations with Europeans. This state of things profits nobody—as little the general interests of foreign powers as the honest population of the country, whether native or alien; it is employed to the injury of the country, the injury of the government, and to the advantage only of those who make it their business to turn it to their selfish account.

The need of a reform is keenly felt; the European colony increasing, the foreign agencies (consulates) themselves understand the necessity of this; they even claim it. The government and the consulates agree as to the principle of this necessity. Their disagreement begins when the means of putting the principle into practice is reached. It is not wished to have any hold of the capitulations. The abuses which have been introduced are brought forward as if they were laws or principles incapable of abolition. In one word, the end, which is justice, is demanded; but as the means are refused, it results from this that Egypt presents to view a state where the native, whether plaintiff or defendant, unable to find justice, is in fact plundered, and is even happy if he gives up no more than his house to his tenant.

The government finds itself assailed by claims which the consuls themselves often cannot refrain from characterizing as scandalous. The population puts itself on its guard against the European. Is the government obliged, while it sees the progress of this same European, in the fear of being compromised, to hold it at a distance? Examples are not wanting; it would be tedious to enumerate them. It is enough to know that the government, in the space of four years, has paid 72,000,000 of indemnities. [This is understood to mean 72,000,000 francs, about $14,400,000, and probably includes the indemnity of the Suez Canal Company under the award of the Emperor Napoleon.] But it must be added that, paid under consular pressure, directly or indirectly exercised, these indemnities are characterized and represented by those very persons who have exercised the pressure as acts of generosity, without example, on the part of his Highness. If only this were the end of the evil! But the government, which perceives that progress can only come to it from Europe; which aspires to the introduction of this civilizing element, and which wishes to confide to it the great works on which are based agriculture and commerce; which wishes to attract capital, in giving it a remunerative employment—the government is reduced to impotence, and finds itself obliged to abandon the country to itself. Of all the works intrusted to Europeans, the dry dock at Suez alone is finished; all the others are either unfinished or not even begun, and, such as they are, have given and give ground for indemnities.

The manner in which justice is exercised tends to demoralize the country. All the efforts of his Highness are broken against the invasion of their demoralization. The Arab, forced to see Europe in the light of the European who takes selfish advantage of him, opposes himself to the progress of the west, and accuses the Viceroy and his government of weakness or mistake.

For more than forty years the Europeans have enjoyed the right of holding real estate in Egypt; he possesses estates said to be under the jurisdiction and legislation of the country. The consuls, in theory, agree with regard to this principle; but in practice, under the pretext of the capitulations which shield, they say, the European, the European owner of houses, or exercising a trade, pays no taxes; and if owner of a farm, he pays no tithes; the consul then intervenes, and the consul's intervention ends almost always in a non-payment.

This state of things, contrary to the spirit, contrary even to the letter of the capitulations, not only prevents the country from developing its resources, from furnishing to the industry and wealth of Europe all which it is fitted to give them, but puts an obstacle in the way of its organization, and ruins it morally as well as materially.

Your Highness has thought that the only remedy to bring to this state of things is the organization of a good system of justice, presenting to Europe all the guarantees which she has the right to ask.

Your Highness has thought that the foreign element ought to enter into the organization of our tribunals; in fact, this element, not numerous at Cairo, equals at Alexandria the native element; a number of Europeans are established in the provinces; all are merchants or workmen; their relations with the population are consequently of every day, of every hour, so to speak. This element ought then to be regarded in the organization of our tribunals, and even in principle; guarantees which are superfluous ought to be given, so as to inspire it with confidence among men and with the government.

The principle is the complete separation of justice from the administration. Justice ought to emanate from the government, not to depend upon the government; it ought no more to depend upon the government than upon the consulates. To be able to attain the object which your Highness proposes, the foreign powers should be persuaded of this fact: "justice emanates from, does not depend upon, the government." The way to inspire this conviction is to have a body of magistracy. In fact, to make a good magistrate, the natural equity inherent in an honest native is not enough; knowledge of the law is indispensable; a study, a complete education. Our magistrates now in service have a perfect acquaintance with the civil and religious law which was enough when they had only to administer equal justice to a population homogeneous in its customs and its wants. But now necessities require new laws, and the Europeans, in establishing themselves in the country, have brought with them new usages, new relations. A mixed system has begun to introduce itself in our laws and in our codes. New men accordingly are required to apply this new system. It is required that Egypt should do for the administration of justice what Egypt has already done so effectively for her army, her railways, her engineers of roads and bridges, her services of health and hygiene. The competent element, the foreign element, has been introduced, and this element has served to mold the native element. That which has been done in the material order must be done in the moral order—that is, in the organization of justice. The necessity of this mixed system has made itself so keenly felt that since many years the embassies have demanded its introduction at Constantinople. Constantinople has established a mixed tribunal of commerce, where all the commercial processes between natives and Europeans, whether plaintiff or defendants, are alike judged.

It is proposed to extend this system and to apply it to civil and criminal cases. The tribunal of commerce sitting at Alexandria and Cairo is not, properly speaking, a tribunal; it differs from that of Constantinople. It is rather a jury; but for commercial questions the basis of the institution, such as it is, is good, and deserves to be retained; it is only requisite to improve it. This jury or tribunal, instituted originally to take cognizance of commercial lawsuits arising between foreigners and natives, whether plaintiffs or defendants, is in point of fact abandoned. The consuls claim cognizance of cases in which persons of their nationality appear as defendants, and the tribunal often finds itself refused by them, even when the defendant is a native. They justify themselves in this by their want of confidence in the members composing the tribunal. I do not care to discuss the accusation against this tribunal, which I do not believe well founded. The phrase which your Highness has pronounced is enough for my purpose: "Let us give guarantees even that are superfluous."

I have the honor to propose to your Highness the preservation of the two mixed tribunals of commerce established at Cairo and Alexandria; but instead of three members chosen by the consuls from the merchants of the European colony, and three native members, called by the government to sit in turn, I would propose to your Highness to compose them of four members only, two of whom the consuls would choose from the merchants presenting the best guarantees and the best known, and two others whom the government would choose from the natives whose relations are most intimate with the Europeans. The same as is now done, these members would sit in turn. I would propose to your Highness to give the presidency to an Egyptian, but to concede the vice-presidency to a magistrate selected in Europe; and to have a "guarantee on the subject of his character," it would do well to address the ministry of justice, [that is of the county from which he is selected.] This magistrate would be permanent.

Above these tribunals it would be necessary to have a tribunal of appeal, sitting at Alexandria. This would be composed of three Egyptian members, whom your Highness might select from our young men who have studied law in Europe, and three other members, competent magistrates, whom your Highness would summon from Europe, addressing for their choice their governments.

This tribunal would perform its functions under the presidency of an Egyptian. Together with the two tribunals of commerce, there would be two tribunals for civil cases. They might be composed of two competent members, engaged abroad, and two Egyptian members, always under the presidency of an Egyptian subject.

The tribunal of appeal sitting at Alexandria would have also among its powers the revision of judgments given by the civil tribunals.

As to disputes arising from questions of land and real estate, the Europeans have always been subject to our tribunals. These tribunals work well; the members who compose them understand the business from the bottom; the foreign element would not be more competent in the matter. I propose to your Highness to leave them as they are.

The question of the immovability of the magistrates has attracted the attention of your Highness. Your Highness, after mature consideration, has thought, and with reason, that absolute immovability might present great inconvenience for a state of things that is new; that an engagement of five years for the magistrates is enough, and will give to parties in suit every guarantee, and will also allow time both for your government and for foreign powers to judge of the merit of the new institution.

As to criminal questions, they are not so simple as the civil and commercial. Nevertheless, they can be resolved, if reference is had both to the spirit and the letter of the capitulations, and especially to the state of things under Mehemet-Ali.

In fact, how were affairs carried on in the time of the great Viceroy? When a crime or offense was committed by a foreigner, the governor of the citadel took jurisdiction of it, made the examination, rendered the judgment, and sent the judgment and the delinquent to his consul for the execution of the sentence. As the number of Europeans was at that time very limited, and crimes and offenses rare, the care of the consuls over persons of their nationality was easier and more effectual. I do not remember any case of impunity presenting itself, or indeed if there were some discreditable tolerance, that any gave rise to claims or produced serious inconveniences. Such affairs passed off, so to speak, en famille, it being everybody's interest to maintain good order, and every one having both the will and the power to do so.

I must, however, call the attention of your Highness to the fact that this matter of proceeding is not quite in conformity to the capitulation, which by no means removes foreigners from the jurisdiction of the country, and limit themselves to granting them, in criminal cases, the privilege of being tried, assisted by their dragomen or interpreters, by the supreme tribunal; the penalty always to be enforced.

Since Mehemet-Ali, as the number of Europeans increases, and consequently the number of offenses in proportion, the government, in view of the non-application by the consuls of the sentences which it decreed, hoped to gain its object, the enforcement of penalties, by including in the examination and in the judgment either the consul or the interpreter. But this mode of proceeding, which at the beginning produced satisfactory results, things still going on, as I have said, en famille, in its turn degenerated. About 1848, the consuls, under the pressure of persons of their nationality, having become arbiters in the place of the law, found themselves powerless, made of their weakness a principle, and were led, little by little, by pressure of circumstances, to assume making examinations for themselves outside the government, or at any rate to connect with themselves a functionary of the native police, under pretext that as the penalty must be applied and executed in their own country, the examination had no value except as it was conformable to their own laws. Such is actually the state of things, not only in regard to crimes, but for misdemeanors and simple infractions of law. Thus justice is completely given over, not to institutions, but to the arbitration of individuals. The position of the government is no longer tolerable, when we consider that its police is powerless to repress the most trivial infractions, unable even to cause the execution of highway regulations, or those referring to stations for public carriages; for if one consul is inclined to recall to order on the demand of the police some coachman who refuses to take his place, another treats the affair with indifference, sometimes for the reason alone that his colleague takes the other side.

Thus, Highness, the object now pursued by your government is not the destruction of the capitulations, but, on the contrary, to restore to them both letter and spirit, by demanding of the governments the abandonment of abuses and of personal arbitration. That, in fact, is the spirit of the capitulations; the protection of foreigners, but not impunity for them; that is their letter; the judgment of foreigners by the tribunals of the country, with the guarantee of the supreme tribunal, and the assistance of their dragomen.

The same objection is made to your Highness regarding the civil tribunals, and objection founded on the absence of laws and of magistrates who present sufficient guarantees. But your Highness, in your desire to regulate your relations with the powers, laying aside what you might demand as a natural right, and resulting from the capitulations themselves—the right, not to be prescribed, of all governments to apply the police and security laws to all who live within your jurisdiction, (territory,) has been willing to apply to the criminal code the idea which you had conceived for the civil, that is, to institute mixed correctional tribunals.

The capitulations protect inviolably the domicile and the person of foreigners. There is no thought of disturbing this principle; your Highness, in fact, wishes to strengthen it; to surround Europeans accused of crime with more guarantees than are granted by the capitulations; instead of a dragoman, who is but a silent witness, your Highness grants them judges chosen in Europe, and a jury half of Europeans and half native.

If more guarantees are required, your Highness will give them. Your object is the protection of honest citizens, more and more endangered by the impunity enjoyed by the guilty.

The case of less serious infractions, such as the French law calls délits or contraventions, will be submitted to the same mixed tribunals. In all cases appeal will be made to the superior tribunal established at Alexandria; this power of appeal presents all the guarantees desired. All penalties should be applied in Egypt, except in the case of imprisonment, which should be enforced in the respective consulates if this should be exacted by the consul. With the organization of the tribunals there would be occasion to give attention to the legislation which they should follow and apply. The commercial legislation now followed in Egypt is that of Constantinople, accepted by the foreign powers, "The French Code of Commerce." For civil affairs your Highness has the intention to summon a commission of foreign juriconsults, who, assembled with our lawyers, would reconcile the provisions of the Code Napoleon with those of our own legislation. This reconciliation is already half made; the work would neither be long nor difficult. This commission would also be charged to put our penal laws in harmony with those of the French penal code.

To sum up, that which your Highness asks, whether as regards civil or criminal affairs, is the return to the capitulations, and not only a return pure and simple, but on the contrary a return which would allow to foreigners guarantees far superior to those which the capitulations give them. In fact, according to the capitulations, it is a native tribunal which gives judgment in presence of the dragoman, a mere witness without voice in the deliberations; according to the reform proposed, your Highness, instead of this mute witness, gives to foreigners the guarantee of a tribunal in the composition of which enters a European element, and a code revised in conformity with European penal and civil laws.

The organization proposed by your Highness, calculated upon the judicial organization of Algeria, offers, it seems to me, all the desirable guarantees.

It would appear impossible to your Highness that the foreign powers should refuse to admit them. Hitherto, on the contrary, the foreign powers have availed themselves of every opportunity to come to the support of the material and moral development in Egypt. To-day, placed in presence of the real state of the country in refusing the establishment of the most precious guarantees, they would put themselves in the position of denying not only the progress, but even the very existence, of Egypt.

[Translation.]

Some explanations of the guarantees which will be presented by the judicial organization proposed for Egypt.

The majority in the tribunals which the government proposes to organize will rest with the European magistrates. These magistrates will be appointed by the Egyptian government, and chosen by it among the magistrates in Europe. The government will surround itself for this choice with all possible precautions. The making choice from magistrates already in office is itself a guarantee, because the French government, for example, is always free to accord or refuse its permission to the magistrates who would have been chosen. Irremovability will be granted to the magistrates either in the beginning or after a certain time, three or four years for instance. Add to these guarantees, already so effective in themselves, the publicity of proceedings, the complete liberty of defense, the institution of the court of appeal, and the Egyptian tribunals will present the same guarantees as the tribunals in Europe. But if there is added also the right, which would be granted to the party in suit, or to his consul, to refuse one of the judges of the tribunal, without giving reasons for his refusal, there is a guarantee which I will call substantial. Moreover, when the difference of position is considered, the advantage on the side of Egypt is obvious, for in France or England a magistrate has only to encounter the public opinion of a homogeneous public, while in Egypt two camps are watching him, the Moslem and the Christian, and in this latter sixteen different nationalities restless and eager. Under these conditions, it is difficult, if not impossible, that a magistrate should be false to the law and give judgment against his conscience. The clerks and officers of the court would be chosen in Europe from the persons who have exercised or still exercise the functions of ministerial officers.

Civil cases between natives will be submitted to these tribunals, (questions of state, as marriage, divorce, &c., between natives will necessarily remain for resort to the existing tribunals, but the tribunals may be attached to the general organization in such manner as not to make a separate body.) Civil questions between natives and foreigners, whether plaintiffs or defendants, will be submitted to these tribunals. Commercial questions between natives, or between natives and foreigners, will be submitted to these tribunals, which, in these cases, will summon as assessors merchants selected from the well-known Europeans and Arabs of the country.

The inconveniences which arise from fifteen or sixteen foreign jurisdictions for the persons of the nationality at the different consulates in the questions of litigation which arise every day among them are always increasing; it would be desirable, therefore, in their own interest, that the processes between Europeans of different nationalities should be submitted to these tribunals, or at least that this should be permitted with the consent of both parties. But the power of these tribunals will not cover lawsuits between Europeans of the same nationality. The tribunal will have power over all questions which concern the administration of the domains of the Viceroy (present and past) and of the princes. It will take cognizance of all the demands made by the government against private persons, natives or Europeans, and of all such as may be brought against the government by such private persons for the execution of a contract. Nevertheless, it is understood that the tribunal cannot ordain any measure which may be of the nature to prevent or suspend the execution of an act of administration; it will take cognizance simply of claims for indemnity brought against the government on account of acts of administration alleged to be contrary to an engagement or concession previously granted. Mere violations of police regulations might be judged by the civil tribunal, or better by a European magistrate delegated by the tribunal and sitting at the police office. Punishment in correctional matters will be pronounced by the tribunal composed of two European magistrates and one native, and if thought necessary, upon the verdict of a jury. Punishment in criminal matters will be pronounced by a court composed of three magistrates, of which three will be Europeans and one native, on the verdict of a jury. The composition of the jury lists, the number of jurors, their manner of voting, whether by majority or unanimity, are among the questions which should be settled by the commission of juriconsults which will come to Egypt to determine the procedure and adopt the European law to the wants of the country.

This same commission might determine the conditions under which the officers of police will have the right to make an arrest, or to enter houses; it will fix the terms within which preliminary investigations should be concluded; but it is important that it should be understood after this that these conditions, once fulfilled, the action of the police cannot be interfered with by the consuls, for the Viceroy having the responsibility of maintaining order in Egypt, it is necessary to establish as a principle that he ought to have the means to fulfill this responsibility. The police must possess, as regards foreigners, the same powers as regards natives; and in order that thieves and assassins may no longer be seen after having fired a pistol, or being taken breaking open a safe, walking about at Alexandria, thanks to the intervention of the consuls, the police must have the right to put in execution the regulations of the highway, and other police regulations, without having recourse to the consulates.

The establishment of the tribunals is only half of the organization; nothing will be accomplished if judgments are obtained which are not put in execution.

If the tribunals present the desired guarantees, and if accordingly they are accepted, there will be no objection, I think, that, as in France, the officers of these tribunals should be charged with the execution of the sentence, with power to require the officers of police if necessary.

This mode of proceeding is all the more necessary now the consuls have for a principle (not at all admitted by the government) to make the government responsible for the execution of sentences given against natives. The representative of the tribunal proceeding to the execution of its judgment, with the assistance of the public force in case of need, this pretended solidarity will disappear, and with it many really petty questions which are raised to the rank of diplomatic questions. It is very evident that if, for example, the government should refuse the aid of the public force for the execution of a judgment, the diplomatic intervention of the consuls would immediately have a reason for existing.

Thus, neither the government nor the consulates will be able to interfere with the execution of the sentence, either to prevent or suspend it.

If the consulates were charged with the execution, if they had even only the power to interfere, the firmness of some might take example from the weakness or want of power of others, and we should fall back with arbitrariness and the present confusion. If, in order to execute a sentence, it is necessary for the officer to enter a private house, it cannot be said that the domicile is violated by the government. It is not the government who forces itself in, it is the law, represented by the officer of the tribunal, and the law penetrates everywhere.

Besides questions of organization for civil, commercial, and criminal justice, there is room for regulating different points which are connected with simple administration, for instance, in relation to highways or to taxes. Thus, a European who wants to build in Alexandria, does it without the preliminary authorization of the council on highways or that of fortifications; whenever he finds against him the regulations of these councils, no native workman can labor for him under these conditions, to be sure, but he engages European workmen; his building is raised and finished under the eyes of the authorities, who appeal in vain to his consulate, which answers not at all, or after the building is completed.

The capitulations have never pretended to remove from the action of government any European who puts himself in opposition to the local laws. In the present state of disorder, it is necessary in such cases that the government should bring an action against the opposing party before the consul; and the consul, on this very account, interprets and comments upon the regulations made by the government, and has, consequently, power to approve or annul them.

The capitulations, and even French jurisprudence, if I am not mistaken, do not authorize the holding of real estate by Europeans in Egypt. This is a great misfortune for Egypt; therefore not only is it tolerated in Egypt, but even recognized and established for more than forty years. Europeans buy, sell, inherit property, like the natives, in their own names, inscribed upon the registers of the Melkiemés.

It is just that European proprietors should be submitted to the same expenses as the native, and that the laws in this case, laws well known, fixed, and determined, should be applied as to the native. This is a principle admitted and recognized; no consulate really denies it. But in application this principle is becoming impossible. A European possesses a farm; he does not pay his taxes; can the government proceed with him as with a native, that is, deprive him of a part of his land, which, sold at public auction, would restore to the exchequer the amount due to it? Government cannot do this; it must address itself to a consul, who may or may not give an answer, and who finally, whether he insists upon payment or not, becomes the arbiter and judge of the laws of the government. An examination may be made, if desired, whether anything can be modified in the present regulations so as to protect the rights and interests of all; but it is necessary to leave to the Egyptian authority, alone and without the intervention of the consulates, administrative action and jurisdiction in such matters, and the government must not abandon this principle.

This action and jurisdiction are a public right, and the capitulations never were intended to take them from Egypt.

Extract from a pamphlet by P. Maunoury.

What shall be said of certain consulates where it is impossible to get justice? The least bad are those which, in the interest of persons of their nationality, hold back the decision and even the execution of their judgments until the foreign plaintiffs are worn out.

Thus, upon many complaints laid before the tribunal of Persia, not one judgment has been passed.

[NOTE.—Were the capitulations intended for unchristianized Asiatics?]

The consulate of France was obliged, in the affair of Marquet & Co. vs. Hauna Giamati, to interfere with the Spanish consulate to compel them to protest a bill of exchange for non-payment.

There is a consulate general of Brazil, although not a single Brazilian is established in Egypt. The consul general, an Italian, in order to create for himself a nation, had to put all the members of his family under the protection of his flag. His nephew, Abd-allah-el-Adin, attached to the consulate, became bankrupt. The difficulties thus caused were judged, in spite of the creditors, by the uncle of the bankrupt, all demands being refused.

The denials of justice on the part of the consul general of Greece have been so violent, that one day, in full hearing of the French tribunal, at the trial of an affair begun by a Greek against a Frenchman, Mr. Fricon, French consul, president of the tribunal, summoned before him the plaintiff, and said to him word for word as follows: "Your affair is erased from the docket. Go and tell your consul that as soon as he begins to render justice to the French, I will render it to persons of his nationality."

It is useless to say that the local tribunals leave as much to be desired as does consular justice.

About a year since the European judges of the mixed tribunal at Cairo sent in their resignation en masse, on account of the partialities which they had witnessed.

Something quite curious has presented itself in connection with these mixed tribunals. They were instituted as tribunals of commerce.

Now, as none of their members clearly understood the distinction between civil and commercial affairs, for several years they passed judgment indiscriminately on all questions arising between Europeans and natives.

At the beginning of 1867 they bethought themselves to decide that they were incompetent in civil matters—a wise decision. But now comes a difficulty. Possibly a local civil tribunal may exist; but we can affirm that there is not a single person who might be the subject of its jurisdiction, nor even a European lawyer, who, after careful research, knows where this tribunal holds its sittings.

So that, for the last ten months, no civil complaint can be brought by a European against a local subject.

AGENCY AND CONSULATE GENERAL
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Alexandria, Egypt, March 20, 1868.

SIR: The second annual session of the Egyptian assembly of representatives was opened by the Viceroy in person, with an address, in the palace of the citadel at Cairo, on the 16th instant. The address of his Highness was read in Arabic by Kairi Bey.

It mentions among results of the preceding session, attained during the year past, the opening of government schools at Benha and Osiut, the accomplishment of the abolition of the system of the Ohdis, or farming out of the collection of the revenue, the continued progress of public works, and the taking of a new census, which, however, is not yet completed.

To the attention of members during the present session are recommended measures for conservation of public health, for preventing deterioration in the cotton culture of the country, and for promoting the interests of agriculture in general, canals, dikes, and bridges, as well as the perfection of the system established last year for the collection of taxes by monthly installments.

The president of the assembly for this session is Abdallah Pacha.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES HALE.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Hale to Mr. Seward.

No. 124.] AGENCY AND CONSULATE GENERAL
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Alexandria, Egypt, June 6, 1868.

SIR: For the first time an official account has been published of the state of Egyptian government finances. A translation is contained in this dispatch.

The original publication forms an appendix to a report made to the assembly of representatives now sitting at Cairo, and covers the estimate for the year 1585 of the Coptic calendar, of which the beginning corresponds to 24th September, 1868. The original account is stated in "purses," but it is here changed into dollars at the rate of twenty-five dollars in gold to the purse.*

The expenses of the government for the year are set down as follows:

EXPENSES.

Civil list of the Viceroy.....	$1, 500, 000
Allowances to members of his family.....	553, 638
Tribute to Constantinople.....	3, 291, 688
Department of the interior.....	67, 251
Department of war and military schools.....	3, 500, 000
Department of finance.....	403, 131
Department of foreign affairs.....	65, 069
Civil and commercial tribunals.....	192, 742
Provincial administration.....	860, 592
Navy department and marine arsenal.....	1, 002, 680
Department of public works.....	27, 345
Board of health and hospitals.....	191, 258
Governments at Cairo, Alexandria, Damietta, Rosetta, El-Arich, Suez, and of the canal.....	791, 023
Police at Cairo and Alexandria.....	331, 680
Department of public instruction—schools.....	369, 230
Employés of customs.....	137, 933
Pensions of widows and of the harems.....	208, 633
Pensions of employés out of service.....	486, 326
Pensions of persons en disponibilité , (retired list).....	218, 531

* Exactly, the "purse" is worth \$24 95 $\frac{1}{2}$.

Pilgrimage to Mecca and the hospice of the Hedjaz, (entertainment of indigent pilgrims).....	$372, 704
Reserve fund for care of canals, &c	1, 000, 000
Payment due Bank of Saxony for loan	1, 292, 500
Payment on the loan of £5,000,000 sterling.....	3, 023, 933
Payment on the loan secured by the railway.....	3, 375, 938
Payment of treasury notes and medjidich coupons.....	266, 850
	23, 530, 675
Surplus for the year	12, 922, 115
	<hr/>
	36, 452, 790
	<hr/>

The other side of the account is stated as follows :

RECEIPTS.

Land tax, tithes, personal tax, tax on palm trees, and product of various undertakings.....	$22, 872, 790
New tax of one-sixth additional of the amount of land tax and tithes, to be continued for four years altogether, namely, the Coptic years 1584 to 1587, inclusive, amount for one year.....	3, 750, 000
Customs	2, 475, 000
Railway	1, 725, 000
Locks and other public works.....	1, 990, 000
Net revenue of the Soudan.....	375, 000
Income of government property, sheep, oil, and interests on shares in Suez canal.....	2, 382, 500
Petty and miscellaneous.....	882, 500

This estimate shows a surplus for the Coptic year 1585 of nearly $13,000,000. It is stated that the Coptic year 1584, of which three months remain, will show a surplus of half a million dollars.

I inclose a translation of the report of the committee to the assembly. The recommendations of the report were adopted by the assembly; but the suggestion for an internal loan appears to have been found inconvenient. Almost immediately after the Viceroy's departure, as mentioned in my dispatch No. 122, it was announced that a loan for six millions sterling had been arranged by the Egyptian government with the banking house of H. Oppenheim, Neven & Co., on terms mutually satisfactory; the precise details of this financial operation are not yet known.

A good deal of outcry is made in the European press about the new tax imposing an increase of one-sixth, or 16½ per cent. on previous taxes; to continue for four years. If, however, this exceptional taxation be compared with the extra income tax assessed in Great Britain to defray the cost of the Abyssinian war, or with the still more exceptional measures of finance now pending in Austria, something of excuse may be found for a government like that of Egypt, which may be said to have learned foreign lessons of finance by beginning at the wrong end of the book. Who shall say that pupil is blamable more than preceptor for this inversion ?

You will not fail to notice the comparatively small sum collected at the custom-house. Thirty-four millions of dollars internal taxes paid by less than five millions of people in Egypt, averages $7 a head. Taxed at that rate per head, the thirty millions of population in the United States would pay $210,000,000.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES HALE.

[Translation.]

Report of the Committee of the Assembly, consisting of Haggi Yousouf Abd-el-Taltah, Mohamed Said Bey, and Ibrahim Effendi-el-chehri.

The Egyptian government owes for debts contracted under the present reign and that preceding it, a total sum of £22,000,000 sterling, of which £2,400,000 sterling were borrowed by Said Pacha, payable by installments spread over twenty years; £5,000,000 sterling borrowed by the present Viceroy to cancel old debts payable by installments spread over fifteen years; besides £1,000,000 sterling which remains due to the Suez Canal Company.

But it is proper to take into consideration that during the five years which have passed since his accession, his Highness has paid £8,000,000 sterling for matters properly chargeable to the revenues of the government.

That which remains to be paid in the financial years 1584, 1585, and 1586 of the Coptic calendar, according to the statements of the minister of finances, amounts to £6,101,570 sterling, besides interest.

The committee has ascertained, moreover, that the government has spent for objects and works of general interest, various sums amounting to £6,000,000 sterling. These comprise the dry dock and harbor of Suez, the locks, bridges, and aqueducts in the provinces, one bridge and several streets in Alexandria, several lines and branches of railway, the settlement of various debts, military and naval stores now on hand, and steamships.

From what precedes, it follows that the government has paid for debts and interests of the preceding reign and works of public utility, a total of £14,000,000 sterling, and this has been done notwithstanding the decrease of the receipts from customs duties arising from the sliding-scale reduction from 12 per cent. to 1 per cent. which has taken place in the export duties.

For although the duties on imports are maintained at 7 per cent., the difference on that side is not less, on account of the small importance of the amount of imports compared to that of exports.

The amount which must be paid in these years, 1584, 1585, and 1586, after deducting the balance of the budget, is £6,000,000 sterling, besides interest. The committee accordingly has come to the conclusion that, for the good of the country, it will be best to avoid a foreign loan, by means of the following measures:

1. Establish an extraordinary tax equal to an addition of one-sixth of the present taxation on lands paying tax and tithe, on the palm trees, and on the personal tax, for four years, that is, 1584 to 1587, inclusive. This one-sixth is scarcely equal to what was formerly paid the government under the name of customs duty; for customs duties, although paid by the merchants, fall in the end upon the producers. This one-sixth, moreover, is only provisional, and will only continue for the four years already mentioned; it is to be understood that each year one-sixth will be collected in addition to the taxes already established, as above mentioned.

The collection of the one-sixth will be made by a new bureau, distinct from the ordinary bureau, and will be kept in a separate account. The one-sixth for the current year will be collected with taxes of this year, as yet unpaid, and during the remainder of this year. The one-sixth for the three following years will be collected with the ordinary taxes at the times fixed for their collection by the decree of last year to that effect.

2. A loan to cover what remains to be paid.

By these means and with the aid of God we may succeed to meet the obligations of the government.

AGENCY AND CONSULATE GENERAL
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
• Alexandria, Egypt, October 19, 1868.

SIR: It was not until after the date of my last dispatch that the fact was allowed to become public, that on the evening of the day when the Viceroy returned to Alexandria, (22d September,) an attempt was apparently made upon his life in the following manner: The Viceroy, accompanied by Cherif Pacha, Ismaïl Pacha Monfatic, and Shaïn Pacha, were going about the illuminated streets of Alexandria in an open carriage, when two balls were dropped from the second story of a house as they were passing it. One of these balls, in its fall, broke the splash-board covering one of the wheels of the carriage, where it stuck for a few instants before reaching the ground; the other fell behind the carriage and was immediately picked up by one of the officers in attendance. Each of these balls consisted of a compact mass of metal, of the size of a man's head, closed, and weighing four or five pounds, armed with a number of pointed barbs, each about six inches long and resembling the barbed spear heads used by savages. It cannot be doubted that a ball of this kind, falling from a height against any person, would cause death; happily, both of them missed touching any person. The Viceroy maintained a perfectly calm demeanor, and no other persons than his immediate attendants knew what had occurred until many days afterwards.

On the 3d of October, public notice was first taken of the occurrence, by an address made to the Viceroy at the palace of Abbassieh, in Cairo, by Cherif Pacha, and immediately published. In this address the minister spoke of the profound regret with which the functionaries of government of all grades had learned of the attempt against the life of the Viceroy, and of the thankfulness of the people that the attempt had failed.

On the 7th of October, the Viceroy having returned from Cairo to Alexandria, the consuls general attended at the palace of Ras-el-tin with an address in the following terms:

HIGHNESS: The consular body having learned with profound indignation of the attempt of which your Highness has failed to be the victim, we hasten to present ourselves before you, moved by a unanimous sentiment, for the purpose of protesting against so odious an act; and, in offering you our sincere felicitations, to unite our wishes with those of your subjects for the prolongation of your life and the prosperity of your reign.

To which the Viceroy replied in the following terms:

GENTLEMEN: I am much touched by the felicitations which the diplomatic body expresses to me with so much of sympathy and friendship, and I thank you. Providence evidently protects a ruler who devotes himself to the noble task of regenerating his people. As an Egyptian prince, I shall continue to fulfill my duties of patriotism and devotion. Such a crime as this changes neither my opinions nor my principles. My son after me will pursue my policy for the happiness of Egypt and the honor of my reign.

A great number of addresses from various bodies and associations were also presented on the same and subsequent days, and received replies.

Special services of thanksgiving were organized in the various Christian churches, and in the Jewish synagogue, and in some of the mosques. As these services were attended generally by one or more of the principal ministers, they necessarily took place on successive days.

The special service at the chapel of the American missionaries took place yesterday. The native congregation was present to the number of about 100. I was present with the officers of the consulate general, and in behalf of the Egyptian government attended Zoulfikar Pacha, Achmed Pacha, Dramaly, and Ethen Bey. The services were conducted by the Rev. B. F. Pinkerton, resident missionary, chiefly in the Arabic language. He pronounced a fervent prayer for the health and prosperity of the Viceroy, and for wisdom to be granted to him in the rule of the country; and taking several texts from Scripture in which obedience to the constituted authorities is enjoined by Holy Writ, he pronounced an impressive discourse upon this theme. The hymns were sung in the Arabic language by the native congregation in an effective manner, and the whole service was very interesting. These recent services at the various churches are said to be the first ceremonious occasions in which Moslem officers of state have taken part in Christian services.

I may remark that after the service yesterday, the ministers present having been invited into the missionary's house, Zoulfikar Pacha expressed his astonishment at the elegance and correctness with which the Rev. Mr. Pinkerton (who came from the United States only three years ago) speaks the Arabic language, and also expressed his gratification with the simplicity and impressive earnestness of the service.

No clue whatever has been found to the perpetrator of the attempt on the Viceroy's life.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES HALE.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 19th of October, No. 130, has been received. Your proceeding in denouncing the attempted assassination of the Viceroy of Egypt is entirely approved. You will be expected to make this approval known to his Highness, with an assurance that the government and people of the United States unreservedly reprobate that odious crime, and fervently congratulate him upon his providential deliverance.

MOROCCO.

Mr. McMath to Mr. Seward.

No. 51.]

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA FOR THE EMPIRE OF MOROCCO,
Tangier, February 3, 1868.

SIR: It is with regret I have the honor to inform you that the cholera appeared in this city yesterday, and to-day our board of health commenced to issue touched bills of health. The disease appeared among a very wretched class of Moors and Jews who have been suffering for want of food and clothing. In consequence of the great influx of Moors who have been driven from their houses on the Riffian coast by famine, now collected within and about this city, I fear we shall have this scourge in its worst form. I have never before witnessed such extreme wretchedness and misery as now appears among the lower classes in this country. By reason of the partial failure of the last harvest, and the apprehension of a short harvest to come for the want of rain thus far during the winter months, the price of grain and breadstuffs has risen so high that they are absolutely beyond the reach of the poor, and but for private charity hundreds more would have already starved. The doors of our consulate are besieged day and night by the starving poor, and through the entire twenty-four hours one hears nothing but the cry for bread. This state of things will continue, if it does not grow worse, until next July, when, it is to be hoped, if our harvest fails not, the cry will cease. Some of my colleagues, and particularly the minister plenipotentiary of Spain, have had a fund placed in their hands by their governments to relieve to a certain degree the pressing wants of the poor, while others have contributed relief from their private purses. I respectfully suggest that if you can place a few hundred dollars in my hands for this purpose it shall be promptly and judiciously applied as a government charity, and together with what I shall continue to contribute out of my already overtaxed and small salary, it shall appear that our government is not behind others in relieving the pressing necessities of the starving and scourge-stricken poor.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient, humble servant,

JESSE H. McMATH.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

FOR THE EMPIRE OF MOROCCO,

Tangier, November 16, 1868.

SIR: In reply to your dispatch No. 38, dated the 12th ultimo, I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of so much of the sanitary circular as relates to the question of precedence which has arisen among the members of the representative corps in this city. In submitting this lengthy paper I deem it proper to offer a few remarks which I consider necessary to a proper understanding of the question.

Previous to the advent among us of the minister of France, and for some time thereafter, the corps of representatives was guided in all matters of business and ceremony, either among themselves or collectively, with the Moorish authorities, by the rule of perfect equality, except in the single instance of attending in a body the funeral of a deceased colleague or other foreign employé.

In matters of business which require the presence of all chiefs of missions, they met, turn by turn, at the residence of each other; and when it became necessary to make a collective written representation to the Moorish authorities, the chief at whose residence the document was written would first sign, and the rest would follow in alphabetical order in the French language. You will oblige me by referring to my dispatch No. 27, dated May 15, 1865, and you will see a copy of "the collective opinion of the representatives of foreign powers in Morocco," addressed to the minister of foreign affairs. That opinion was written at the residence of the Belgian consul general, and signed by us in the order mentioned. Up to that date and until after we had signed the convention concerning Cape Spartel light-house, and even subsequent to that transaction, the old rule of perfect equality without distinction of grade had been adhered to by all the representatives, with the single exception above mentioned. Anterior to the date of the convention of 31st May, 1865, between his Majesty the Sultan and the Christian powers, and while the same was in course of preparation, it became necessary for its accomplishment to hold conferences for the purpose of perfecting it and the "regulations," for the control and maintenance of the light-house. They were held turn by turn at the residence of the several representatives taking part in the convention. The minister of France participated on terms of perfect equality at the respective legations and consulates. He consented to the regulations which gave the presidency of the commission to each of the representatives in alphabetical order, commencing with the consul general of Belgium, and after its form and the regulations made in pursuance of its terms were completed, adherence to the old rule caused us to meet at the residence of the Belgian consul general for the purpose of signing and sealing the same. It was signed and sealed in the order indicated, commencing in this instance with the copy for Austria—the English minister is the agent general for that power; and I am not aware that any objection was raised by the minister of France to this manner of transacting business, in which all had an equal and common interest, and which involved a question of ceremony as well. The convention was exchanged at the ministry of foreign affairs; on that occasion the first exchange was made and certified between Morocco and Austria, other nations following in the order mentioned. It is certainly strange that he did not assert the privilege of his high grade on these several occasions, and be first in business and ceremony. The Morocco board of health, a creation of one of the former Sultans, is composed of the representatives of foreign powers. Its presidency passes monthly by turn to each chief of mission. If the treaty of Vienna, to which the Sultan is not a party, gives precedence to the minister of France, in that event he would become not only the permanent president of the board of health, but of the international commission as well, simply because that treaty applies to matters of business as well as ceremony, and the minister has already declared, as you will see, that he will never go to an official reunion at the house of any of us. In view of the past I do not think his official dignity would be compromised if he were in the future to attend reunions at the residence of those whom he is pleased to designate as his true colleagues, or that other class whom he regards simply as commercial agents. "Everything for the minister, the minister for France," seems now to be his motto. While writing my opinion in the circular I had my mind fixed on the business matters above mentioned, but I made no reference to them. I did declare a fact with regard to the first ceremonial visit, and I then assumed the position that the minister was not our dean, and I still think he is not, in the sense that he uses the word. No one will know better than yourself whether or not I was accredited by President Lincoln to his Majesty the Emperor of Morocco. The minister thinks I was not; for he declared in the presence of all the chiefs that a number of us had identically the same positions as a consul general—commercial agent—under the orders of a legation in a capital. I claim that our official positions—and I now speak of consuls general chiefs of missions—in this country are quite different from what they would be if we were residing in a civilized country, and invested with the same title which we hold here. This difference, however, does not arise from title, but from the exceptional state of society in which we find ourselves charged with complex functions and extraordinary powers under our titles. The minister of France is not, nor from the nature of things can he be, the repository of a greater trust, or charged with greater responsibility. He is a minister, and also a consul, and he discharges daily or when necessary the duties pertaining to the latter office. We are called upon to discharge the duties of a higher grade, but we receive the designation of a lower one.

No one denies his high grade, but I feel safe in saying none of his colleagues, true or otherwise, would consent to sink their official character in the presence of the minister of foreign affairs and let him be their collective mouthpiece. We stand upon an equal footing before this government, and the minister of foreign affairs treats us all with the same degree of respect and consideration. I am a consul, but I am designated by everybody as a consul general. The minister of foreign affairs shows me the same respect and esteem that he shows to the minister of France, for the simple reason that while the latter is charged to confer with him on matters pertaining to France, I am charged to confer with him on matters pertaining to the United States. The minister of foreign affairs looks no further.

Throughout this controversy I have been guided by the single consideration of maintaining intact the dignity of the representative of the United States in this country. Nothing more, nothing less.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JESSE H. McMATH.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Extract from a circular dated the 11th July, 1868, addressed by the Spanish chargé d'affaires, president, during the month of July, of the Moorish board of health.

As the question in dispute among us can only be settled by agreement of the foreign representatives, the French minister, as dean of the corps, will determine what is to be done, and I will accept any invitation he may be pleased to send me.

JOSÉ DIOSDADO.

TANGIER, July 14, 1868.

The question of the incompetency of the board in police sanitary affairs, away from the sea shore, having been decided affirmatively, I deem it my duty to issue the present circular, so that our archives may contain a document fixing the faculties of our board.

W. KIRBY GREEN,
For the British Minister.

Seen. I now approve, as I always have done, the opinion of our honorable colleague of the United States; yet, for the public good, I have agreed to separate the powers and duties of our sanitary board. Before signing it, however, I must put one question to our honorable dean. I will begin by declaring that I am pleased that the public hygiene on land is intrusted to the direction of the French minister, who has my whole sympathy as an individual as well as the representative of a government that I honor in the highest degree; but, as a representative of Italy, I must ask him if the title of dean comprises the rank held by the representative or otherwise. If the diplomatic representatives only can hold the place of dean, then only the representatives of Spain, France, and Great Britain can preside over the representative meetings of foreign powers in Morocco, and I cannot agree to that.

To remove all present doubt, and to prevent the establishment of a precedent insulting to Italy, I ask our honorable president if he will agree that the title of dean be hereafter given, without distinction of grade, to the oldest representative, beginning to-day with the representative of the imperial government.

CASTELLINARD.

I will delay the expression of my opinion about the power of our board till we have passed through the present sanitary crisis. My whole effort now is to preserve this city and the country from an invasion of the cholera; I am willing to resort to any means.

JOSE DANIEL COLAÇO.

Seen and approved for the second and last time. I await the decision of the French minister.

Seen only, as I have already approved.

ERNEST DELUIN.

DIOSDADO.

JESSE H. McMATH.

I confess that I take up the pen very unwillingly on a subject that ought to have been settled by the present circular, or by the resolutions already adopted by the foreign representatives. The Italian agent and the consul general of Portugal agree in opinion with the consul general of the United States, that the board of health ought to be limited to its original duties, notwithstanding its assent to the new state of affairs adopted in March last. I will, therefore, leave untouched a question which I consider settled.

Though this is not the place to answer certain interrogatories propounded to me, I will merely say to the Italian agent that I have never accepted, as my colleagues know, any direction in the land hygiene. By request I expressed our views to the local authorities, declaring solemnly at the time that I assumed no responsibility for the execution of the requests. I, therefore, politely refuse the responsibility which Count Castellinard wishes me to assume.

In reply to the question of the Italian agent, as dean of the corps, I refer him to the treaty of Vienna, which settled the question of precedence. If Count Castellinard will take the trouble to read that international treaty, I think he will be convinced of the legality of the precedents established at Tangier, which he believes so insulting to Italy. If he cannot accept that decision nor the regulations adopted by the treaty, I must inform him that I do not consider it my place to discuss the matter, and much less my duty to institute reforms on the subject.

In conclusion, I must say to the consul general of Portugal, who declares, in allusion to the accord recently adopted by us, that all means are lawful, under present circumstances, that I do not accept, as dean, the character which he gives to the accord. I shall always be ready to consider the ideas of my colleagues when referred to me; but I am not pleased to know that the accord of one of them was compulsory.

AYMÉ D'AQUIN.

I am satisfied with the explanations given by the minister of France to the interrogatories put to him by the consul general of Italy.

W. KIRBY GREEN,
For the British Minister.

Considered. As I am acquainted with the resolutions of the international treaty of the 19th of March, 1819, I submitted the remarks which I made to our dean, and which he has answered. Though now torn in pieces, the treaty of Vienna is very precise on the subject of precedence of diplomatic employés. They are arranged in three classes; in the third paragraph of Article I, it says the second class shall be composed of envoys, ministers, or other persons accredited to sovereigns. I will not dispute the grade of any one; but, as the representative of Italy in Morocco, I believe it my duty to claim the right of president of the light-house board, or of the board of health, as the case may be, or as dean of the diplomatic corps, under circumstances like the present, and will not consent that Italy, whose representative is equal to any others here, shall descend to an inferior position. As I answered last, my turn may never come round, yet I defend the principle because I believe it my duty to do so. I should have said this much before had I foreseen the complication. I beg the honorable dean to pardon me, and ask him to apply the old axiom, "better late than never."

CASTELLINARD.

As I put no question to our honorable dean, the minister of France, I cannot accept his observations. I sided with the majority when the question of the local police came up; but, finding a great difference between police regulations and public health, I say the latter deserves the deep consideration of our board, whether on land or sea, particularly when we are threatened by an epidemic. The late accord was effected in a spirit of conciliation; because, as a sanitary board, we have no jurisdiction in the case. I am pleased to say that I agreed with the majority, because I thought I was doing good thereby. I would have acceded to any agreement proposed by the representatives to secure the public health of our city against the scourge now raging in so many other parts of Morocco. For that reason I said I would agree to any means to effect that end; and the same was said by the English minister, as shown in another portion of this long circular.

JOSÉ DANIEL COLAÇO.

As the question brought up by our colleague of Italy is irrelevant, I move that this circular be closed, with the privilege of further discussion if called for.

ERNEST DELUIN.

Having read the preceding, I declare that I do not wish to dispute a point settled by the treaty of Vienna.

DIOSDADO.

Previous to the treaty of Vienna, the uncertainty of the forms that regulated the intercourse between members of the diplomatic corps led to frequent and serious difficulties, and sometimes to wars. This treaty extirpated all these difficulties, as far as questions of precedence were concerned, and these had ever been found the most serious. It declared that every question of that nature should be settled by the rule of time. He who had been longest at a court or government is to be first. The relative power of the nation he represents is to count nothing. This is a rule satisfactory to small states, and it is to the praise of large ones that they established it. It applies to all intercourse where competition can arise, whether of business or ceremony. Hence the member of the corps last arriving pays the first visit. The rule does not overleap classes; it applies only to those of the same class. Now my honorable colleague of France, in responding to the inquiry of my honorable colleague of Italy, said "that he could give to him no better explanations than those derived from the treaty of Vienna, which has established the rules of precedence." While this reply may be satisfactory to my honorable colleague of Italy, it falls short of carrying with it the conviction to my mind that my honorable colleague of France is the dean of the diplomatic corps in Tangier, and entitled to precedence. I claim he is not the dean.

I shall now quote that part of the treaty which is relevant to the position which I maintain on this subject:

"ARTICLE 1. Diplomatic agents are divided into three classes :

"First class.—Ambassadors, legates or nuncios.

"Second class.—Envoys, ministers, and other agents accredited by the sovereigns.

"Third class.—Chargé d'affaires accredited by the department of foreign relations.

"ARTICLE 4. Diplomatic agents of the respective classes (1, 2, 3) take rank according to the date of the official notice of their arrival."

There are no representatives in Tangier belonging to the first class above recited. Each representative in Tangier, no matter what his title may be, belongs to the second class above recited; that is, if when he came here to reside in an official capacity, he brought with him a letter of credence from his sovereign, addressed to his Majesty the Sultan of Morocco. I am not aware that we have in our midst any representative of the third class above recited. It therefore remains to apply the rule of the treaty to the fact. The rule of the treaty is time. He who has been longest at a court of government is to be first at that court of government. The member of the corps last arriving pays the first visit. We (the accredited agents) are of the same class, (second class), and take rank according to the date of the official notice of our arrival. Let me suggest a fact within the knowledge of all my colleagues, except the agent and consul general of Italy. On the arrival of our honorable colleague of France, he made us the first visit. It follows, then, that he has not been longest in our midst, but it does follow that every one of my colleagues, including myself, except my honorable colleague of Italy, have been accredited by our respective sovereigns to his Majesty the Sultan of Morocco, previous to the arrival of my honorable colleague of France. In what sense, then, is he entitled to precedence over the minister resident of Great Britain, the consul general of Sweden, the consul general of Portugal, the consul general of Belgium, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain, and the consul general of the United States? I hope each one of my honorable colleagues above named will give his individual opinion on this question, and let us all understand on what principle the second in juniority can be admitted to be the dean. If title regulated this question, there can be no doubt that Mr. Merry would take precedence over all of us; but by the terms of the treaty we all belong to the second class of representatives, and are on a perfect equality, except as to the question of seniority; the deanship and his higher title of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary is regulated by time in the same manner as is the title of other accredited agents. Now, as time and not title regulates the question of precedence by explicit terms of the treaty, I suggest to all my honorable colleagues that a meeting be held some time this week to determine who is our dean; and in order to avoid for the present the question of seniority, I suggest that we shall meet at the residence of the junior member of the diplomatic corps, our honorable colleague of Italy.

In conclusion, I have the honor to say that I entertain for my honorable colleague of France, as a gentleman and representative, the highest degree of respect and esteem. I admire and acknowledge the great interest he has always manifested in the preservation and protection of the public health, and for the many sage opinions expressed by him, from time to time, in circulars submitted to him and my honorable colleagues. I will go further and say that it has always pained me to be compelled to differ from him on any question of public interest, and in an especial manner does it grieve me to differ from him on the question of seniority raised by our honorable colleague of Italy; and I must declare with perfect frankness, if that question did not affect the dignity of the representative of the United States in Morocco, I would have remained silent; but from my reading and interpretation of the treaty of Vienna, I cannot accord to him the title of doyen, nor can I admit that he is entitled to that distinction. I pray him, however, to have the goodness to pass the circular another time.

JESSE H. McMATH.

I do not desire to continue a polemic in this circular upon a subject which does not concern sanitary matters, but I hope the perusal of my honorable colleagues of Italy and the United States of the accompanying printed paper will satisfy them that ministers plenipotentiary take precedence of other agents accredited to sovereigns, and that the latter are not included in the second class.

(Here the British minister resident quotes in a printed paper the treaty of Vienna, of June 9, 1815, and the protocol of Aix-la-Chapelle of 21st November, 1818.)

By the protocol of 21st November, 1818, it will be observed that ministers resident form an intermediate class between ministers plenipotentiary and chargé d'affaires. If other agents accredited to a sovereign belong to the second class, then I, as minister resident, would have to give precedence to a consul général accredited to the Sultan, who might arrive to-day, though I presented my letters of credence as agent and consul general in 1845, and as minister resident in June, 1860.

Having been instructed by the British government many years past to be guided by the treaty of Vienna in all questions of precedence with my colleagues, I must clearly declare that though I am the representative who holds letters of credence to the Sultan of earlier date than any one of my colleagues, I cannot claim the position of doyen as long as there is a representative here who bears the rank of minister plenipotentiary.

Though I should be most happy to meet the wishes of my honorable colleague of the United States, and attend a meeting as he proposes, I think, after the above explanation and declaration, my presence at least would not be required.

J. H. DRUMMOND HAY.

Since the present circular does not concern the duties of the board of health since the 4th of March last, I propose that it be detached and sent to our honorable dean. I have carefully read Sir Drummond Hay's remarks, and must say, that I think the provisions of the protocol of Aix-la-Chapelle, of the 21st November, 1818, in relation to his diplomatic rank, do not affect the position accorded to me and my colleagues in Morocco by the treaty of Vienna. I must here repeat, that in the third paragraph of article first of said treaty, it is explicitly declared that the second class of diplomatic employés is composed of envoys, ministers, and others accredited to sovereigns. Now I am accredited by my august sovereign to his Majesty the Sultan, and consequently belong to the second class of diplomatic employés in Morocco. If I am not mistaken, article fourth of the same treaty confirms what I have advanced. Here is the first section of that article: "Diplomatic employés shall take rank among themselves in each class according to the date of the official notification of their arrival." Neither in this article, nor in the first, is there any mention of grades; only the class is mentioned, and it is that class of diplomatic employés in Morocco to which I belong, by virtue of my letters of credence.

As I am not decorated with the title of minister resident, I cannot claim to belong to the third class reserved for that diplomatic grade; yet I never had the most remote idea of disputing the right of my honorable British colleague to belong to the second class, by virtue of his letters of credence to Morocco.

The British regulations of precedence among consuls is generally adopted by all the Christian powers, because there are diplomatic employés accredited to those nations, and they must have precedence, while consuls are only provided with an accreditation. Here my letters of credence as only representative of my august sovereign are accepted, and therefore I belong to the second class of diplomatic employés, by article first of the treaty of Vienna.

As I recognize the title of dean conferred upon our honorable colleague of France, not only in deference to his high grade but to his qualifications, I must decline the honor of seniority put upon me by the representative of the United States, because I regard it as already settled to the satisfaction of all, even of our honorable colleague, Mr. McMath.

My sole object in expressing this opinion is to show that the representative of Italy, by virtue of the treaty of Vienna, will have the same right to the title of dean of the diplomatic corps as any other representative.

CASTELLINARD.

The government of Morocco regards us as equals, without reference to the treaty of Vienna, and any partial discrimination would be an insult to the crowned heads which we represent; and I protest, in the name of my sovereign, against any discrimination.

Now, in reference to our diplomatic acts, in which precedence is discussed, I must adhere to the regulations of rank among diplomatic agents, (17th annex to the final act of the congress of Vienna,) signed by Count Palmella for Portugal, unless different instructions are given to me by my government. However, if the meeting of my honorable colleagues takes place, I will certainly attend, to try to settle the question mooted in the circular.

JOSÉ DANIEL COLAÇO.

I agree with the chargé d'affaires of Spain that it is not our business to discuss, or even interpret the regulations of the congress of Vienna, fixing the rank of diplomatic agents accredited to the same court. In my opinion, the question amounts to this: can consuls general and ministers accredited to the Emperor of Morocco pretend to belong to the second class of diplomatic employés, comprised under the denomination of envoys, ministers, or others accredited to sovereigns?

The words, "ministers or others," in the regulations of the congress of Vienna, seems to put our colleague of Italy in the right; yet the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle clearly establishes the contrary, in saying that ministers resident, accredited like other envoys to sovereigns, are not considered as forming a part of the second class.

The case of agents accredited to sovereigns in certain countries outside of Europe, with the simple grade of consul general, was certainly not provided for by the plenipotentiaries of the treaty of Vienna, nor by the signers of the supplementary act of Aix-la-Chapelle; and if those personages had condescended to notice employés of that rank, they would have put them in a class between ministers resident and chargé d'affaires; for they could not be put above ministers resident nor below chargés, who are not accredited to sovereigns in Europe, but to ministers of foreign affairs.

Until it is decided by proper authority what relations consuls general in Morocco shall bear to the other envoys there, I have determined to be neither flesh nor fish. I will, however, attend the meeting proposed by our colleague from the United States, if only to relieve us from the circulomania that is now inflicting us.

ERNEST DELUIN.

The president has the honor to say to the French minister, that the circular, beginning with a demand for the pay of the Morocco guards stationed at the port of Tangier, and ending with a discussion about the regulations of the congress of Vienna, has just reached him. The president is not to blame because it skipped from North America to England, without passing through France.

The president now sends the said circular to the French minister, with the request that he keep it or circulate it, just as he pleases; as it does not concern the board of health, the president does not know what to do with it.

The president has the honor to inform the French minister that the circular in question was officially asked for by the consul general of Sweden and Norway. The President sent an official answer to the said consul general, informing him that the circular would be sent to him.

The French minister is, therefore, politely requested to hand it over.

DIOSDADO.

I have nothing to add to this polemic, except to say, that, as my grade of French minister plenipotentiary comes to me from the Emperor, I leave it to his government to decide if I am dean of the diplomatic consular corps at Tangier. It will also decide the dispute with the agent and consul general of Italy. In the mean time, I concede to none the right to dispute my prerogatives, and, until it is otherwise decided, I shall know how to make them respected.

Now, gentlemen, allow me to add, that some of us are mistaken in affirming the equality of our grades. I think proper to inform you that those of us who are neither ministers nor chargé d'affaires, or agents, do not belong to the diplomatic body, but to the consular corps. The first of these two classes has generally the good taste not to make the second feel this distinction. For my part, I think I have always observed this rule, so as not to wound my true colleagues, and I give them all the same title. Hereafter I shall give to each his proper title. I do not mean by this to give offense, but I wish thus to determine the rank of each of us, in consideration of the singular question that has been put to me. I will inform the consul general of Portugal that he is mistaken in the equality he asserts. In all public ceremonies in Morocco, our grades are perfectly observed, and I will never allow it to be otherwise, as far as I am concerned. At the scherriff receptions and private audiences of the Sultan, foreign ministers have the privilege of taking seats, while consuls general of the Christian powers are obliged to stand in presence of his Majesty when seated on his throne. Does that signify that the nation of the agents who are not ministers is lessened in consideration? Most certainly not!

I have nothing more to say except that my opinion is fixed, and if it is not concurred in by my colleagues, they need not try to make me change it. I concede them no right to discuss the question, and if my diplomatic prerogatives are again contested, I shall appeal to my government, without saying anything more here.

In reference to the president's request to keep this circular, I cannot comply with it. As it began with business concerning the presidency, it ought to go back to his archives. I will, however, send it to the consul general of Sweden and Norway, with the request that it be sent to the British legation, so that it may go round and be discussed by all. I will have nothing more to do with it.

AYMÉ D'AQUIN.

POSTSCRIPT, July 25.—At a meeting held to-day the chargé d'affaires of Spain and the consul general of the United States, and of Sweden and Norway, asked for my opinion on the second part of the circular, and I told them I would retract nothing of what I had said.
A. D'A.

As the minister of France has no right to discuss and degrade the official position accorded to us by our respective governments, I can attach no importance to his personal opinion, since it has met with no response even from those whom he terms his true colleagues.

As the minister of France is alone in his unprovoked attacks, particularly hard on me, who never contested his prerogative in matters of etiquette against the representatives of Sweden and Norway, of Portugal, Belgium and the United States of America, it is beneath my dignity to refer the subject to my government.

It may be proper, however, to notice the schism of yesterday, which must operate to the detriment of civilization in Tangier. The fact has unfortunately transpired, and volumes of circulars could not reconcile us to the French minister's opinion. Having declared that he would meet none of us officially at our own houses, he cannot be offended if we do not meet him officially in his, though our respective countrymen may suffer by the determination.

During the twenty years that I have lived in this country, the foreign representatives have always discussed and solved, under their different titles, (which I have ever respected,) in perfect equality, all questions of health, hygiene, and public order, which the exceptional situation of Morocco called upon us to solve for the general good of our countrymen and protégés. Yes, this inconvenient equality is inscribed here in all our intercourse with the authorities of Morocco; it was so in the old consular corps as it is now in the health board, and was in the recent convention for the Spartelet light-house. So then, if the representative of France, or any other power, seats himself in the Sultan's presence, the consul general of Sweden and Norway, as the representative of the united kingdoms, will also seat himself in the Sultan's presence. Again, there is no question here about European courts and civilized countries, and the Sultan of Morocco did not sign the final act of the Vienna congress, nor the protocol of Aix-la-Chapelle.

Only yesterday the French minister acknowledged, in presence of all the foreign representatives, that a consul general in Europe, an unpaid commercial agent, even a merchant at times, under the order of the legation at the capital, held the same position as a consul general chief of a mission, accredited and representing his sovereign near a foreign sovereign.

In fact, we ought all to be pleased because the French minister is going to refer this matter to the imperial government.

I will not close without thanking the French minister for calling us his dear colleagues, at the risk of wounding his true colleagues.

We must be satisfied hereafter to be called simply consuls general; but we must not forget to maintain our rights.

S. EHRENHOF.

Countersigned:

J. H. DRUMMOND HAY.

I am truly sorry for our dispute about the question I addressed to the French minister in this circular, on the 15th instant, styling him dean. But the honorable Baron Ayme d'Aquin's declarations show I was right in asking the question, as he assumes the sole right to preside over the corps of foreign representatives in Morocco, as minister plenipotentiary, and to make known our determinations to the Sultan's vizier for the public good.

This doctrine being contrary to all precedent in Tangier, and of a nature to give to the local authorities a false idea of the rank of our respective nations, I here declare that I do not accept it.

I for one do not contest the honorable gentleman's rank; but my opinion is, that he errs in wishing to regard the representatives of the other powers in Morocco as if they were in France, or at courts that did not sign the treaty of Vienna.

Although consuls are generally considered as diplomatic agents, they do not rank with ministers at civilized courts, simply because they have no letters of credence; yet consuls to the Barbary States, particularly to Morocco, an independent nation, are exceptions to this rule, because they are accredited and treated as ministers. (See Diplomacy, by Thomas Hartwell.)

With these principles, and as the questions are entirely foreign to etiquette, I am ready to continue to attend the meetings of the corps of foreign representatives at the French minister's, whenever he will do me the honor to invite me; but at the same time I insist upon the same rules for the meetings of the board of health that have been held up to this date, and that they be fixed every six months, alternately presided over by the persons at whose house they take place.

CASTELLINARD.

It was my intention merely to write approved upon all that is found in this voluminous circular, which serves to show us that the cholera is not at present in our city; had the cholera prevailed, I am sure we would have had neither time nor inclination to busy ourselves about such a useless discussion.

But as the French minister has addressed me again, to say that I am mistaken in the equality to which I lay claim, with remarks on other public ceremonies in Morocco, I deem it my duty to reply to him, and inform him that I know the difference between a consul general and a minister plenipotentiary.

Now, the sovereign of Morocco did not sign the final act of the congress of Vienna, nor the protocol of Aix-la-Chapelle, as our colleague of Sweden and Norway remarks. He did not adopt the principles there laid down, because he is not in the community of civilized nations, and God knows if he ever will be. If we turn to this country we will perceive changes coming over it. Morocco has no representatives in civilized communities, while various Christian powers are represented here; and though we bear different titles, we are equal before the Sultan and his government, and I will never consent to be treated as inferior to the French minister, or any other agent here. I do not aspire to a higher title than I possess, but knowing as I do that nobody here comprehends the treaty of Vienna, the treatment of the government towards us gives the people an idea of the inequality of position of our respective governments. Moreover, I think the Christian powers have no definite decision on ceremonies for their ministers and consuls in Morocco. The public audience takes place, as we all know, at the sheriff's court; the Sultan is mounted on a horse that looks like his throne, and the envoy, minister, or consul stands before the sovereign. In private audiences the envoy or minister may be seated in his Majesty's presence, but the consul, as representative of his sovereign, may demand the same privilege.

The Moors know no difference in diplomatic ranks, and every agent, whether minister plenipotentiary, minister resident, or chargé d'affaires, is ambassador (bachador) to them. In their opinion, all diplomatic agents belong to the first class, as fixed by the treaty of Vienna.

The French minister proposes to give us hereafter our proper titles. He can do as he pleases in that particular; I see nothing insulting to us in it. I am only consul general, and he is minister plenipotentiary, as we all know. Each of us are heads of missions. I depend upon the minister of foreign affairs at Lisbon; am under no diplomatic chief here; and the French minister has a similar subordination to the minister of foreign affairs in Paris.

By virtue of our analogous positions, the French minister used to treat me as a colleague, as he did all the consuls general, and the Spanish and British ministers treated me in the same manner.

JOSE DANIEL COLAÇO.

As my honorable colleagues of the consular corps have exhausted the subject, I can say nothing, except that I have never contested the prerogatives belonging to the rank which the French minister holds.

ERNEST DELUIN.

"Consular privileges are much less extensive in Christian than in Mohammedan countries. In the latter, they are diplomatic agents under the name of consuls. They alone are accredited and treated as ministers." This is the opinion of Wheaton, Kent, Story, Leibnitz, and other illustrious writers of America and Europe on international law.

On the 25th ultimo Monsieur le Ministre of France declared in the presence of all the foreign representatives in Tangier, that a consul general—a commercial agent—in Europe, under the orders of the legation in the capital, had identically the same position as a consul general, chief of a mission accredited and representing his sovereign near a foreign sovereign. It remains for Monsieur la Ministre of France alone to differ from the above cited law writers. For myself I adhere to their opinion.

No. 40.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, December 30, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 61, of the 16th ultimo, relative to the question of precedence which has arisen among the representatives of foreign powers of Tangier, has been received. In reply I have to state that every nation may consult its own pleasure in regard to the grade of its diplomatic or other representative in a foreign country. That grade must be presumed to be measured by its sense of the importance of its relations with the power to which the representative may be accredited.

Consuls have diplomatic functions in the Barbary states. The United States consul is accredited to the Emperor of Morocco. His predecessors were accredited in the same way, and the consuls at Tripoli, Tunis, and in Egypt are respectively accredited to the heads of the governments of those countries.

It is customary, where the rules of the treaty of Vienna and the protocol of Aix-la-Chapelle are acknowledged, for the eldest of the chief grade to take precedence of all others, and the eldest also when they are all of the same grade. Is this rule binding and operative at Tangier?

The French have thought proper to accredit a minister plenipotentiary to the Emperor of Morocco, who resides at Tangier, and who claims precedence over the representatives of other governments there solely in virtue of the superiority of his official grade. Is this claim indefeasible? The rules in regard to precedence above referred to, having been embodied in a treaty and in a protocol, may be technically binding only on the parties to those instruments. The United States were not a party to them. The Emperor of Morocco might disregard them for a similar reason. Those rules, however, may be said to have been merely a formal recognition by the chief powers of Europe of a custom which had been the law of nations upon the subject ever since diplomacy began in modern times. As such they have hitherto been practically accepted even by this government, whenever it may have had occasion to send representatives of any of the grades to which they refer. We have never had any officer at Tangier of a higher grade than consul. If, however, we should accredit a minister plenipotentiary to the Emperor of Morocco, we certainly should expect him to have precedence on public occasions, and in official proceedings, over the representatives of lower grade from other powers. Should not the same privilege be conceded to other states?

The advantage, if it be one, is accidental now in the case of France. It may be claimed by ourselves, or by Mexico, or by Switzerland, to-morrow.

If, as cannot be denied, the grade of a diplomatic agent implies the opinion entertained by his government of the importance of his relations with the government to which he may be accredited, this may, it seems, be properly allowed. It may, however, be taken for granted that, whatever may be the grade of such an agent, his social or public efficiency is by no means always in proportion to his grade, but will be influenced by the comparative importance of the country he may represent, and will also comport with the strength of his character and of his abilities.

It is not supposed that the tardiness of the minister of France in asserting the privileges of his grade precludes him from assuming them whenever he may deem it advisable.

Under these circumstances, the impression is entertained that it will not be contrary to your official dignity, or that of the government which you represent, to acquiesce in the application at Tangier of the conventional rule which prevails here and everywhere else.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, December 3, 1867.

SIR: I have reason to believe that the Bey has been persuaded of the necessity of introducing such reforms in his administration as shall offer guarantees which will be satisfactory to the foreign governments represented here.

It seems that he is now seriously inclined to restore the fundamental laws which were suspended in 1864, guaranteeing security to the person, property, and honor of all classes of his subjects, and which will prevent the recurrence of events which he cannot fail to perceive have received from the civilized world the most decided reprobation.

It is also proposed to make such radical changes in the system of assessing and collecting the taxes as will be a check on the agents and a protection to the people; the establishment of a board composed of experienced and responsible persons being one of the measures proposed.

These measures have been submitted to the French government for its approval and countenance, and if carried out in good faith will undoubtedly be beneficial to foreign interests, but will also give still greater preponderance to French influences. They meet, however, the approval of the British government, which is here generally antagonistic to France. It is in fact through the influence of her Britannic Majesty's agent and consul general that these measures have been accepted by the Bey. He is recently from Paris, and by his representations there, delayed the departure for Tunis of a considerable naval and military force. Should these measures not be carried out in good faith, it is quite probable that a portion of the French army and fleet, now at Civita Vecchia, will be sent to Tunis. These reforms do not come spontaneously from his Highness, but have been suggested to him as the only means of saving his regency from foreign occupation.

The details, which have been confidentially communicated to me, are likely to be modified before they are finally adopted, but I hope to be able shortly to inform the department of the decision of the foreign office in Paris, on which everything for the present rests.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. H. HEAP.

No. 6.]

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, December 6, 1867.

SIR: I have delayed until now any mention of the deplorable events which have kept this unfortunate country in a state of painful excitement and apprehension since September last. Mr. Cubisol, the late acting consul, had not placed on record his correspondence with the department during the time he was in charge of the consulate. He has just furnished me with copies of his dispatches, which are full of interest.

Happily this country had been exempt for many years from such sanguinary scenes as have succeeded each other with alarming rapidity during the last few months, and the people seemed to be steadily advancing in civilization, if not in prosperity. * * * * *

I shall not enter into the particulars of the late insurrection which the dispatches of Mr. Cubisol have brought so graphically and thoroughly to the knowledge of the department, but confine myself to a brief synopsis of these events, which may be useful for reference.

In September last, certain Arab tribes inhabiting the mountains in the western district near the Algerian frontier, who had for some years refused to pay taxes or tribute to the Bey, their master, and for several months been in arms against him, gave still more serious cause for anxiety by more daring acts of hostility to his authority. The nature of the country gave them great facility for defying the force he had sent against them under General Zarook, which was able only to watch the tribes, but was quite too small to follow them into their mountain fastnesses.

The position was unpleasant and humiliating, but if the Bey was unable to reduce the Arabs, he could at least do as he had done heretofore—let them alone, losing only, in addition to his prestige as ruler, the arrears of taxes due by them, which in the depressed condition of his finances was doubtless what he valued the most.

But the situation was rendered too serious to be longer neglected when it was discovered that Sidi Adel Bey, his Highness's youngest brother, had disappeared from the bardo and joined the insurgents, with the hope of being elected their leader. The Bey, now seriously alarmed, immediately dispatched Sidi Ali Bey, "Bey of the Camp," and heir presumptive to Begia, in the vicinity of the insurrectionary district, with re-enforcements, and to take command of the army, as General Zarook declined to assume the responsibility of arresting a prince of the reigning family.

Partly by force and threats, partly by persuasion, but mostly by means which are found irresistible in these countries, Sidi Ali Bey soon got his brother in his power, and at the same time a number of the prince's adherents who had accompanied or joined him in his flight. These were soon induced to divulge the names of all who were in the plot, and so many were inculpated that soon the dungeons of the bardo were gorged with prisoners.

Two of Sidi Adel's principal officers were executed in the camp, and the prince was sent with the remainder to the bardo, where he was kept in confinement in his own palace. Nearly 200 sheiks and principal men of the tribes, who were captured at the same time, were sent to the bardo and the goletta, where they received various sentences; some were exiled, some bastinadoed, and many were confined to the Bey's ships to do duty as common sailors, and kept under a strict surveillance.

A few days after Sidi Adel's flight two generals of division, friends of the prince, were strangled at the bardo by order of the Bey; one was Sidi Ismail Sunni, (his Highness's brother-in-law,) and the other Sidi Reehid. This took place in the early part of October, without subjecting them to the ordinary course and procedure indicated by the law, and without permitting them the means of offering a defense.

It appears that the Bey was induced to take these severe measures by the real or supposed discovery of a plot by which the troops were to be brought over to act in the movement, and that even some of the officers of his body-guard had been seduced from their allegiance. * * *

Adel Bey died on the 4th of November, it was reported, of camp fever, and Ben Gadam and Ben Dahar, chiefs of the great Arab revolt of 1864, and who had been kept in confinement at the goletta ever since, died a few days before the prince in their prisons.

Since then from fifteen to twenty other persons, who were compromised by the disclosures of Sidi Adel and his companions, have been exiled to Syria.

These deplorable events have filled the country with consternation. It seemed a return to the barbarous practices of a period far remote, which it was thought a long contact with the civilization of Europe had rendered impossible.

Although the constitution promulgated under the preceding reign was suspended during the rebellion of 1864, and though it has not been renewed since, it was not thought possible that the Tunisian government would defy the opinion of the civilized world to the extent of perpetrating deeds darker and more atrocious than had been committed under any previous reign. They have received the severest reprobation from several of the principal European governments, who, in communicating on the subject with their representatives here, have expressed the utmost horror and indignation. I have been permitted to see some of these dispatches, in which diplomatic etiquette is well-nigh forgotten in the expression of the sovereign's displeasure that one who had received testimonials from every crowned head of Europe on account of his efforts to advance the welfare of his people, should suddenly have relapsed, as it were, into barbarism, and reproduced scenes which it was hoped had passed into history with other bad things of the past.

In the midst of a severe epidemic, the country suffering from a drought of over two years' duration, the population sinking under poverty, pestilence and famine, these events produced the most profound and painful sensation.

It was natural that the death of Sidi Adel, preceded as it was by those of the two Arab chiefs at the goletta, should have given rise to the darkest suspicions, which seem, unfortunately, too well founded. Others of lesser note died or disappeared suddenly about the same time, and these tragedies would probably have continued had not the consuls of France and Italy and some others interfered.

* * * * *

I beg the indulgence of the department for this long dispatch, but I hope it will be found useful as a sketch of the events of the few last months, the details of which have been ably related by Mr. Cubisol.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Tunis, December 20, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of dispatch No. 3. I have communicated its contents to Mr. Cubisol.

I regret to report that since my last the sufferings of this population from famine and the inclemency of the weather have frightfully increased. A few days since one hundred and nine persons died of starvation in the streets of the city, and I was told by a gentleman that on his way from the goletta to Tunis he found the bodies of three Arabs on the road. The greatest mortality in the city from hunger and cold was on the 10th instant, when, I am informed, it reached one hundred and forty-two.

The news from the interior is equally distressing. It is impossible to obtain even an approximate estimate of the number who perish daily from starvation in all parts of the regency, but it is known to be very great.

Supplies of grain have reached here, but thousands have not the means of purchasing it.

Notwithstanding the rains, which give promise of abundant crops, large tracts of lands remain untilled for the want of cattle or seed-grain. The price of wheat is $3 per bushel and of barley $1 50.

Arab women offer their children to Christians for a few coppers to purchase bread.

This stricken people bear their misery with patience and resignation. I hear of no disorder or disturbance. Starving men, women, and children lie literally starving a few yards from the provision stalls, gazing with wistful eyes on the coveted food, yet they commit no act of violence, or scarcely of pilfering.

Among the Christians, who number upwards of ten thousand in the city and its environs, there is much poverty and suffering, but they receive some relief.

The Jewish population is about twenty thousand. The richer members of this persuasion have done more for their poor than all others of the inhabitants combined for theirs.

The Mahometans alone view the suffering of their brethren with stoical apathy or indifference. They look upon it as a dispensation of Providence, which it would be useless, perhaps sinful, to mitigate. Their fanaticism is made a ready apology for their avarice.

A feeble effort was made recently to give food and shelter to the Mohometan poor, but the relief so grudgingly offered was totally inadequate. A Moorish hospital, richly endowed, receives the corpses picked up each morning in the streets, to prepare them for burial, but refuses admission to the living. Children scarcely able to walk are found wandering in the streets, crying for food, their parents having died or forsaken them. Many are sheltered and fed by charitable Christians.

The scenes daily witnessed in the streets are distressing in the extreme.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. H. HEAP.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, January 4, 1868.

SIR: On the 27th of December, 1867, two hundred of our fellow creatures died of hunger in the streets and ruined tenements of this city.

The daily average of deaths from this cause alone is considerably over one hundred, and the prospect for the future is gloomy in the extreme.

The foreigners resident here do what they can, and there is a great deal of private charity, but after providing for the first necessities of their own (the European) poor, little is left for the wretched natives.

In this city we rarely hear of any cases of violence. Latterly, the murder of a Jew created a sensation, which proved how rare such acts are; but I regret to learn that the same tranquillity does not prevail in the interior, where the Arabs, driven to despair, attack and pillage travelers and even caravans.

It is sickening to meet in our drives and walks the corpses of those who have perished on the roadside.

A well authenticated case of starvation in the United States thrills the community with horror. Imagine, sir, a whole population stricken with famine, and hundreds dying daily for want of food.

I am forbidden to appeal through the papers to the proverbial charity and liberality of my fellow countrymen. But such an appeal, if made under the authority of the department, cannot fail to have a good effect.

My pen is totally inadequate to describe the heart-rending scenes we daily witness, and it is dreadful to hear the cries of the hungering wretches at night.

These poor creatures seem to be forsaken by the whole world. They have no friends on this side of the grave. Should America, out of her abundance, send succor to them, what a reflection it will be on those nations so near to them, but so cold and indifferent to their sufferings.

They have no claim on us for help as the Irish had, except that of a common humanity. How much more would the unexpected bounty be appreciated, coming so opportunely and from so far.

Coarse bread and common woollen stuffs can be had at reasonable prices, and that is all these people need to keep them from suffering.

I venture to make this appeal to the department in the hope that it may be induced to bring it prominently before the public. Many here look to the United States for help. They have heard so much of our liberality to other nations in distress, that they cannot but hope some small share of it may be extended to this starving people.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, February 27, 1868.

SIR: Although already overburdened with debt, the Bey's government has recently endeavored, by means of a new loan, to relieve its finances from the exhaustion to which they are reduced by the failure of all regular sources of revenue.

Through General Musalli, director of foreign affairs, who is now in Paris, negotiations were opened with the banking house of "International Credit," whose president, Mr. Bureau, came here to arrange about the loan, and also to establish a bank. These measures created much alarm in the business community, as it was evident that the proposed issue of from fifty to seventy millions of francs in paper, with a forced circulation on a metallic basis, and that probably nominal, of ten millions only, would give the finishing stroke to the commercial interests of the country. Happily, these fears were allayed by the bankruptcy of Mr. Bureau, on his return to Paris.

The Bey is now reduced to such extreme penury, that his body-guard is sometimes left without rations for twenty-four hours, and his purveyors have often difficulty in providing for his own table.

The famine continues its frightful ravages. During the forty days ending the 6th instant, the number of interments from the establishments where the dead are prepared for burial was eight thousand two hundred and thirty—a daily average of over two hundred—of whom over one hundred and seventy-five died of hunger, and this in the city.

The carelessness with which the bodies have been interred, and the general misery and poverty, are bearing their fruits. Malignant fevers are prevailing, and we are threatened with an epidemic more fatal, even, than that which swept the regency last year.

As the authorities, though frequently urged by the consuls, not only took no measures for the cleansing of the streets, but neglected their own regulations for the burial of the dead, permitted deposits of bones, hides, and rags, in the most thickly populated parts of the city, and of carcasses of animals in the open spaces, the accumulation of filth of every description in all the streets, and other nuisances too numerous and too disgusting to mention, it became necessary for self-preservation that the foreign population, numbering here some ten thousand souls, should adopt measures for the public health.

A "Council of Public Salubrity" has been created, consisting of eight members, representing and elected by the different nationalities, and presided over by a consul, which is already proceeding, with ample means at its disposal, to the herculean task of cleansing and purifying this Augean stable. I am at present the president of the council, and trust we shall succeed in removing most of the sources of pestilence with which our quarter is filled.

A disease resembling the cattle plague having been denounced to the board of health, which is composed of the consuls, it has appointed a committee to examine and report on the subject.

There is every prospect of a bountiful harvest this year. The oil crop, which is the principal one, promises to be abundant. Two or three good crops in succession will be sufficient, if no fresh disaster occurs, to restore the country to at least its former prosperity. Before the next harvest, however, fully one-third the population will have perished.

The Bey has recently received a complete battery of artillery from the King of Italy, in return for a bronze cannon of large dimensions and exquisite workmanship which the Bey had presented to the King. The presentation was made at the goletta, with much ceremony, as the Tunisian government was glad to give éclat to an interchange of courtesies, which seemed to do away, in some degree, with the odium which attaches to it since the events of last fall.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. H. HEAP.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, April 23, 1868.

SIR: I have not informed the department of the various plans of reform which have been, within the last few months, successively proposed, momentarily entertained, and finally postponed or rejected by the Bey's government, as they have resulted in nothing definitive.

The dilapidation of the finances, the venality of the employés engaged in the collection of the revenue, the entire disregard of the claims of the government creditors, the reckless issue of tiskerus or obligations, which have been sold in London and Paris at a discount of 96 per cent., the misery of the people, and the oppressive burden of the taxes which paralyze every branch of industry, are all evils which cry aloud for immediate and radical reforms.

A project has latterly been submitted to the Bey by the representative of France, whose citizens with those of England and Italy are the principal creditors of the government. But as it placed the finances under the exclusive control of a commission composed in majority of Frenchmen—one of whom, the vice-president, was to be named by the French government—and allowed two only of the eight members to be named by the Bey; and, moreover, as the project ignored the interests of the English and Italian bondholders as well as the sovereign rights of the Bey, the consuls of England and Italy exerted their influence to cause the rejection of this scheme and urged the adoption of one more in accord with principles of justice. His Highness was made to see that the acceptance of this project would be virtually equivalent to delivering his government into the hands of Frenchmen and himself subsiding into a French prefect, administering the government of his country for the benefit of France.

The whole question, through the strenuous exertions of the consuls of England and Italy, has been referred to their respective governments, and is now being debated in Paris, where, it is hoped, some plan will be adopted freed from the objectionable features so easily engendered by local and individual jealousies, and comprehensive enough to guard not only the sovereign rights of the Bey and the interests of his creditors, but also to protect in some measure his unfortunate subjects, who are invariably made to suffer the most for the ignorance, dishonesty and disloyalty of the government.

When definite reforms are inaugurated, I shall lose no time in transmitting the details to the department.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

G. H. HEAP.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, April 24, 1868.

SIR: The results apprehended from the mortality occasioned by the great destitution and misery which have prevailed here for over a year, the neglect by the authorities of all sanitary laws, and their carelessness in the burial of the dead, are now being unfortunately realized.

A destructive epidemic is prevailing in this city and the principal towns of the regency, which, attacking all classes alike, has already carried off as many, if not more, victims among the foreigners residing here, as the cholera of last year. The disease is a malignant typhus, and it is impossible to guard against it, as the poor starving wretches dying in the streets convey the infection to our very doors.

The famine has considerably diminished. A large number of Arabs, estimated as one-half of this class of the population, have died, and the survivors now find in the herbs and roots they collect in the fields some means of subsistence.

I have received from the United States, and Americans abroad, liberal donations for the "suffering Arabs," and have been able by these and other means to clothe and feed a considerable number of women and children, which I shall continue to do until harvest. Still more considerable sums have been sent to the English consul, who has bread distributed to several hundred Arabs daily.

I regret to say that the Bey has done nothing to mitigate the suffering among his people; on the contrary, when we complained to him of this neglect, he gave orders to collect all the wretched creatures found wandering in the streets and drive them to distant points in the country, where they die by hundreds, monthly, from hunger and disease.

As the promise of abundant harvests are now on the eve of being fully realized, I hope that this afflicted people will soon be able to find relief without being, as so many now are, entirely dependent on a precarious charity.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Tunis, April 25, 1868.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch of the 23d instant, No. 14, I have to inform the department that, by yesterday's steamer, the chargé d'affaires of France received instructions from his government to insist upon the acceptance by the Bey of the project of reform in the financial department, of which I gave an outline in that communication.

The Bey, still acting under the advice of the agent of England, having declined to give his assent to a plan which would reduce him to a state of complete vassalage and dependence, the French representative has formally suspended his official relations with this government.

Unless sustained by England, I apprehend that his Highness will have to yield or abdicate, which he has more than once threatened to do under analogous circumstances.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. H. HEAP.

No. 19.]

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, April 28, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state on the evening of the 26th instant I received a circular from his Highness the Bey, inclosing a copy of a letter he had addressed to the Viscount de Botmilian, the chargé d'affaires of France, and informing me that by his (M. de Botmilian's) act diplomatic relations between his government and that of France were interrupted on the 24th instant.

As this event may occasion serious complications, and being anxious to give the department the most authentic information on the subject within my reach, I requested his Highness to grant me an official interview, in order to receive from his own lips explanation of the causes which had brought about this unfortunate occurrence.

His Highness granted my request at once, and received me yesterday. His Highness stated that on the 24th instant, on the arrival of the mails from France, the French chargé d'affaires had called upon him, and, producing a dispatch and a private letter, congratulated his Highness on the acceptance on the part of his government of the project for the formation of a commission having for its object the administration of the financial affairs of the regency, and requested his Highness to give to it at once his formal adhesion in the shape of a letter to the Marquis de Moustier, or to himself, embodying the eight articles or conditions upon which the commission was to be formed.

His Highness observed to M. de Botmilian that he could not comply with his demand, inasmuch as, although he had accepted the project in principle, the representatives of Great Britain and Italy had objected, not to the commission itself, but to its composition and the manner it was proposed to be carried out; and the agent of Italy having, in fact, presented a protest by order of his government, rendering his Highness personally responsible for whatever prejudice might accrue hereafter to Italian interests, he (the Bey) had formally consented to allow them time for communication with their respective governments, a course which M. de Botmilian had himself suggested in the event that a divergence of opinion between the three agents should render such reference necessary; that the matter being under the consideration of the three friendly powers, it was due to them to wait for their decision, which they would not retard to give beyond a few days, and he therefore earnestly requested that he would not press his demand for the letter in the manner and form it was required of him, and which he could not give without acting discourteously towards the governments of Great Britain and that of Italy.

The French chargé d'affaires, after having failed to persuade his Highness to change his resolution, accused him of having retracted his promises to carry out this scheme, which retraction he would represent to his government as an act of bad faith; that if his Highness was afraid of England and Italy, he ought to entertain greater fears with regard to France, his more powerful neighbor; that unless he forthwith addressed the letter he required of him, the Emperor would consider it as a personal indignity offered to him and would resent it accordingly; that his refusal would be attended with the most disastrous consequences to his person, his family, and his friends, which a persistence in his refusal would place in immediate danger.

In vain his Highness repeated his remarks, as well as his reluctance to prejudice the interests of the subjects of other governments, which, he had reason to hope would speedily come to an understanding in common regarding a question of importance which concerned them equally, and by which decision he would abide as soon as he was made acquainted with it through their respective representatives. M. de Botmilian questioned the interest of Great Britain and Italy in this matter, but, be that as it may, he would have the letter he demanded, or he would from that day interrupt his relations and communications with his Highness. He should regret to have to take this step, because it would result in disaster to his Highness and to his family, since, if he quitted his post, France would never again send another representative to Tunis, intimating thereby that she would occupy it militarily.

All the arguments of the Bey to dissuade him from pursuing a course of moral coercion, when the question in respect to which he employed it was still under the consideration of the three governments, having proved of no avail, his Highness then earnestly begged of him not to bring about unnecessarily a rupture between him and France, with whose previous wishes he had complied; that he could not believe that it was her desire at present to make that compliance the ground of a misunderstanding between the two governments, or between his government and those of England and Italy, and that he therefore trusted, by M. Botmilian's forbearance and moderation, he would be spared future difficulties that would overwhelm him. Should it, however, be the fixed purpose of the French representative either to extort an acquiescence in his demand, or to produce complications, in that case his Highness had no alternative than to declare his inability to resist either France, England, or Italy, and that consequently, if it was the pleasure of the Emperor to coerce him and to occupy his country, he would surrender it, since he could not defend it; but in that case it would be more desirable that the intention should be openly expressed, instead of preparing the means to justify an attack by making demands which it was known beforehand could not be yielded without laying the foundation for future complications and dangers.

This painful conference lasted upwards of four hours, at the end of which time the French chargé d'affaires repeated his intention to interrupt his relations. M. de Botmilian retired to the ante-room with this menace, but said that he would give his Highness time to reflect. After some delay, and a further conversation in the same strain with the Bey's minister, M. de Botmilian returned to his Highness's presence unannounced, and in a violent and unbecoming manner said that since his Highness persisted in his refusal, and had seen fit to act towards the representative of France with bad faith, it placed him under the necessity of informing his Highness that the diplomatic relations between the two governments were suspended until instructions from his own were received.

His Highness spoke with much emotion of the distress this scene had occasioned him. His minister related the principal facts, but was frequently interrupted by the Bey with remarks on points which he seemed desirous that I should be particular in mentioning to my government.

I stated to his Highness my conviction that the government of the United States would receive the details which he had had the kindness to communicate to me with deep sympathy, and that I felt I was only anticipating its wishes in assuring his Highness that, should an opportunity offer whereby its friendly intervention could with propriety be exercised in his behalf, it would not be wanting. I reminded his Highness, however, that my government carefully abstained from all interference in discussions of this nature in which it was not immediately a party interested.

I also ventured to remark to his Highness that as a sovereign he could not yield his just rights without abdicating his throne; that their maintenance with firmness against a superior power would gain him the sympathy of the civilized world; that at the present day a decent respect for public opinion was sometimes the most effectual protection of weak governments against the encroachments of stronger ones; that the Emperor of France was a great, powerful, and generous sovereign, and that when the facts, as related by his Highness, were brought to his knowledge, there was every reason to hope that his Majesty would take no step that might tarnish his honor.

His Highness having been pleased to ask me what opinion my government would form if he should yield the possession of his government to France, I replied that my government, having sent me to represent it near an independent sovereign, I could not doubt that it would feel the deepest concern and sympathy if such an unfortunate event should come to pass. My country was eminently just towards all nations; that while it sometimes bore patiently injuries and even slights from weaker powers, it never brooked insult or wrong from an equal; and though it was not our policy to interfere in discussions in which we had no immediate interest, yet, as one of the principal powers of the world, we did not hesitate to express our disapproval of all acts of oppression, whether upon nations or individuals.

Upon taking my leave, his Highness requested me to communicate all the facts he had related to my government. I informed him that I intended to call upon M. de Botmilian for the same purpose I had in asking an interview with his Highness, and while I disclaimed all pretense of exercising any influence over him, I intimated my readiness to convey any message his Highness might be pleased to intrust to me. He said that as M. de Botmilian had thrice refused to receive the letter, a copy of which had been sent to me, it was hopeless to expect that he would in any way change the line of conduct he had traced out for himself; but he desired me to remember, and to repeat, that under all circumstances he was the devoted friend and ally of France, and that he had never, before or since his accession to the throne, experienced so much distress of mind as when he heard that the flag of that nation had, for the first time in the history of Tunis, been lowered in displeasure at the consulate.

I then called on M. de Botmilian and informed him of the conversation I had just had with the Bey, and that I now requested to hear from him, for my government's information, the reasons he might deem proper to communicate to me which had induced him to interrupt his friendly relations with this government.

M. de Botmilian stated that the Bey's minister had sent for him some three weeks ago and proposed to him that the plan of a mixed commission which should have for its object the administration of the finances of this country, &c. After some discussion as to details the plan was accepted by M. de Botmilian, and he remained at the minister's house until both it and a letter from the minister to M. de Botmilian to accompany it, and in which he begged M. de Botmilian to use his influence with his government to induce the acceptance of the project, were written. The plan in question certainly delivered the government of Tunis—bound hand and foot—over to a commission composed in majority of Frenchmen and presided over by a financial agent appointed by France. It also ignores the rights of English and Italian subjects, which are at least as important as those of the French. A few days later, another plan was sent by the minister, accompanied by another letter, which gave still greater powers to the commission. M. de Botmilian considered these official letters of the minister binding on the Bey, and transmitted them to Paris under the full belief that the acceptance by his government was all that was now required to render the plan irrevocable. When the dispatches arrived on Friday last, conveying the approval of the French government to the project proposed by the Bey's minister, he hastened to the palace impressed with the conviction that he was carrying to his Highness pleasing news. His surprise, therefore, was great when, upon announcing to the Bey that the dispatches he had in his hand contained the ratification of his government to the second plan offered by the minister, and which the latter had, in his master's name, so strongly urged M. de Botmilian to recommend to the favorable consideration of the French government, and when he asked the Bey to address him a letter confirming the formation of the commission, to be told that his Highness having received strong protests and even threats from the consuls of Great Britain and Italy when the plan was brought to their knowledge, he was now under the necessity of refusing his assent to it. As the remainder of M. de Botmilian's narration coincided in all material points with that I had just received from his Highness, I will not trouble the department with a repetition of it.

It appears to me that M. de Botmilian placed too much stress upon the official and binding character of the plans offered by the minister. Either the Bey was entirely ignorant of the minister's letters, or their importance as being binding upon him was concealed from him.

M. de Botmilian is probably technically correct in considering an official communication from the Bey's minister as binding on the Bey himself as if it had been signed by the latter, but his previous experience of these people, and of the loose manner in which they transact business, and more especially his knowledge of the minister, should have prepared him to feel no surprise if in a matter like this he (the minister) had, for objects of his own, acted a double part. The Bey asserts that he considered the object in sending the plan or plans to Paris as merely to elicit the opinion of the French government, but that he was in no way bound by the kasnadar's letters, which were rather officious than official.

However this may be, the political question this unhappy event gives rise to is one in which all the great powers of Europe are equally interested to have satisfactorily settled. It cannot be overlooked by those which have an interest in the eastern question that it should no more originate in Tunis than on the Danube; for if one powerful neighbor attempts to justify annexation on the ground of political exigency, there is no reason why another should not follow the example on a similar plea.

For the information of the United States ministers at Florence and Constantinople I shall venture to transmit to each a copy of this dispatch, that they may be placed in possession of all the facts of an event which, though apparently small in itself, may lead to important consequences. But for want of time to make a copy in season to go by this mail, I shall send this open, under cover to General Dix, for his perusal.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. H. HEAP.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, May 29, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the vexatious question of finance, of which communication was given in my dispatch No. 19, of the 29th April, and which threatened to lead to French occupation, has come to a settlement.

The English consul has received a telegram from Lord Stanley, dated 26th instant, informing him that, as the Marquis de Moustier had given full and satisfactory assurances, there was no longer any need for his, Mr. Wood's, opposition.

Nothing, therefore, will be done in the matter of the commission without the common consent of the governments of England, Italy, Prussia, and France. This is what was originally demanded. * * *

There remains the reparation for the breach of promise, which, it is understood, will be made by the minister, who will call on the French consul and present him the project, which was the origin of the quarrel, duly ratified and signed by the Bey, but which is to remain in abeyance and be superseded by the one hereafter to be agreed upon by the friendly governments in Paris. During the minister's visit a salute of twenty-one guns will be fired from the forts, when the flag will be displayed from the consulate.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

G. H. HEAP.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, July 17, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the project of a police regulation for the European quarter of Tunis has been discussed and agreed upon by common accord with my colleagues, and should my own and the other governments represented here give the necessary authority, its promulgation can be demanded of the local government, and we shall ourselves see to its execution.

There exists at present no police for the European quarter. On the one hand, the indifference of the government and its inability to pay its agents, who are frequently seen asking alms in the streets, and on the other, the existence of a multiplicity of consular jurisdictions, which create difficulties of every kind and render the discovery of crimes and the apprehension of delinquents extremely perplexing, sufficiently explain its absence and the disorder and uncleanness of the city, which are the natural results.

Our sole object is to bring some remedy to this state of things. Already, on the demand of the consular sanitary council, a committee of public salubrity, composed of members elected by the different nationalities and presided by a consul, has been constituted, and every one is able to appreciate the services it has rendered. But to meet the expenses it is obliged to incur, a small tax must be imposed on the foreign residents. Although a number have given a ready assent to these measures, there are others who have offered an opposition, which cannot be overcome except by direct authority from our governments. It has been objected, with some reason, that a duty of seven per cent. is collected on wines and spirits, and that the income thus derived was originally designed for the repair and maintenance of the streets; that it now goes into the public treasury, and that before imposing a new tax the government should be held to restore this one to its legitimate object. We can of course make representations to the Bey on the subject, but it is not difficult to foresee that they will result in nothing. Moreover, the case is too urgent to admit of delay. An epidemic is prevailing in Tunis, caused principally by the poverty and uncleanness of the Arab population; and although we are unable to relieve their misery, we can at least maintain the cleanliness of the quarter in which are our dwellings and those of our fellow-countrymen.

Nor are we alone interested in this matter. Tunis is in frequent communication with Algeria, Malta, Marseilles, and the principal ports of Italy. The diseases which develop themselves here are liable to spread over the whole Mediterranean coast.

An identical letter has been addressed by my colleagues to their respective governments.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. H. HEAP.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, November 26, 1868.

SIR: The long illness of the Bey's prime minister has occasioned a stagnation in affairs for several months past, no business except of very minor importance being transacted by the Bey when this minister is unable to attend.

The Bey himself rarely receives a consul in the absence of the khashanadar, and it is sufficient to excite the latter's serious displeasure for a native to speak to his Highness on business unless in his presence.

I had an interview with the Bey, to inform him of the result of the presidential election, which he had expressed much interest to learn. I received the news in eighteen hours from the time of the closing of the polls, and when it was confirmed by a subsequent telegram, I waited on his Highness, who accorded me an interview notwithstanding that his minister was too ill to assist at it.

The crops, which promised to be so abundant this year, have fully come up to the estimate. That of olive oil in particular is very large, and we have every reason to hope for an equally abundant one next season. The misery so prevalent lately has greatly diminished, and I think there is no fear of repetition of the widespread suffering of last winter. The late great mortality from famine and disease is now sensibly felt in the scarcity of hands for agricultural purposes. The health of the country is quite good at present.

We are visited by the German traveler, Gerhard Rohlfs, who has been appointed Prussian consul at Jerusalem, and is now on a mission to the Sultan of Bornou, to whom he is conveying rich presents from the King of Prussia. He will penetrate the interior of Africa from Tripoli.

The financial commission so often spoken of, and the discussion in regard to which was so near producing a rupture between France and this regency, is now, it seems, on the eve of being organized with the joint concurrence of France, England, and Italy. I fear it will only result in fresh complications, which, without benefiting the foreign creditors of the Bey, will overwhelm them in still greater difficulties. On the other hand, nothing can be more wretched than the present financial system, if system it can be called, which consists in extorting the last piaster from the unfortunate creditor and leaving the government creditor to clamor for his pay. Under an honest and enlightened administration, the public debt, large as it apparently is for so small a country, ($30,000,000,) would soon be paid off. This country abounds in natural wealth: the soil is of unsurpassed richness; there are fine fisheries on the coast, and the mountains abound in excellent timber, and, it is reported, in mines; but the government guards them with a jealousy which can only be explained from its fear of exciting the cupidity of foreigners. There is much natural facility for irrigating the rich plains which once sent their superabundant yield to Italy; and where the Romans held dominion in this part of Africa, they spread a network of aqueducts over the country the colossal remains of which explain how it came to pass that Tunis, once styled the granary of Rome, has, since the destruction of these great works, been dependent on other nations for bread.

An American with large capital is about introducing agricultural steam machinery on the banks of the Mejerda, anciently the Bagrada, where he, in association with a Frenchman, has obtained a large concession of lands from the Bey. Although it is easy to foresee that their enterprise will, for causes too numerous to mention, end in loss, it will not be altogether fruitless, as it will give these people a lesson in improved methods of cultivation. Their own is as rude as it was in the days of the patriarchs.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. H. HEAP.

No. 50.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, February 9, 1868.

SIR: The intervention of this legation has been asked in a case reported to me as follows:

One Anna Maria Suter, a native of Oberentfelden, canton of Aargau, Switzerland, emigrated to the United States and married in Philadelphia on the 2d of January, 1855, an American citizen named John Hürlimann, a tailor of that city. She bore issue one son, born on the 15th of March, 1857, who was baptized John. The mother, Anna Maria, died on the 29th of March, 1861.

Subsequently the father of the said Anna Maria died in the canton of Aargau, leaving a fortune, of which the portion falling to the said Anna Maria as one of the heirs, if living, or to her legitimate issue if deceased, amounted to 2,344.77 francs, which is now in the hands of the communal authorities of Oberentfelden.

In order to collect this money for the son and heir of Anna Maria Hürlimann, the father, John Hürlimann, was duly appointed by the proper authorities of Philadelphia the guardian of his child, and as such he executed a power of attorney, running by substitution in favor of one Strähl, an attorney of the canton of Aargau.

All the necessary certificates and papers, that is, of marriage, birth, death, and guardianship, with power of attorney, are produced, and are in nowise disputed.

The attorney, Strähl, demanded the payment of the money; the communal authorities refused such payment, on the ground that the marriage of the said Anna Maria not having been duly promulgated within the canton as prescribed by law, the marriage could not be acknowledged by them as valid, and consequently the claims of the boy John must be rejected in consequence of his disputed legitimacy.

The attorney then appealed to the cantonal authorities to recognize the marriage and to direct the payment of the money as demanded. This was refused on the ground that the laws of the canton require the prior publication of the bans of marriage within the canton and the prior assent of the authorities thereto in order to a legal marriage of any of its citizens, neither of which prerequisites had been observed by the girl Anna Maria. The prayer of the petitioner on both points was rejected, and as the co-heirs disputed the claims of the boy John, the ultimate disposition of the inheritance was referred to the courts for decision. It was at this stage of the proceedings that the appeal was made to this legation with a view of obtaining a reversal of the decision of the cantonal authorities in relation to the marriage, the attorney alleging the probable inutility of legal proceedings under the circumstances, and pleading the inability of the parties to give the necessary security. Inasmuch as the 6th article of our treaty provides that "any controversy arising between the claimants to the same succession shall be decided according to the laws and by the judges of the country in which the property is situated," I determined to await the action of the court, and in the mean time submit the question for instructions. I transmitted to the attorney a certificate that the marriage was a legal marriage according to the laws of the United States, and that the issue thereof was a legitimate issue, and the boy John as fully a citizen of the United States as if the mother had been a native thereof; and at the same time protested against the attempt of the authorities of Aargau to invalidate the marriage of an American citizen so solemnized, and against their assumed right to declare the issue of such a marriage an illegitimate issue.

It must be affirmed that the laws of the canton of Aargau in relation to marriage explicitly declare the prior publication of the bans within the canton, and the previous assent of the authorities thereof, to be necessary to a recognized legal marriage of any of its citizens.

The questions that presented themselves to my mind are—

1. Notwithstanding the letter of the law makes use of the word "citizen" without distinction of sex, is it not the presumption of law that the word "citizen" so used means male citizens?

2. Does not the language of the fifth article of our treaty so qualify or determine the signification of the word "citizen" as to render the laws of domicile in question inapplicable to the case herein presented? that is to say, is not the boy John, notwithstanding the laches on the part of the mother, a citizen of the United States within the meaning of the treaty, entitled as such, under article fifth, to "succeed to the said property, or inherit it," and "to take possession thereof," in the absence of other legal objections, "either by himself, or by another party for him?"

The laws in relation to the marriage are, of course, enacted to give effect, within the canton, to a well-defined and recognized public policy. The great object and aim of that policy appears to be the interdiction to the spread of pauperism, which undoubtedly is the great bane of Switzerland. It bears most heavily upon property, demanding in many of the cantons a serious percentage of incomes, and the Swiss may with just pride point to their many and well-regulated public and private institutions, organized for the relief or the amelioration of the sufferings of the native poor. Their support, however, imposes such heavy and serious burdens upon property as to demand the exercise of all proper precautions to prevent their increase.

The laws, by prescribing the prior publication of the bans within the canton and the previous assent of the authorities, answers, in part, this great demand, by placing it within the power of the authorities to prevent, in some measure, the increase of a population liable, on the death or disability of those upon whom they naturally depend for support, to be thrown as paupers upon the community at large.

Each canton not only imposes upon itself a dutiful care of its resident native poor, but recognizes the right in all other cantons to remit to the canton of origin such of their residents of foreign birth as have become, or are immediately liable to become, public burdens; and this principle is recognized by the third article of our treaty, which stipulates that each country shall at all times receive such of its citizens as may be returned to it by the other, in compliance with the laws regulating morals and mendicity. Stringent laws are justifiable, if not necessary, to prevent imposition.

A citizen of the canton Aargau in taking to himself a wife of foreign origin proposes to invest her and her children with his own nationality, and with all the rights and privileges appertaining thereto, which comprise, among others, the not unimportant one of a future contingent support by the canton; and the authorities may therefore justly claim the right to prescribe the terms upon which such rights and privileges shall be conceded, and to declare that the laws of domicile in relation to marriage shall follow and adhere to all its citizens during any temporary sojourn abroad.

On the other hand, a female native of the canton of Aargau, intermarrying with a foreigner, divests herself of her nationality, and at the same time, at once and forever, extinguishes all her cantonal rights and privileges inherent by virtue of her nativity, and removes from her cantonal authorities all present and future cantonal liabilities on account of herself and of her children. As an Aargovienne she ceases from that moment to exist, and the laws of domicile, so far as they relate to a participation in cantonal or communal property or privileges, cease to operate a corollary that the authorities would have been prompt to recognize and assert had the boy John, instead of appearing as a claimant to property, been remitted, under article three of the treaty, as a pauper to the cantonal authorities for support.

Practically, under the laws, there is little difficulty, even for the poor, (none with the well-to-do,) in obtaining a license to marry, when both parties are natives of the same commune, inasmuch as a legitimate family imposes no greater contingent liabilities upon the state than the not unlikely equally large illegitimate family that would follow refusal. Nor is there difficulty in regard to a license for a female desiring to intermarry with a citizen of a foreign canton, as thereby her cantonal authorities would be relieved of all contingent liabilities for the support of herself, as well as of her children; and the poorer the applicant the more prompt the compliance.

Reverse the question, and the eventualities are carefully scrutinized before a license is granted, the laws of propriety or of morality having little or no weight when the great question of pauperism is involved.

The Swiss federal constitution confers upon each canton the right to expel, or to remit to the canton of origin, any foreign residents who may fall to the public charge in consequence of poverty. It may, therefore, be incumbent upon the authorities, when notified of an intended marriage of a female native of the canton with a foreigner, to insure a compliance on the part of such foreigner with the laws of his domicile. Otherwise the marriage may subsequently be declared invalid, and the wife, with her nationality thus declared unchanged, may be remitted, burdened it may be with children, to her canton of origin for support. This only known argument in support of the laws of domicile attaching to females marrying abroad falls to the ground when the foreign laws under which the marriage may have been solemnized recognizes the marriage as legal and binding, and proclaims the nationality of the wife to have been merged in that of her husband.

It appears that the purposes and intent of the public policy in relation to marriage, as well as of the laws, are fully met by the admission that the laws of domicile in relation to marriage follow and adhere to all male citizens, so long as their allegiance remains unbroken; and that any other construction, the more especially if such other construction is made to vary to suit selfish and varying circumstances, offends all laws of justice and morality.

It is not improbable that these remarks may be considered, if not foreign, at least as irrelevant or unnecessary to the consideration of the question upon which I ask the instructions of the Secretary.

John Hürlimann, a citizen of the United States, having married one

Anna Maria Suter, a native of the canton of Aargau, within, under, and according to the laws of the State of which he was at the time a resident and a citizen, is their child John, the issue of such marriage, a citizen of the United States within the meaning of article five of our treaty with Switzerland, and entitled thereunder, notwithstanding the alleged laches of the mother, to inherit, as her heir, the property to which otherwise he has acknowledged title? If yes, and the intervention of this legation is directed, shall such intervention precede or follow legal proceedings before the court to which the "ulterior disposition of the inheritance" has been remitted?

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
GEO. HARRINGTON.

No. 30.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 21, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 9th of February, No. 50, has been received. In that communication you set forth the following facts, namely: that Anna Maria Suter, a native of the canton of Aargau, in Switzerland, emigrated to the United States, and was married at Philadelphia on the 2d of January, 1855, to John Hürlimann, a citizen of the United States, residing in that city; that she bore a son on the 15th of March, 1857, who was baptized John, and that she died on the 29th of March, 1861; that afterwards the father of the said Anna Maria Suter died in the canton of Aargau, leaving a fortune, a portion of which would have fallen to the said Anna Maria, as one of the heirs of the father, if she were living, or to her legitimate issue if she were dead; that proceedings at law have been instituted in Switzerland by John Hürlimann, the father of the aforementioned child, John, son of the said Anna Maria, to recover the portion of the estate beforementioned; and that the legitimacy of the child is denied under law of the canton of Aargau, upon the ground that the marriage in the United States was celebrated without a compliance with the preliminaries prescribed by the laws of the canton. The attorney for the child requests your intervention, and you solicit instructions on the subject.

You give no facts from which we can determine whether the mother's domicile, immediately before her marriage, remained in Switzerland or had been established in this country; of course her marriage fixed that domicile here.

That fact, however, may not have had any retroactive bearing upon the mother's antecedent domicile. The law of Congress which declares that women of foreign birth who marry citizens of the United States thereby themselves become citizens, was not enacted until February 10, 1855, a month after the marriage.

Our law treats as valid a marriage which is valid by the law of the place where it was solemnized.

The law of Switzerland, and in general those of continental Europe, while admitting that the law of the place controls as to the form of marriage, nevertheless holds that in respect to the capacity of the person to contract marriage the law of the domicile travels with him, and invalidates the union wherever contracted, if it be against the law of his domicile.

It may, however, I think, be successfully maintained that, even under the European jurisdiction in relation to the capacity of the person to contract marriage, the bona fide establishment of a new domicile with the intention of a permanent residence therein, relieves the emigrant from the bonds of his native law.

Under any circumstances, this, in the first instance, would be a question for the Swiss courts; but under the special provision of our treaty with Switzerland, it is a question for those courts finally. The 6th article, 11th United States Statutes at Large, declares that any controversy that may arise among the claimants of the same succession as to whom the property shall belong shall be decided according to the laws, and by the judges of the country in which the property is situated. I think it to be a just construction of this section that it takes the question altogether out of the domain of diplomacy.

It is proper, however, to express the opinion here, that whether the child now in question shall be held by the courts of Switzerland to be legitimate or illegitimate, he is nevertheless a citizen of the United States.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Berne, July 22, 1868.

SIR: Under date of 9th February last (my No. 50) I had the honor to submit in detail for your consideration the case of John Hürlimann, of Philadelphia, a minor claimant to certain moneys then in the hands of the authorities of Oberentfelden, canton of Aargau, as the property of his mother, deceased, the delivery of which had been refused on the ground that prior to her marriage the mother had not fulfilled the prerequisites of her cantonal laws, and therefore the marriage could not be recognized as legal, and as a consequence the claims of the boy, John, were barred by reason of his illegitimacy. The intervention of this legation was asked and the case was submitted for instructions.

Your No. 30, bearing date the 21st March, in reply, confirmed my decision as taken with the attorney for the claimant, viz: that under the 6th article of the treaty the question must be decided by the courts to which it had been referred. At the same time it appeared to me, that the general tenor of your dispatch left it discretionary with me to present the subject to the government if such course should be deemed by me advisable, and hence in my No. 58 I remarked that it was not impossible that the subject might give rise to further correspondence.

Subsequently the attorney again addressed me and implored the action of this legation as the last and only hope for success. Upon reflection and after examining the question with some care, I determined to address the federal council, if not with the confident expectation of success in this particular case, at least with the hope of presenting it in such a manner as would enable me to touch with some effect indirectly upon the question of emigration.

I have now the honor to inclose a copy of my communication to the High Federal Council, as also of their decision, which, it gives me a pleasure to say, sustains the grounds assumed by me, that this case is covered by the treaty, and that as an American citizen, in the absence of other legal objections, the boy, John, being the legitimate child and heir of Anna Maria Hürlimann, née Suter, is entitled to recover the money at issue.

This decision settles certain principles that will hereafter have an important favorable bearing upon many of the numerous questions constantly arising between natives of the canton of Aargau—who become naturalized citizens of the United States—and the communal or cantonal authorities thereof, and, so far as I can learn, reverses the practice obtaining, until the present, in like cases.

I hope my action may be approved.

With greatest respect, your obedient servant,

GEO. HARRINGTON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Harrington to the High Federal Council.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, June 6, 1868.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States, begs to submit for the consideration of the high federal council a question now pending in the canton of Aargau, which has arisen under the following circumstances :

One Anna Maria Suter, a native of Oberentfelden, canton of Aargau, emigrated to the United States and married in Philadelphia, on the 2d of January, 1855, an American citizen named John Hürlimann. She bore issue one son, born on the 15th of March, 1857, who was baptized John. The mother, Anna Maria, died on the 29th of March, 1861.

Subsequently the parents of the said Anna Maria died in the canton of Aargau, leaving a fortune, of which the portion falling to the said Anna Maria as one of the heirs, if living, or to her heirs, if deceased, amounted to 2,344 77 francs, which is now in the hands of the communal authorities of Oberentfelden.

In order to collect this money for the son and heir of Anna Maria Hürlimann, the father, John Hürlimann, was duly appointed by the proper authorities of Philadelphia the guardian of his child, and as such he executed a power of attorney running by the substitution in favor of one Strähl, an attorney of the canton of Aargau.

All the necessary certificates and papers, that is, of marriage, birth, death, and guardianship, with power of attorney, are produced, and are in no way disputed.

The attorney Strähl demanded the payment of the money. The communal authorities refused such payment on the ground that the marriage of the said Anna Maria not having been duly promulgated within the canton as prescribed by law, could not be acknowledged by them as valid, and consequently the claims of the boy John must be rejected in consequence of his disputed legitimacy.

The attorney then appealed to the cantonal authorities to recognize the marriage and to direct the payment of the money as demanded. This was refused on the ground that the laws of the canton require the prior publication of the bans of marriage within the canton, and the prior assent of the authorities thereto, in order to a legal marriage of any of its citizens, neither of which prerequisites had been observed by the girl Anna Maria.

While thus declaring their adherence to the view taken by the communal authorities, the question of the legal status of the boy John was referred by them to the courts for final decision.

The judgment of the court, so long as the cantonal authorities maintain their decision of not recognizing the legality of the marriage of the girl Anna Maria, cannot be doubtful. It will necessarily be adverse to the claimant. The illiberality, not to say injustice, of the Aargovian law which denies righteous claims to its citizens settled for many years in America, and married there according to the laws of the United States, has been pointed out by the supreme court of that canton. (Reports 1851, p. 10.) The undersigned begs leave to submit briefly some of the considerations that induce him to hope that the authorities of the canton of Aargau may reconsider their decision through the intervention of the high federal council, which he has now the honor to request.

It is just and proper that the authorities of the canton of Aargau should prescribe the conditions upon which the citizens thereof shall be permitted to introduce foreigners into the canton, and invest them with the full rights and privileges of native citizens. Thus an Aargovien marrying out of the canton, proposes to invest his wife and her children, if any there shall be, with all the cantonal and communal rights and privileges which he himself enjoys, and if, by any unforeseen circumstances, they unfortunately are reduced to a state of poverty, such wife and children, if the forms of law in regard to marriage have been fully complied with, would have, of right, certain claims upon the canton. Without, therefore, some checks being thrown around the introduction of new citizens into the canton, it is by no means impossible that the pauper burdens might be onerously, if not alarmingly, increased. These considerations, it is believed, enter into, and in part prompt the policy of those laws.

When, however, an Aargovienne marries a citizen of the United States, according to the laws governing the domicile of her husband, the considerations above recited are inapplicable and fall to the ground.

By the act of marriage she becomes clothed with the nationality of her husband and at once assumes her place as a citizen of the United States; while, at the same time, she forfeits and annuls all the cantonal and communal rights and privileges otherwise of right attaching to her by virtue of her nativity. This view has not only been recognized, but more than once put into practice in the cantons of Switzerland, and, doubtless, will not be disputed; and further, if an Aargovien woman duly married to an American citizen, but without having fulfilled the prerequisites of her cantonal laws, should with her children be remitted to the care of her native canton under the third article of the treaty, upon the ground that the laws and authorities of her canton did not recognize the marriage as legal, it cannot be doubted that the decision of the cantonal authorities would be that the woman and her children were American citizens, and consequently had no claims upon the canton for support; and such decision, per se, in the opinion of the undersigned, would be clearly just and defensible.

The question therefore presents itself, is it not the presumption of law that the word citizen as used in the law means male citizen? Does not that construction meet fully the policy and intent of the law? Will not any other construction militate against justice and morality?

The authorities of the canton of Aargau encourage in every possible manner the emigration of its citizens, even to the point of supplying the funds, when necessary, to such as may be induced or have the desire to leave the canton, but not the means of so doing. Once landed in the United States, it is the wish of those cantonal authorities that the emigrants should remain there, and forever relieve them, the authorities, from all contingent liability for their future support; for it is not to be supposed that money is furnished for a pleasure trip to the United States, be it of longer or shorter duration, or that it is given for any other purpose than that herein stated.

Such relief can only be obtained by their emigrants becoming citizens of the United States. They are therefore encouraged to become such citizens with the sole view of relieving the canton from all further claims therefrom.

The cantonal authorities, of course, cannot, nor is it their wish to, prescribe the terms upon or the forms under which their emigrants shall become citizens of the country wherein, at the wish of these cantonal or communal authorities, they have taken up their abode. Once made citizens of that country the authorities have a legal bar to any subsequent reclamations they may prefer against the canton; for no foreigner can obtain that privilege without having previously and in the most solemn manner forsworn and renounced, under oath, all foreign allegiance, and especially his citizenship of and allegiance to the country and place (by name) of his nativity; and therefore the simple presentation by an emigrant of an American passport, or of his certificate of naturalization as a citizen of the United States, is, in fact, though not in form, a renewal of renunciation of his original citizenship and allegiance, and may so be considered by the Swiss authorities.

If, therefore, the authorities hold the issue of any marriage of an Aargovienne, duly celebrated according to the laws of the United States, with an American citizen, notwithstanding the prior formalities prescribed by the cantonal laws had not been complied with, to be legal so far as to deprive her and her issue of all further claims upon her canton in consequence of their having become American citizens, is it just, when they present themselves as rightful claimants to property, that interested parties should be sustained in their attempts to appropriate to themselves that to which otherwise they have no shadow of title or right, upon the ground that certain cantonal prerequisites have not been fulfilled? May not the court well proclaim the illiberality of a law that is willing, at the instance of interested parties, to declare that a woman, duly and legally married according to the laws of the country of which she is a citizen, has been living a life of immorality and in opposition to the laws of God and man, and attach to her children the stigma of illegitimacy?

As before stated, and as is well known, the authorities encourage the emigration of its citizens with a view of their becoming citizens of the United States. Is not such encouragement an assent to their becoming such citizens under the provisions of the laws of the United States? Are they not expressly told as another inducement to emigration, that they may, by labor and good conduct, become well-to-do citizens of that country, and may not such encouragement be taken as an assent in advance to their naturalization by whatever forms to be obtained, one of which, for females, is by marriage with an American citizen? The undersigned is well aware that these general views address themselves to the cantonal rather than to the federal authorities.

The undersigned however believes, and would submit to the consideration of the high federal council, that the claims of the boy, John, are covered by the provisions of the treaty between the two countries.

Article five of that treaty declares that "the citizens of each one of the contracting parties shall have the power to dispose of their personal property within the jurisdiction of the other by sale, testament, donation, or in any other manner, and their heirs, whether by testament or by ab intestato, or their successors, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to the said property or inherit it, and may take possession thereof either by themselves or by others acting for them," &c.; and article six declares "any controversy that may arise among the claimants to the same succession as to whom the property shall belong, shall be decided according to the laws and by the judges of the country in which the property is situated."

Section five is express in the declaration that citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have certain powers, and that their "heirs, whether by testament or ab intestato or their successors, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to said property or inherit it," &c.

There can be no question as to the girl, Anna Maria, having, by the act of the marriage, become an American citizen; nor is there a question as to the claimant being an American citizen; nor is it disputed that the property in question is the rightful property of Anna Maria Hürlimann, née Suter, if living, or of her heirs if deceased. The question referred to the courts for decision, therefore, is as to the status of an American citizen, which the undersigned contends is a subject for the American and not for the Aargovien courts; and further, that while the order of succession may be fixed by the will of the testator and be governed by the laws of the country of the testator, the question of heirship can only be decided by the laws of the country to which the heir belongs, and therefore, under the treaty, the status of the boy John should be decided by the American and not by the Aargovien law.

No American court would deprive an Aargovienne wife and her children of the property of the husband and father, because of an Aargovien decision or law pronouncing the marriage illegal, or the children illegitimate, for want of Aargovien prerequisites of marriage.

But looking to the Aargovien civil law, the undersigned claims that thereunder the boy John is entitled to the property in question. It is not in this instance the rights of a husband to the property of his wife that is called in question, but the rights of his child. If the undersigned is rightly informed, the Aargovien law distinctly declares that the children of illegal marriage shall have all the rights of children of recognized marriages. If, therefore, a marriage duly celebrated in the United States be declared by the Aargovien law as illegal, and as a consequence the children illegitimate, the civil law itself, if the above postulate be correct, while it would deprive the husband of the deceased wife's property, gives to the children of such a marriage the same rights as to the children of a legitimate marriage. But the undersigned cannot admit the competency of the Aargovien courts to decide upon the status of an American citizen, and he contends that all that should be required by the Aargovien authorities to acknowledge the claims of the child, John Hürlimann, is the proofs of the legal marriage according to the American law, and this proof is full and complete, as well as the evidence that the boy John is an American citizen.

The undersigned ventures to express the confident hope, that after examination, the high federal council will concur with him that the status of the boy John is covered by the treaty and the legal documents transmitted herewith; and that as an American citizen, (as well as in pursuance of the civil law,) he is justly entitled under the treaty to succeed to the property in question, and to take possession thereof by the attorney duly appointed for that purpose.

In submitting this question the undersigned begs your excellency and the high federal council to receive the assurances of his highest consideration.

GEO. HARRINGTON.

His Excellency Dr. I. DUBS,
President of the Swiss Confederation, Berne.

Mr. Harrington to the High Federal Council.

BERNE, July 21, 1868.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's communication of the 14th instant, in which is announced the decision of the high federal council in the matter of John Hürlimann, which the undersigned had the honor to submit for their consideration under date of June 6, 1868.

The undersigned begs your excellency to convey to the high federal council his acknowledgment for their prompt and favorable action, and he begs to renew the assurances of his highest consideration.

GEO. HARRINGTON.

The Federal Council to Mr. Harrington.

BERNE, July 14, 1868.

On returning to the United States minister resident in the Swiss Confederation the package of documents accompanying his note of the 9th of June last, in relation to the claim of John Hürlimann, the federal council announces that it has considered the report of the authorities of the canton of Aargau, dated 29th ultimo, on this affair, and now informs said authorities that it concurs in their decision, that John Hürlimann, senior, was a citizen of the United States; that his marriage with Anna Maria Suter was in accordance with the laws of the United States, and that the male issue of that marriage is considered as the legitimate descendant of an American citizen; therefore no Swiss authority can decide the civil status of an American citizen, because the laws of the United States, and not those of the canton of Aargau, are to obtain in this matter.

The federal council also observes, that, by virtue of an international treaty still in force between Switzerland and the United States of America, an American citizen has the right, in case of successions, to be treated as a Swiss; and, therefore, John Hürlimann, junior, must be treated in the same manner as if he were the issue of a lawful marriage of Aargovien citizens.

From the above, the federal council judges the refusal of the communal council of Entfelden to be contrary to the treaty, and that it ought to be reversed, inasmuch as no civil suit for the succession is intended to be prosecuted.

The federal council has instructed the authorities of Aargau to make this known to the heirs, for their guidance, and to report the result of its intervention in the affair.

Reserving the privilege of further communications on the subject, the council repeats to Mr. George Harrington the assurance of its high consideration.

DUBS,

President of the Confederation for the Federal Council.

SCHIEFS,

Chancellor of the Confederation.

No. 62.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Berne, July 31, 1868.

*SIR: On Friday, the 8th of May, I was informed of the arrest and imprisonment of one Charles Berry, a native of Basle, but asserted to be a naturalized citizen of the United States, under circumstances which, if true as asserted, appeared to demand my prompt intervention. It was the attorney of Mrs. Berry, then at Stuttgart, that made application to me at the suggestion of United States consul Klauprecht, whose card he presented as an introduction.

Although he had with him no direct evidence of Mr. Berry's naturalization as a citizen of the United States, such papers, he said, being in the possession of Mr. Berry when arrested, he submitted to me two commissions as second and first lieutenant in the New York volunteers, running in the name of Mr. Berry, with other papers in support of his assertions sufficient to justify preliminary action.

I directed him, therefore, to proceed at once to Basle, and confer with Mr. Consul Wolff, to whom I gave instructions to investigate the case, and ascertain if Mr. Berry was a naturalized citizen of the United States, and to report to me at the earliest moment practicable.

The report of Mr. Wolff reached me on Monday morning, the 11th, accompanied by an intimation that it was the probable intention of the Basle authorities to consign Mr. Berry to prison at hard labor.

I immediately addressed the high federal council, submitted to them the alleged facts, and requested it upon investigation they were substantiated, the prompt release of Mr. Berry, with an intimation that some indemnity would be demanded.

The high federal council evidently at once took action in the premises. Mr. Berry was released on Wednesday, the 13th, at 3 p. m., and the report of the Basle authorities in relation thereto was transmitted by the federal council to this legation under date of the 15th.

The Basle authorities, it will be seen, ignored the features of the case as submitted by me, and their report appeared to be in other respects of so unsatisfactory and deceptive a character as to induce me to institute an investigation, the result of which I embodied in my rejoinder of this day's date.

These three communications, that is to say, my first dispatch to the federal council of the 11th May, their reply of the 15th, and my rejoinder of this date, embrace all the correspondence between this legation and the federal council in relation to this case, and with the report of Mr. Consul Wolff, and certain other papers, copies of all which are transmitted, will place you in possession of the full merits of the case.

I have learned unofficially from Mr. Wolff, and from other sources, that the parties to this arrest are in a state of alarm lest their proceedings should result in a claim for damages, of all other the most dreaded by the Swiss, and that the authorities of Basle, under the influence of doubt as to the effect of their acts and with a view of appeasing Mr. Berry, have promptly recognized him as an American citizen, have removed his trustee, and directed his fortune to be restored to him. In fact I have delayed my reply beyond the period required for my investigations, in order not to interrupt the favorable progress of the measures instituted by Mr. Berry for the recovery of his rights.

When Mr. Berry was induced to emigrate to the United States to enlist in its army, however repugnant the idea may be, there is little doubt that it was the hope and expectation of his trustee that he would there find a grave, and thus his fortune actually in hand, as well as the larger amount that will eventually come to him from his mother's estate, would thereby be saved to the other members of his family.

Mr. Berry disappointed his trustee. He not only lived, but lived down the slanders against him; he, however, seems to have committed in the mind of his trustee and family, an unpardonable offense by marrying, after placing himself under the protection of the United States, thus opening a door for the escape of his fortune even after his death.

It was unquestionably the purpose of his trustee to have had Mr. Berry consigned to a prison at hard labor, in the hope that the act would not have reached the ear of any effective friend; that his wife should be repudiated, and to attach to him permanently the disabilities of the criminal.

It will be observed that the high federal council formerly announced that the naturalization of a Swiss in any other country does not co ipso change his Swiss character. I have briefly alluded to this, disclaiming however, as will be seen, any intention at this time to discuss the question.

It is proper to observe that naturalization as a federal question is subordinate to cantonal legislation.

It is now, however, beginning to occupy public attention, and will doubtless be brought before the National Assembly at its session of December. In the mean time it is my purpose to make it the subject of a special dispatch as soon as I can obtain the necessary detailed information as to the respective cantonal laws bearing upon the subject.

With greatest respect, your obedient servant,

GEO. HARRINGTON.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Harrington to the High Federal Council.

BERNE, May 11, 1868.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States near the Swiss Confederation, begs leave to state to your excellency that it has been represented to him that one Charles Berry, born on the 23d of September, 1825, in Liestal, canton of Basle, some ten years since emigrated to America, served in the armies of the United States, and became a naturalized citizen of those States on the 27th December, 1865. Of all this the proofs are satisfactory.

In the year 1867 the said Berry returned to Europe with his wife, whom he married in the United States, and has since resided in Stuttgart, in Wurtemberg. In the month of April last past, he requested his trustee, Dr. Staehlin, of Basle, in charge of his property, to remit to him at Stuttgart his income to which he was entitled. In reply he was invited to come himself to Basle; Dr. Staehlin stating that he had some important business to talk over with him.

On the 24th of April he came to Basle, in accordance with said invitation, and repaired to the house of his trustee, whom he found absent. On the 25th he again called upon Dr. Staehlin, but instead of receiving his income was arrested and thrown into prison, where he is now, without, so far as the undersigned has been able to ascertain, having committed any breach of the peace, or any offense against the laws of the city of Basle, or of Switzerland.

Herewith will be found his certificate of birth, his certificate of naturalization, and his certificate of marriage.

The undersigned most respectfully prays the high federal council to cause the facts to be investigated at the earliest practicable moment, so that, if found to be herein correctly stated, Mr. Berry may be promptly released from confinement and a proper reparation made therefor by the authors thereof.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to your excellency and the high federal council the assurances of his high consideration.

GEO. HARRINGTON.

His Excellency Dr. J. DUBS,

President of the Swiss Confederation.

The High Federal Council to Mr. Harrington.

BERNE, May 15, 1868.

SIR: On returning to the minister resident of the United of America the papers that came with his note of the 11th instant, relating to Charles Berry, of Basle, not of Liestal, the federal council sends to Mr. Harrington the report made on the subject by the government of the city of Basle, contained in a letter of the 13th of this month, as follows:

“Charles Berry is a man who has already given his parents much trouble: in 1859 they caused him to be interdicted by the orphans' court, the proper tribunal, and a trustee appointed for him.

"On the proposal of this trustee, and Berry's parents, to put him in prison at hard labor, in conformity with the city laws of Basle, the city council ordered an inquiry of the case to be made on the 22d of April last, charged the chief of police to examine Berry and to make a report on the case.

"As Berry had a bad reputation, and was accused of bigamy, the chief of police did not hesitate to arrest him on his arrival at Basle. The report having been made to the council, it was decided not to commit Berry to the workhouse, whatever foundation the charges against him might have. After this, Berry was immediately set at liberty. At the time this was done, the authorities did not know that Berry was an American citizen. Be as it may, he is still a citizen of Basle, and cannot renounce it, because he is under guardianship. His tutor and parents sued him as a citizen of Basle, and not as an American citizen; and if he wishes to renounce his Basle citizenship, as it seems he does, he must do it legally, as was done last autumn, in a similar case."

To this report of the council of Basle, the federal council adds, that to prevent further disturbance Charles Berry must formally renounce his citizenship of the canton, by the laws of Basle, because the naturalization of a Swiss in another country cannot, ipso facto, annul his Swiss citizenship. But if Berry wishes to preserve his right as a citizen of Basle, he must submit to be treated like any other inhabitant of Basle.

The federal council embraces the occasion, &c., &c., &c.

MR. GEO. HARRINGTON, ſc., ſc., ſc.

Mr. Harrington to the High Federal Council.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, July 27, 1868.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's communication of the 15th of May, transmitting the report of the authorities of Basleville, relative to the recent arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Charles Berry, a naturalized citizen of the United States, to which the undersigned had the honor to invite the attention of the high federal council by his note of the 11th of May.

The undersigned regrets that he has been compelled thus to delay the acknowledgment of your excellency's communication, and the expression of his gratification at the prompt release of Mr. Berry, by the otherwise unsatisfactory character of the report of the authorities of Basle, which compelled him to seek elsewhere for an explanation of the imprisonment of Mr. Berry, and for the causes of his arrest. He could not credit the assertion that this American citizen had been arrested with the avowed intention of incarcerating him, for an indefinite period, in a states prison at hard labor (maison de travail forcé) upon the mere request of a single individual of Basle. He was unwilling to believe that an act of so grave a character would have been committed without some alleged criminal offense on the part of Mr. Berry, or the commission of some misdemeanor that rendered him amenable to justice.

To that report, therefore, the undersigned feels compelled respectfully to ask the further attention of the high federal council, and he begs leave, at the same time, to submit for their information what he feels assured is now unknown to them, the facts and circumstances preceding and attending this arrest, which, in view of the ulterior questions not unlikely to arise in connection therewith, he considers should be at this time fully and clearly set forth.

It should be first stated that at the date when the measures hereinafter recited were conceived by the trustee of Mr. Berry, and matured between him and the authorities of Basle, Mr. Berry had been absent from Basle and from Switzerland for nearly seven years.

It becomes an important preliminary, therefore, to examine as to the exact status of Mr. Berry prior to his departure from Switzerland.

The first paragraph of the report declares, that at some period of his life (not stated) Mr. Berry "caused a chagrin indicible to his family, and that in 1859, at their request, he was deprived of his civil rights, and his affairs placed in the hands of a trustee."

What the act was that chagrined his family is not stated, nor is that omission important. It is sufficient that it was neither a crime nor punishable offense, and that it had, and could have had no connection with his recent arrest. It does not even follow, though stated in connection therewith, that it was of a character to cause or to justify the withdrawal of his civil rights, which the undersigned learns elsewhere was a necessary preliminary to the placing of his affairs in the hands of a trustee—a measure prompted by a fear, engendered by alleged extravagant habits, of a careless dissipation of his fortune, which it was the purpose of his family to prevent.

The chagrin indicible appears from the report to have been the only charge preferred against Mr. Berry prior to the year 1861, and, so far as the undersigned can ascertain from other sources, Mr. Berry, previous to that date, was obnoxious to no other or graver charge than habits of extravagance, which, it is assumed, is not an indictable offense.

In 1861, upon the solicitation of his trustee, and of his family, and with the money provided by them for that purpose, Mr. Berry emigrated to the United States. In thus emigrating with the full knowledge of his friends and at the request of his trustee and family, it may be claimed that he was no fugitive from justice; were it otherwise, had he been convicted or even accused of crime, or had he, as insinuated, borne such a character as to have been considered a dangerous member of society, and for that reason had been induced to emigrate to the United States, the parties thereto would have been guilty of an act of which that government would have just cause of complaint.

As, therefore, at the date of his solicited expatriation, Mr. Berry rested under no imputation of any act for which, under the laws of Basle, he could be arrested upon his return to that city, should he determine so to return, the undersigned begs leave to present a brief review of his honorable career subsequent to his departure from Switzerland, which, happily, is afforded by the official documents in his possession.

Mr. Berry arrived in New York early in September, 1861, and, in further accordance with the expressed wishes of his family and of his trustee, he immediately enlisted as a private in the armies of the United States, and was at an early date thereafter raised to the grade of sergeant. Continuing to serve with intelligence and fidelity, he was further promoted to the rank of commissioned officer, and received the appointment of 2d lieutenant, and subsequently that of 1st lieutenant. After the close of the war, that is, in June, 1865, Mr. Berry was mustered out of the service, having earned an honorable reputation, and as a gallant soldier and officer received in common with his comrades in arms the thanks of the Congress of the United States.

Having thus volunteered in defense of a government most seriously threatened, and given his best services for the suppression of an unholy rebellion, Mr. Berry determined to become a citizen of that country to which he had been encouraged to emigrate, and whose institutions he had for nearly four years, at the constant risk of his life, successfully endeavored to maintain, and in pursuance of that determination caused himself, in 1865, to be naturalized as a citizen of the United States, an act only to have been obtained at that time upon positive and satisfactory proof of honorable service in and discharge from the armies of that country.

Having returned to private life, and at the age of forty years become invested with the rights and privileges of an American citizen, Mr. Berry married and came with his wife to Europe, and adopted as his temporary place of residence the city of Stuttgart, in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, where at the date of his arrest he was quietly residing and maintaining himself in a respectable manner as a professor of languages.

It seems reasonable to suppose that this honorable record of Mr. Berry, which the undersigned has reason to believe was perfectly well known to his trustee and to his family, would have been sufficient to have insured for him a kindly reception, should he, in obedience to the natural dictates of his feelings, revisit his former home. Of that visit, of the manner in which it was brought about, and of its results, the undersigned is now enabled to inform your excellency.

Mr. Berry, as before stated, was not and had not been for several years a resident of Basle, and it was known to his trustee that, having become an American citizen, it was not his intention again to take up his residence therein. He was, however, temporarily residing in a near city, and it was possible, as it was necessary for the accomplishment of his purposes, for his trustee to devise some plan whereby Mr. Berry should be induced to leave his family and his professional pursuits, and voluntarily place himself within the jurisdiction of the police of Basle, of whose support and co-operation his trustee appeared to have no doubt.

The plan devised and successfully carried into execution was as follows:

Dr. Staehelin, who during the entire period of Mr. Berry's absence from Switzerland had regularly remitted to him his income, determined to withhold arbitrarily a portion thereof, becoming due on the 30th March last, and consequently remitted to him but one hundred and fifty of the three hundred francs due on that day. Mr. Berry promptly acknowledged the receipt of one hundred and fifty francs, and at the same time demanded of his trustee the reason why the full amount due to him had not been remitted. The receipt and demand bore date the 2d of April, and was doubtless received by the trustee not later than the 4th of that month. On the 20th, evidently after his measures had been fully arranged with the authorities, they as declared in their report having given orders for the imprisonment of Berry on the 22d of April, Dr. Staehelin addressed a letter to Mr. Berry, of which the following is a copy in translation, (a copy in original being annexed:)

"BASLE, April 20, 1868.

"With yours of the 2d instant, I received the receipt for the one hundred and fifty francs sent to you March 30. You wonder why I did not send three hundred francs, and you wish to know the reasons; I find your wish gratified, but as it would be too long to give you the reasons in writing, I invite you to come here in the course of this week, say Friday or Saturday, so that I may give you the explanations verbally, and in case your money should not suffice for the fare, &c., I send you herewith fifty francs.

"Beside this your future affairs require a minute discussion. Your late sojourn here was too short to have explained all the points of the question.

"As I am very busy and sometimes not at my office, I beg you to give me notice of the day and hour of your arrival here.

"Respectfully

"DR. STAEHELIN."

Mr. Berry replied to this letter on the 23d, and on Friday the 24th, the day indicated he repaired unsuspectingly to Basle and called upon his trustee. Dr. Staehelin, though advised of "the day and hour" of his coming, was not then to be found. Mr. Berry left his name, and stated that he would call again at a given hour the next day.

On Saturday the 25th he repeated his visit, when, instead of receiving the hundred and fifty francs, so unjustly withheld, and the reasons therefor, Mr. Berry was suddenly arrested and thrown into prison.

This simple narrative of the facts and circumstances attending this arrest is submitted to your excellency under the full conviction that its mere perusal will be sufficient to convince the high federal council that a most flagrant and serious outrage has been committed upon an American citizen without the shadow of legal justification, and that the means resorted to to bring it about were of so dishonorable and reprehensible a character as to admit of no palliation.

The authorities of Basle declare that "when the measures in regard to Mr. Berry were adopted, they were not aware that he had become an American citizen." It is not improbable that the trustee of Mr. Berry may have withheld that information from the authorities; but it will not be claimed that they retained Mr. Berry in prison for the period of eighteen days in ignorance of so important a fact. In addition to the papers in his possession at the moment of his arrest, proving his nationality, Mr. Berry at once declared himself to be an American citizen, and forthwith addressed a communication to his immediate representative, the consul of the United States resident in Basle, in which he again asserted his nationality, and requested his counsel and advice.

This letter the director of the police presumed to retain, and but for a subsequent written demand therefor by Mr. Consul Wolff, he would evidently have entirely suppressed. By this further impropriety on the part of the police director, Mr. Consul Wolff was kept in ignorance of the arrest of his fellow-countryman, and Mr. Berry was deprived of all counsel and assistance until the undersigned, through the agency of Mrs. Berry's friends in Stuttgart, was informed of the arrest, and thereby enabled to bring the case to the kind attention of the high federal council.

The authorities of Basle in their report preferred no charge against Mr. Berry, and declared the sole cause of his arrest and imprisonment to have been "the request of his trustee and family." The undersigned, as before stated, hesitated to believe that so arbitrary and serious an act would have been committed without an alleged infraction of some law. He therefore instituted further inquiries with a view of solving his doubts in this respect, and learned that charges had been preferred against Mr. Berry, of which the following is a copy in translation:

1. For squandering his money.
2. For entering into an unlawful marriage.
3. With aversion to labor.
4. With unfitness for business.

And it was undoubtedly to these avowedly unsupported and in the opinion of the undersigned, with one exception, frivolous charges that the authorities of Basle referred in justification of their acts, when they declared that Mr. Berry, "being, among other things, accused of bigamy, and having generally borne a very bad character, the director of police hesitated the less to place him upon his return to Basle in a state of preventive arrest."

The undersigned prays your excellency to observe that, whatever the charges may have been upon which the authorities of Basle assumed to arrest and imprison this American citizen, it is not claimed that the acts upon which they were based were committed upon the territory or within the jurisdiction of Basle. They must have been committed, if committed at all, as an American citizen upon the territory and within the jurisdiction of the United States. Whether therefore the above recited charges, if true, involve a violation of any statute law of Basle, it is not the purpose of the undersigned to discuss. He will, however, remark that the history of Mr. Berry for the last seven years—a history perfectly familiar to his trustee, the author of these charges—gives a most complete refutation to the first, third, and fourth charges. In relation to the second, which in the report is made to assume the grave form of bigamy, Mr. Berry is the bearer of a certificate proving that he had been duly and lawfully married within and according to the laws of the United States; and as no one charges him with having twice married, the charge of criminality, in whatever form presented, finds itself devoided of all legal support; and the existence and character of this certificate was also known to the trustee of Mr. Berry when he prepared and submitted the second charge to the authorities of Basle.

The authorities of Basle concluded their report by declaring that “the acts (proceedings) of the police director, having been presented to the government of Basle, they were convinced that there was no reason, at least for the present, to place Mr. Berry in a prison at hard labor, (maison de travail forcé), however well founded may be the complaints against him; and they therefore decided that Mr. Berry should be forthwith liberated,” adding that “when the government of Basleville ordered the measures above indicated in regard to Mr. Berry, they were ignorant that he had become an American citizen, and that however that may be, he has not lost his citizenship of Basle and cannot renounce it while he is under trusteeship. It is against him as a Balois and not as an American that his trustee and family have complained, and if he would renounce his right of citizenship of Basle, as it appears he would do, he must do it in a legal manner.”

* * * * *

The allegation of those authorities that Mr. Berry cannot while under trusteeship renounce his right of citizenship, is apparently based upon the assumption that Mr. Berry cannot legally make any contract or perform any act affecting his personal rights and liberty without the assent and concurrence of his trustee, so long as such trusteeship exists.

When his trustee urged upon Mr. Berry to emigrate to the United States for the purpose of enlisting in their armies, he thereby relinquished, so far as they might otherwise have affected his transactions subsequent to his departure from Switzerland, all his rights of control over Mr. Berry, and when he authorized him to enter into contract with the government of the United States for an indefinite period, free from all restrictions and disabilities of trusteeship, he thereby acknowledged his competency to act for himself, and was thereafter estopped from all interference with his acts resulting from such emigration and enlistment. The record of Mr. Berry during his absence is full proof of his ability to take care of himself, and seems to have called in question the propriety of the original act by which he was deprived of his civil rights, inasmuch as the same authorities who at the “request of his family” placed over him a trustee, have, at his own request, removed that trustee and restored to him his fortune.

The undersigned assumes that it is known to your excellency and the high federal council, and doubtless to the authorities of Basle, that the government of the United States maintains as inherent in man the right to denationalize himself and to select at will the government under which he may desire thereafter to live. In furtherance of this principle their laws prescribe the forms and conditions under and by which foreign-born immigrants may become citizens, and invested with all the political rights and privileges, including therein the right of protection, that appertain to the native born, criminals and paupers as such being excepted; and the undersigned has for some time rested under the happy belief that this great principle was not only openly enunciated but practically enforced by the authorities of Basle, as shown in the recent case of Mr. Ostermann, whose extradition was successfully demanded of the authorities of France. If the undersigned has been rightly informed, the pleadings of the authorities of Basle in this case cover the precise grounds assumed by the United States in regard to their adopted citizens. Mr. Ostermann was a native of France, and had for a somewhat lengthened period inhabited Basle, during which time he caused himself to be naturalized as a citizen of Basleville, renouncing at the same time, as prescribed by their laws, his French allegiance; subsequently Mr. Ostermann failed in business and returned to his native country. His failure having been pronounced fraudulent, the authorities of Basle demanded his extradition under the provisions of treaty stipulations, upon the grounds of his being a citizen of Basle by virtue of his naturalization. This was successfully resisted in the lower court of France before which the case was brought, upon the plea that notwithstanding his naturalization in Basle, inasmuch as he had taken no steps in France to release himself from his French allegiance, his status as a French citizen had not been changed, and therefore as a Frenchman he was not subject to extradition as demanded by the Basle authorities. The higher court to which the case was appealed reversed the decision of the lower court, sustained the demand of the authorities of Basle, and remanded the accused to custody as subject to extradition.

Whatever may have been the final action of the French authorities, it would not have affected the sound principle set up by the Basle authorities, viz: That naturalization as a citizen of Basle, irrespective of any proceedings taken or not taken in his country of nativity, was sufficient to justify extradition in case of crime and flight, and as a necessary corollary protection from injustice and oppression from whatever quarter inflicted.

Such are the views, in brief, entertained by the government of the United States, and demanded by the people thereof to be firmly and undeviatingly maintained, a principle the justice of which is denied by few, while by most of the monarchical powers of Europe it has been or is about to be formally conceded.

It is therefore with infinite regret that the undersigned is obliged to conclude, from the report of the authorities of Basle, as well as from the declarations of the high federal council in their communication of the 15th May, that another antagonistic principle is enunciated from Switzerland, and those regrets he feels assured will be shared not only by his government but by the whole people of the United States, mingled with grave surprise that this truly republican principle finds no support in their sister and only republic of the Old World.

It is, however, not the intention of the undersigned at this time to discuss the question of naturalization, nor has it been his purpose in this communication to call in question the laws of Basle or to criticise their application to the citizens of that canton.

The case which demanded the intervention of this legation and has given rise to this correspondence involved the liberty of an American citizen, and the authorities of Basle attempt to justify their action in the premises. Their report was so faulty in its omissions of all reference to the main facts and circumstances of the case as to lead to an entire misapprehension of the questions involved. The undersigned deemed it his duty therefore to investigate the alleged causes of the arrest, and he believed it equally imperative upon him to lay before the high federal council the results of that investigation, which may be summed up as follows: An American citizen, guiltless of all criminal offenses, resident at the time and for several years previous beyond the limits of Switzerland, had been, by false pretences, inveigled into Basle for the purpose of being arrested with the avowed intention of incarcerating him for an indefinite period in a state prison at hard labor, (maison de travail forcé), without the pretense of his having violated any public law, without summons, without trial, and refused the advice and assistance not only of his immediate representative, but of all other counsel, upon the mere request of a citizen of Basle, and for purposes entirely unavowed but evidently and necessarily personal and private.

While the undersigned does not call in question the asserted right on the part of the authorities of Basle thus to apply their laws to their own citizens, he feels it incumbent upon him most respectfully but earnestly to protest against any such application to an American citizen, and also against the further assumption of those authorities as indicated in the case under consideration, of their right to arrest and punish for acts committed, if committed at all, within the jurisdiction and upon the territory of the United States.

In submitting the narrative of the arrest of Mr. Berry for the information of the high federal council, in order to a just appreciation of the measures instituted against him by the authorities of Basle, the undersigned felt it to be his duty to express his dissent from those measures as well as from the principles upon which they were based. He feels assured that the high federal council will neither support acts so unjust in themselves, nor countenance unprovoked measures enforced in a manner calculated to wound the just sensibilities of the government and people of the United States.

The undersigned begs your excellency and the high federal council to accept the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

GEO. HARRINGTON.

His Excellency Dr. I. DUBS,
President of the Swiss Confederation.

Mr. Harrington to Mr. Wolff.

UNITED STATES CONSUL, BASLE,
Berne, May 8, 1868.

SIR: The bearer of this comes to me in relation to a person who claims to be an American citizen now under arrest at Basle. He submits to me certain papers, viz., commissions as having served in the army, but has here no passport or other papers showing him to be an American citizen. These I am told the party in Basle has with him. I will thank you to see the person alleged to be under arrest, ascertain if he is an American, and if so, upon what charges he has been put in confinement. If your efforts fail to get him released, that is, if it is a case for interference, I will thank you to report all the facts to me, that I may take such steps as the case may seem to demand. The name of the man is Charles Berry. Ascertain his age and mental condition. I presume there will be no objection to the bearer going with you.

Very respectfully, &c.,

GEO. HARRINGTON.

Mr. Consul Wolff to Mr. Harrington.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE.

Basle, May 10, 1868.

SIR: Your favor of the 8th was delivered to me yesterday by Dr. Hamlin, a lawyer of Stuttgart, in reference to the imprisonment of Charles Berry. It is the first information I have received that he is in prison.

After a consultation with Dr. Hamlin, who returned last night to Stuttgart, I told him that I was ready to assist Berry in any way I could, and he left at my office all the papers in connection with this case.

I went immediately to work and obtained the following information, viz:

Charles Berry, born on the 23d of September, 1825, in Liestal, canton of Basle, and emigrated to the United States about ten years ago; and before he left this country a guardian was appointed over him, to take care of his property, on account of his extravagance and squandering away his money.

Charles Berry had served in the United States army, was made a second lieutenant in the forty-fifth New York volunteers, on the 22d of February, 1863, (herewith his commission marked B,) and first lieutenant on May 29, 1863, (herewith his commission marked C.)

On the 23d day of October, 1865, he was married with Bertha Ulmer, by Henry Toelke, a Protestant clergyman; the certificate of marriage is legalized by the Swiss consul in New York, also herewith inclosed and marked D.

Charles Berry was made a citizen of the United States in New York on the 27th of December, 1865; certificate of naturalization inclosed and marked E.

He came from New York in the end of last year, went to Stuttgart, Wurtemberg, and was residing there with his wife; made his living as a teacher, and gave French lessons, &c.; besides, he received annually the interests from his capital under the care of his guardian, Dr. Staehlin, of Basle City.

In the month of April he requested his guardian to send him the interest due to him, and in reply he was invited to come to Basle himself, as he had some important business to talk over with him. (The letter of this invitation I expect in a few days, and will be forwarded to you in due time.)

On the 24th of April, 1868, Charles Berry arrived at Basle, and found Dr. Staehlin not at home. (See letter to his wife, herewith inclosed, and marked F.)

On the 25th of April he went again to Dr. Staehlin with the intention to receive the interest of his capital, &c., but was arrested and placed in prison. (See letter to his wife, herewith inclosed, and marked G.)

He was requested to come to Basle to receive his interest, and instead of that he was placed in prison at the request of his guardian and relatives, who have also petitioned the cantonal authorities of Basle City to put him in a work and correction house, and at present is awaiting his examination.

The reason for this is given in squandering away his money, being lazy and idle, besides entered into an unlawful matrimony.

I have not the slightest doubt that the authorities will send him to the house of correction, except the high federal council interferes in his favor immediately.

Charles Berry has a property valued at about thirty-five thousand francs; his relatives have a great interest in this; if children should be issued out of this marriage, of course the relatives would receive nothing. The relatives and guardian do not recognize his marriage, and they try to have him separated from his wife.

The question in law will be this: Have the cantonal authorities the right to keep up the Swiss guardianship after a person has become an American citizen? That right as an American citizen ought to release him from his guardianship, and from any other obligation towards his mother country.

This is a question of great importance, and, if it will be settled in favor of the United States, hundreds, now citizens of the United States, will be entitled to receive their property detained from them and now managed by a guardian.

Last night I saw the chief magistrate and told him that a complaint has been made against the authorities for imprisoning Charles Berry, an American citizen. He said, will you protest against it? I answered him that the case was in the hands of our minister and I could not interfere, but I had good reason to believe that the high federal council would communicate to them and have the question arranged and settled.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. L. WOLFF,
United States Consul.

Hon. G. HARRINGTON,
United States Minister, Berne.

Mr. Wolff, United States consul at Basle, to Mr. Harrington.

BASLE, May 16, 1868.

SIR: In addition to my letter of the 10th, I inclose herewith a translation of my letter to the burgomaster, marked A A.

On the 12th of May I went in the prison to see Berry, and was received by the police director.

In speaking of the imprisonment of Berry, I told the director of the police that Berry must be a curious kind of a fellow to be for fifteen days in prison without giving me any notice; to which the director replied as follows: "After he was about three hours in prison he presented to me a letter for you, (Wolff,) but I thought best to keep that letter.

From the director's room I went in the prison, and had a long conversation with Berry.

As soon as I reached my office I made a complaint against the director of the police in a letter to the burgomaster, of which I herewith give you a translation, marked B B.

The burgomaster answered that he had remonstrated against the action of the director of the police.

On the 13th of May, in the afternoon, at 3 o'clock, Berry was released, and is now a free man; he was eighteen days in prison—had committed no crime.

On the 14th I have taken depositions, and on the evening Charles Berry left for Stuttgart.

The guardian and relatives will not make any opposition in paying over his property; how the guardian court will act has to be seen. The demand to give up his property will be made immediately.

Charles Berry demands for his imprisonment reparation; that I leave entirely in your hands.

In my report of May 10th I said that the letter of Dr. Staehlin, in which Berry was invited, could be forwarded to you in a few days. I inclose you herewith the original letter, and marked E E.

If you have an answer from the federal council, I would thank you to send me a copy.

Very respectfully,

A. L. WOLFF,
United States Consul.

HON. GEORGE HARRINGTON,
United States Minister, Berne.

Mr. Wolff to Charles F. Burkhardt, burgomaster of Basle City.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Basle, May 11, 1868.

SIR: Pursuant to the conversation relative to the imprisonment of Charles Berry, I have herewith the honor to present you, viz:

1. Certificate of naturalization of Charles Berry as an American citizen.
2. Renunciation of his citizenship as a Swiss.

In case you should desire other papers, I can send for them to the American legation at Berne.

As Berry has committed no crime, I hope you will be induced to release him from prison.

With great respect,

A. L. WOLFF.

[Translation.]

Mr. Wolff to Charles F. Burkhardt, burgomaster of Basle City.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Basle, May 12, 1868.

SIR: In regard to the imprisonment of Charles Berry, I made the remark in my yesterday's visit that I could not understand why Berry did not give me any information of his imprisonment.

To-day I paid him a visit, and before I saw him I was informed by the director of the police, Mr. Wirz, that Berry delivered to him, on the first day of his imprisonment, a letter for me, but he declined to allow the letter to be delivered to me.

I thought that even a criminal had the right to a legal adviser, and as Berry, to the best of my knowledge, has committed no crime, I find this action very remarkable, and doubt very much that this measure was recommended by the high authorities.

Berry was fifteen days in prison before I had any information of it, and this was given by a lawyer coming from Stuttgart.

As I was frank with you, without reserve, and informed you of every thing, I deem it also my duty to bring this fact to your knowledge.

With great respect,

A. L. WOLFF,
United States Consul.

Mr. Harrington to Mr. Klauprecht, United States consul at Stuttgart.

BERNE, May 20 1868.

SIR: On Friday, the 8th instant, a gentleman presented himself at this legation bearing your card and stating that he came at your suggestion. He informed me that Mr. Berry, a native Swiss, but a naturalized citizen of the United States, who, with his wife, had been residing at Stuttgart for some time, was invited to Basle to receive in person certain moneys due him; that he went there and was immediately arrested and thrown into prison, and his wife desired the intervention of this legation in order to his release.

He submitted to me certain papers, among which were two commissions, one as second and one as first lieutenant in the New York volunteers, but there was no evidence that Berry had been naturalized as an American citizen. Those papers, he stated, were taken by Berry to Basle, which subsequently proved correct.

I directed this gentleman to go at once to Basle and gave him a note to our consul, Mr. Wolff, whom I requested to investigate the matter at once.

Upon Mr. Wolff's report, received the following Monday, the 11th, I addressed the high federal council, and by their communication, received this morning, I am informed that Mr. Berry was released on Wednesday, the 13th, and I learn that on the following day Mr. Berry returned to Stuttgart.

I inclose herewith a translation of the report of the authorities of Basle upon this subject, and request you to see Mr. Berry, show him this report, and ascertain—

1. If he is the bearer of an American passport, and if not, why not?
2. If Mr. Berry served in our armies in any capacity before being commissioned as a lieutenant in the New York volunteers?
3. How long he served altogether, in what regiments, under what commanders, and where?
4. Whether he was discharged honorably, and when, and if he has his discharge with him? If yes, send me an official copy under your seal.
5. Ascertain the date when he emigrated to the United States, if he went there clandestinely, and whether there were any charges pending against him at that time.
6. What was the sorrow that he caused his family and prompted the authorities to appoint a guardian or trustee for him, and caused him to be deprived of his civil rights?
7. Is he rightfully charged with bigamy? Has he been previously married, and if yes, is his first wife living? When, where, and to whom was he previously married?
8. During his absence from Switzerland was his income regularly remitted or paid to him in any manner whatever? If not, why not?
9. When, and where, and in what manner was he last paid such income, prior to his recent visit to Basle? When he last went to Basle, what was the nature of his interview?

Also endeavor to obtain so much of his history as will enlighten me as to the grounds of his being charged with bearing a bad character, with any other information that you may be able to command that may be of interest.

Very respectfully,

GEO. HARRINGTON.

Mr. Harrington to Mr. Wolff, United States consul, Basle.

BERNE, May 20, 1868.

SIR: I send you a copy of the reply of the federal council to my application for the release of Berry. You will see that the authorities of Basle speak of a "chagrin" that he once caused his family, declare that he is charged with bigamy, and that generally he bore a very bad character. These charges are general, not specific, except as to bigamy. Will you make such inquiries as will enable you to state when, and in what manner, he was charged with bigamy, and what act he committed that caused him to be placed under guardianship and deprived of his civil rights.

* Will you obtain the letter that Berry wrote to you after being imprisoned. If given to you, mark upon it the hour you received it. But I prefer that you write to the police director for it, so as to get a written answer.

Very respectfully,

GEO. HARRINGTON.

Mr. Consul Klauprecht to Mr. Harrington.

STUTTGART, May 26, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of May 20th. In conformity with your request I have seen Mr. Berry, professor of languages, (Olga street, No 51.) for the purpose of obtaining all facts connected with the questions you have been pleased to address me, and which I shall now answer in the order of their succession.

1. Berry is not in possession of an American passport; Mr. De Luze, Swiss consul at New York, having assured him that his certificate of naturalization, visaed by the Swiss consulate, would fully answer the purposes of a passport, he did not apply to Washington. This certificate of American citizenship was issued on the 27th of December, 1865, by the district court of the city and county of New York, signed by Nath. Jarvis, jr., clerk. The number of the consul's visa is 5569.

2. Berry enlisted in New York, and was appointed sergeant of the 45th regiment New York volunteers, (Colonel Ombberg,) on September 25th, 1861.

3. On June 30th, 1865, he was mustered out of service, having served as 2d and 1st lieutenant in the campaigns in Virginia and Tennessee, under Generals Howard, Sigel, and others.

4. Berry claims to have been honorably discharged, and said discharge paper to be in the hands of Chipman, Hosmer & Co., claim agents in Washington, in support of a claim for additional sergeant's pay.

5. He emigrated to the United States in August, 1861, and landed at New York on September 4th following. He did not leave his native home clandestinely, but with the consent of his family. No charges had been pending against him at that time.

6. Berry confesses to have formerly belonged to the genus called "fast young men," and, as a thoughtless spendthrift, to have committed many a foolish but no bad act. But he pretends to be fully reformed, and furthermore, that nothing but avarice from the side of his sisters and brothers-in-law, the desire to get possession of his paternal estate, were cause of that plot depriving him of his civil independence and appointing a guardian for him, "More sinned against than sinning."

7. He was never before charged with bigamy, and not previously married. The charge of bigamy was first brought forth against his wife by Mr. Staehlin, his trustee, in support of his endeavor to nullify his marriage. Mrs. Berry is a native of the county of Ludwigsburg; her family name is Ulmer. She was previously married in New York to one P. Brown, living at present at Norfolk, Va.

8. During his absence from Switzerland his income was regularly remitted and paid him in monthly rates by Henry Burgy, esq., Swiss banker in New York.

9. Said income was last paid at Stuttgart for the first quarter of this year. When last at Basle he received 250 francs by Mr. Staehlin. He went to Basle, Berry says, on the written request of his trustee. On his arrival he was imprisoned on the following charges: 1st, for aversion to labor; 2d, for unfitness for business; 3d, for want of military employment.

I learn that his conduct while here was blameless, and that his monthly income by his lessons amounted to eighty florins.

Being remote from the sphere of his former life, I can of course give only such details as I learn from Berry himself, and from his lawyer, Mr. Hamlin. A more reliable and extended statement concerning the antecedents of the party in question our consul at Basle might submit to you. The report of the authorities of Basle, which I showed him in pursuance of your request, Berry pronounces false in some particulars, as before said.

I have, sir, the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. KLAUPRECHT,
United States Consul.

Mr. Wolff to Mr. Harrington.

BASLE, May 29, 1868.

DEAR SIR: On May 22d, I asked the burgomaster for Berry's letter, kept by the police director and not delivered to me.

On the 23d, I received an answer that the letter in question was in the hands of the police director, and I was referred to him.

On May the 25th, I requested the police director for that letter.

To-day, at 4 o'clock, the letter of Berry was delivered to me; I inclose you herewith the original. By this letter you will see that he claims to be an American citizen, and refers to his naturalization papers.

Very respectfully, &c.,

A. L. WOLFF.

Mr. Berry to Mr. Wolff, United States consul, Basle.

BASLE, April 25, 1868.

HONORED SIR: I have to apply to you. My trustee, Dr. Staehlin, has had me arrested and put into prison to-day, intending to keep me here until the city council shall make a further decision.

Being a naturalized citizen of the United States, as you know already by papers exhibited to you, I should like very much to see you to discuss the matter over with you, and hope that you comply with my wishes.

Very respectfully, &c.,

CH. BERRY.

N. B.—Received from the police director on the 29th of May, 1868.

No. 64.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Berne, August 5, 1868.

SIR: On the 16th September last there was received at this légation a note signed by Mr. W. F. Nisbet, and certified to by several other parties, setting forth the particulars of an alleged difficulty that occurred on the route, "Tête Noire," from Martigny to Chamounix, on the morning of Tuesday, the 10th September, between the parties signing and certain guides therein named.

The circumstances seemed to be so clearly and logically stated as to impress me with their truthfulness, and the propriety of representing the case to the federal government. I therefore went informally to two members of the federal council and submitted the letter to them. They at once suggested to me to lay the matter officially before the council, that an investigation might be ordered.

At the same time I was aware that the guides were cantonal and not federal officers; that in the canton of the Valais they were an important class, whose friendship it behooved a large class of people, hotel-keepers, muleteers, &c., to cultivate, and that of all the cantons of Switzerland the authorities of the "Valais" gave most trouble to the federal government by their almost constant attitude of insubordination.

It was, therefore, more to bring to the attention of the government the conduct of the guides, with a view of preventing in the future similar outrages, than in the expectation of any extreme or really deserved punishment, that I submitted the case to the high federal council. Shortly after the receipt of his letter I had an interview with Mr. Nisbet. He was aware that his attempting to strike the guides greatly weakened his case, though he seemed to think the circumstances justified him in so doing.

Though the report of the prefect of Martigny is dated in December, its transmission to the federal council was delayed, and only reached this legation on the 19th of April.

The character of the authorities is shown by the investigation, which, when received, was subjected to criticism by me. This latter I delivered personally to the President, to whom I expressed my regrets in having to submit to my government a process evidently so ex parte and unjust. After reading a German translation, he requested me to await a line from him and the result of further inquiries to be instituted. That those outrages were of too frequent occurrence, and occasioned them (the federal council) much annoyance; and which, while they had every disposition to correct, it was not always in their power so to do.

Under date the 13th May, the President formally acknowledged the receipt of my communication of the 2d of that month, informing me that they had again called upon the authorities of the Valais in relation thereto.

The final reply, with the report of the council of state of the canton, bears date the 25th July, the receipt of which I acknowledged the 3d instant. Copies of all the papers will be found herewith.

Though otherwise unsatisfactory, I have reason to know that regulations have been established that will tend to prevent in future the repetition of like occurrences.

I have the honor to be, with greatest respect, your obedient servant,
GEO. HARRINGTON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Harrington to the High Federal Council.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, September 23, 1868.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States of America near the Swiss Confederation, has the honor to submit, for the consideration of the high federal council, a copy of a statement made to him by Mr. William F. Nisbet in behalf of himself and other American citizens, setting forth a series of gross outrages committed upon them on the 10th of the current month by certain guides named Jean Rouiller and Etienne Pierre, while passing from Martigny to Chamouny by the Tête Noire. It is with much regret that he feels himself thus called upon to approach the high federal council; but a sense of duty to those of his countrymen visiting Switzerland, who place themselves with entire confidence under the direction of persons duly appointed to guide and protect them as strangers in going from one point to another by difficult and otherwise dangerous passes, compels him to expose and present to your excellencies, and through you to the proper cantonal authorities, such acts of these agents as prove them to be not only unfaithful to their trust, but an unfaithfulness accompanied by violence to such a degree as to endanger the lives or limbs of travelers thus committed to their care.

Respectfully referring your excellencies to the inclosed copy of the communication of Mr. Nisbet for the details in extenso, the undersigned will only refer to some of the prominent incidents therein related, premising that Mr. Brooks, the principal sufferer, as well as Mr. Nisbet, are gentlemen of respectability and truthfulness, whose statements are entitled to full consideration.

It will be perceived that the party en route from Martigny to Chamouny consisted of Mr. Horace Brooks, an old gentleman, enfeebled by palsy, his wife and daughter, Mr. Nisbet, and an English gentleman named Fowler, for whose service five animals and two guides had been ordered. As they were about leaving Martigny, it was observed that there were three guides in attendance. Upon inquiry, it was found that two guides proposed to accompany the family of Mr. Brooks, who, however, declared that he had ordered and required but one, and directed the other to return. The guide refused, producing a paper or written order for three horses and two guides for the Brooks family, but by whom written none of the party appear to have known. Mr. Nisbet, the rest of the party meanwhile proceeding, took the paper and returned to the landlord of the Hotel Clerc, of whom the animals and guides had been ordered, who immediately changed the order from two guides to one, and with the paper so corrected Mr. Nisbet returned to join the party, encountering on the way the refractory guide in animated conversation with another, apparently his superior, who demanded the paper, which was given up by Mr. Nisbet. Shortly after Mr. Nisbet had rejoined the party, the guide Rouiller came up, and declared that all three of the animals ridden by Mr. Brooks's family should return to Martigny, unless the second guide was taken to Chamouny. Upon their replying that the party of three required but one guide, and the party of five but two, the guide angrily seized the bridle of the horse ridden by Mrs. Brooks, and attempted to turn him back towards Martigny. Mr. Nisbet defended Mrs. Brooks and came near having a personal encounter with the guide. Failing with the horse of Mrs. Brooks, the guide then seized the bridle of the horse of Mr. Brooks, and in his violent efforts to turn him back caused him to fall into a deep and dangerous hole, carrying Mr. Brooks with him. In consequence of the insufficient width of the hole not permitting the horse to fall to the bottom, he became suspended by his sides, the leg of Mr. Brooks being imprisoned and wedged between the side of the horse and the earth and stones against which he was lodged. Picks and shovels became necessary to rescue him, and ropes were required to be passed under the horse in order to remove him from the dangerous position into which he had been forced. The undersigned is happy to observe that apparently no serious or lasting injury resulted to Mr. Brooks, although the horse was so much injured as to prevent his continuing the journey. Notwithstanding these occurrences, the guide Rouiller still insisted upon the return of all of the three horses to Martigny, or the continuance of the second guide to Chamouny, coupling his demands with insults, in which the guide Etienne assisted. Rain commenced to fall, and midday had arrived, and there being no cessation of the outrageous conduct of these official guides, on the suggestion of an English pedestrian of the Alpine club, who had subsequently joined them, the party concluded to pay the full price of the guide to Chamouny in order to end the contest and be enabled to proceed. Upon receiving full pay, the end and object of all these outrages, the guide Jean returned to Martigny, taking with him the injured horse. In consequence of these rude assaults upon Mr. Brooks, his remaining strength became completely exhausted before the day was over, and he was obliged to remain the night in a wayside inn, the others arriving at Chamouny about 10 o'clock.

In thus submitting this statement to your excellencies, the undersigned begs permission to remark that this narrative presents no ordinary occurrences. He has had complaints made to him from time to time of alleged improper conduct on the part of guides and others, but, being well aware that the differences may have arisen from misunderstanding, caused by difference of language and habits, and from no intentional wrong, he has not felt himself justified in appealing to the high federal council. In the present instance the outrages appear to have been deliberately and persistently perpetrated, with a reckless and criminal disregard of life and limb, and all simply with a view to extort money which they had no right to demand.

It is well understood by travelers that these guides are officers or employés of the canton of Valais. Rules and regulations are prescribed by the cantonal authorities for the guidance and protection as well of the public, who are invited to employ them, as of the guides so employed. When respectable and peaceful travelers trust to the efficacy of such regulations, and to the good faith and honor of persons duly appointed to act as conductors, they have a right to protection. If, instead of protection, they are abused and maltreated, and their lives placed in jeopardy, it then becomes their duty promptly to report the offenders to their superiors; that the guilty may not only receive the punishment which is justly their due, but, by being dismissed from a service for which they have proved themselves unworthy, insure from others obedience to the regulations and proper treatment to the travelers thereafter placing themselves under their guidance.

It appears that the occurrences herein narrated were of a character to shock the sensibilities of several of the residents of the neighborhood, and to excite the indignation of the landlord of the Hotel Clerc," as is shown by his letter, (copy herewith,) urging that energetic steps should be taken to bring the offenders to justice. In assuming control of the travel over these passes by appointing or licensing guides, by prescribing rules and regulations for the information and guidance of travelers, and by forbidding the employment of all persons not so licensed, the cantonal authorities assume and guarantee the protection of the traveler from extortion and intentional harm. It is confidently assumed that unfaithful or incompetent men would not be intentionally employed; it is assumed with equal confidence that unfaithful or improper persons will not be continued in employment after their unfitness has been fully made known to those who, and who alone, have jurisdiction in the premises.

The undersigned respectfully submits the case for such action as the high federal council may think proper, and with a confident belief that the authorities of the canton of the Valais, on being informed of the facts, will promptly take measures to relieve that canton from the stigma which must necessarily attach to and distinguish it, if the authors of such acts as are herein narrated are allowed to go unwhipped of justice.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to your excellency and the high federal council the assurances of his highest consideration.

GEO. HARRINGTON.

His Excellency C. FORNERAD,
President of the Swiss Confederation.

Mr. Wm. F. Nisbet and others to Mr. Harrington.

GENEVA, September 14 1868.

DEAR SIR: The recent outrageous treatment of myself and some of my countrymen by certain guides of Martigny, in the canton of Valais, is the cause of my addressing to you these lines. I am impelled by several reasons, viz., in the hope that the guilty may be punished for the outrages I shall detail as having witnessed, that guides or other servants, finding that punishment may follow their evil doings, (if travelers choose to exert themselves to that end,) may be restrained by a wholesome fear; that the cantonal authorities, becoming aware that bad men are employed, will see to it that their districts shall not suffer in reputation by reason of their continuance, or by the future appointment of other than good and honest men. Particularly would I do this in the interest of future travelers, especially those from my own country. From a long experience in travel I am led to believe that they oftener submit and bow down to the outrages and indignities of guides and other servitors than travelers of any other nation. This may be the result partly from a mistaken spirit of generosity and good nature; partly from their failure or inability to comprehend the line between the traveler's rights and the servitor's legitimate latitude; partly from their having little or no acquaintance with the language, laws, customs, and topography of the country in which they may be traveling; partly from the fear of troubles, delay, and expense which an appeal to the authorities may cause them. Yet all this bears the proof of a profound indifference for the comfort and welfare of those travelers of their own or other lands who shall come after them. Every traveler owes his nite to the great society of travelers. In writing you these lines and asking your efforts in this case I am but acting upon my conviction of what every traveler owes to the concourse of travelers who annually pilgrimage to this charming land. Asking your kind forbearance for these first lines, I will now detail to you the facts in the case.

On Tuesday morning, September 10, a party of Americans, Mr. and Mrs. H. Brooks and daughter, a young English gentleman, Mr. Fowler, and myself, were at the Hotel Clere at Martigny, all bound for Chamouny via the Tête Noire. One of the ladies being unwell, they at first concluded to remain until her recovery. I therefore joined with Mr. Fowler and engaged two animals and one guide, which were soon before the door of the hotel. The others now concluded to go, and gave the landlord of the Clere a verbal order for three horses or animals, and a guide, which were brought in about half an hour. We then started in company. Before getting out of the town I noticed that three men accompanied the party, and on inquiry, discovered that two guides were going with the three animals last ordered by Mr. Brooks's family. Calling their attention to this, they said that they wanted but one guide, and Mr. B. so told them, and ordered one to return. He refused, and took from his pocket a paper, on which was written two guides and three horses. I suppose this is a sort of voucher by which he could claim payment on our arrival at Chamouny. Whether it was given him by the hotel proprietor or by the chief guide I do not know, but I presume the latter. As he refused to return as long as this paper called for two guides, I told him I would return and have it altered. This I did, the party proceeding. At my arrival at the hotel the landlord immediately altered the number to one guide. I then mounted, and at some little distance from the hotel overtook the refractory guide talking with a man (who I have since supposed the chief guide) who, from his gestures and speech, I supposed to be giving him orders. He (the guide) asked to see the paper, and refused to return it to me. I left it with him and passed on, overtaking the party about two miles up the road. In a few minutes this guide came up with us and demanded that all the animals ridden by Mr. B.'s family should go back to Martigny, or that he should be taken along to Chamouny. We told him that we did not know him at all; had ordered three horses and one guide, and that the party of three wanted but one guide, and the party of five wanted but two. This man now flew into a passion, seized the bridle of the horse which Mr. B. rode and attempted to turn the animal back. I struck at him twice from my horse with a bundle of canes, but did not hit him, as he sank down behind the horse.

He then seized a stone but did not fire, but seizing the bridle of the horse which Mr. B. rode, attempted to turn him, and in so doing backed the animal into a deep and dangerous hole, carrying Mr. B. down with him. The hole was so narrow that the horse was completely wedged in, his back level with the ground on either side, his hoofs not touching the bottom, but his weight suspended by his sides. Mr. B. was yet upon his back, his right leg tightly wedged in between the horse and the stones. It was some five minutes before he was taken off, and only after the stones had been dug away. Pickaxes and shovels had to be used, and it was twenty minutes before the horse was taken out by means of ropes passed under him. Mr. B. is an old gentleman, and it was an accident that his leg was not broken. It now rained hard. Yet after all this, the fact also that it was 12 o'clock and a long journey before us, this guide, Jean Rouiller, yet insisted on taking the three animals back. The other guide who had come with the three horses, Pierre Etienne, seemed to second Jean in his efforts, and shook his fist furiously at me because I refused to give back to Jean the papers which he had before seized from me. It was evident that Jean would insist on going along to Chamouny or on taking the three horses back. Just then came along an English pedestrian of the Alpine Club, who advised us to get rid of this Jean by paying him twelve francs, the full price of a guide from Martigny to Chamouny. He refused to let the horse go, and perhaps he was right, after the tumble he had had in the ditch. I gave up my horse to Mr. B. and jointly walked and rode with my English friend. During this scene some twenty natives gathered about, and it was evident that they looked upon the affair as a great outrage. Both of the guides are bad men; they show it upon every feature. My own guide was quiet and a good fellow, but from fear kept silent. Fear and interest I believe compel the better guides and the landlords of the hotels to acquiesce in the continuance of bad men as guides. Think of your guide mounting your horse while you are walking! This both of the guides did at a later hour of the day.

It seems neither age, nor sex, nor any consideration whatever can deter these villains from outrages. Here was an old gentleman, feeble in body, attacked with palsy two weeks before, showing when he mounted the animal at the hotel that he was weak. Here were two ladies, his only attendants; and yet these guides took no account of his condition. I am strongly inclined to the belief that they were emboldened by orders from their chief; and in confirmation of this belief, as well as for the purpose of further testimony, I inclose a letter received here by Mr. Brooks two days since, on his arrival, from the proprietor of the Hotel Clerc, at Chamouny. This letter has been written of his own free will, as neither myself nor any of the party have seen or had any communication with him, or any one at Martigny, since our departure from there. It is quite evident that the natives who witnessed the scene have made it the talk of the town. At first I felt inclined to hold the hotel keeper responsible, as it was through him and from him that we all received horses and guides, and it was he who, later, altered the voucher from two to one guide. But I can conceive his difficult position as one among several hotel keepers, with their rivalries and jealousies, wishing to be upon the right side of the guides, who can be of service by their patronage. The whole system of guides from Martigny to Chamouny seems to be entirely in the interest of the guides. A traveler is actually forced by them to a stoppage of one and a half hour at the half-way house on the Tête Noire. This we had to submit to, notwithstanding all our previous delay and the lateness of the hour. It was 10 o'clock at night when we arrived at Chamouny. Mr. B. became so weary that he was obliged to stop and remain at an inn on the wayside. At Chamouny, I am told, the guides receive three francs per person for every one they take to any hotel. This is paid by the proprietor, and is probably one cause of the toleration of such villains. Then they walk their animals the whole distance at a pace far slower than an ordinary pedestrian walks, and become ugly and sulky if one urges his horse faster, or insists upon their so doing. Furthermore, no French guide from Chamouny is allowed to pilot travelers over the mountain on their (the guide's) return, so that a traveler pays both ways, or, in other words, pays for two days for his guides and horses when he uses them but one, and this over a route where the back travel is equal to the forward travel. Yet as a traveler I do not, nor do I believe others, object to paying any reasonable tariff prices; but only to a forced imposition such as I have related. At Chamouny, before settling with the guides, I stated the facts to the proprietor of the Hotel Royal de l'Union, who advised me to appeal to the United States consul at Genève. Yesterday, in company with Mr. Brooks, I called upon him, and it is at his suggestion that I address myself to you as the highest and proper authority. If my deposition is needed I shall be glad to make it, but, as I shall most probably be in Berne in the course of a week or so, I will do myself the honor to call upon you, and if needful will then give you any further information in my power. In the mean time I place the matter in your hands, trusting that every effort will be made to bring this outrage to such an issue as shall be a warning to all the guides of Martigny, and a prevention of like outrages in the future.

I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. F. NISBET, &c., &c.

We, the undersigned, parties mentioned within, have heard this letter, and hereby confirm with our signatures all the facts and statements therein contained, and urgently trust success will attend any efforts to punish the offenders.

HORACE BROOKS, of New York.
MRS. E. BROOKS.
MINA BROOKS.
HENRY FOWLER.

HON. GEO. HARRINGTON,
Minister of the United States of America.

Mr. Clerc, proprietor of the hotel, to Mr. Brooks.

HOTEL CLERC, AT MARTIGNY, September 10, 1867.

SIR: I regret to hear that you had trouble with the guides this morning, after your departure from Martigny, and that they behaved very rudely to you. These are incidents that ought not to be passed over in silence; and to prevent their repetition I advise you, for the good of travelers, to make a serious complaint to your minister, and request him to present the case to the Swiss federal council, our supreme authority. A remonstrance of your minister will give much more importance to your complaint. Moreover, if you will make a complaint to me in writing, I will send it to the Valais authorities and have the guilty guide severely reprimanded.

I insist on your doing this, for, if what I hear is true, their conduct is scandalous. The chief guides ought to be responsible for the extortion on travelers by their subordinates. It was the chief who gave the order to the guide Jean Rouiller, on the way, to take back the mules or make you pay for them. He has superseded his authority in every way, and I advise you to be particularly hard on him in your complaint.

I will do all I can to assist you on this occasion, but the complaint must come from the traveler.

Accept, sir, my respectful consideration.

*I. CLERC.

The High Federal Council to Mr. Harrington.

BERNE, April 15, 1868.

The federal council is finally able to reply to the note which the minister resident of the United States of America near the Swiss Confederation has addressed it, dated September 23, 1867, in which he communicates the complaint of Mr. William F. Nisbet and other American citizens on the subject of the bad treatment which they had experienced from the guides Jean Rouiller, and Etienne Pierroz, on the route from Martigny to Chamouny, passing by the Tête Noire.

With an apology for the delay in communicating the result of the investigation commenced upon this complaint, the government of the canton of Valais transmits, under date of the 11th instant, to the federal council the report of the prefect of Martigny, a copy of which is subjoined, and the order of march.

It appears from these two documents that the commissary of guides had been applied to by a group of travelers for two guides and three horses, as is seen by the order of march, on which the figure two has been erased. By virtue of the sixteenth article of the rules, which says, "the traveler who engages a guide and then dismisses him is bound to pay him half the fee," the guide Rouiller had a right to demand the twelve francs for himself and his horse. But Mr. Nisbet wished to dismiss the guide and keep the horse. Rouiller proposed to refer the dispute to the commissary of guides, which Mr. Nisbet refused to do. The latter then spoke to the hotel-keeper, who took the responsibility of erasing the figure two from the order of march. With the order thus modified, Mr. Nisbet persisted in wishing to send away the guide and keep his horse, while Rouiller on his side refused to let his horse go without himself; on which Mr. Nisbet struck him twice with his cane. The dispute becoming more exciting, the traveler, in order to get rid of Rouiller, left him his horse and paid him twelve francs. As may be seen, there were wrongs on both sides in this dispute.

Meanwhile, as Rouiller was the first to do wrong, he will be punished by the privation of one of his regular trips at the commencement of next season, according to article twenty-six of the rules.

As to the fall of Mr. Brooks with his horse, the witness heard state that Rouiller did not touch Mr. Brooks's horse, and that he himself, by a false movement, brought about the fall.

The commissary of guides acted somewhat inconsiderately in advising the guide

Rouiller to take back his horse, but he did not infringe the rules, considering that this does not impose upon the guides, when they are once under way, any obligation to abandon their horses to the hands of strangers.

The federal council does not doubt that Mr. Harrington will also be convinced by the process impartially drawn up by the prefect of Martigny, that the whole dispute should be principally attributed to the improper conduct of Mr. Nisbet, and that in the main the guide Rouiller was in the right. Hoping that monsieur the minister of the United States of America will see the matter in the same light, the federal council has the honor to renew to him the assurance of its high consideration.

In the name of the federal council, the president of the confederation.

DUBS,

The Chancellor of the Confederation Schiefs.

Mr. GEORGE HARRINGTON,
Minister Resident of the United States of America
near the Swiss Confederation, Berne.

COPY OF THE RECORD OF PROCEEDINGS.

The prefect of the district of Martigny to the counselor of state, charged with the department of the interior.

MR. COUNSELOR OF STATE: I have the honor to send you the result of the inquiry made on the complaint against the guides Jean Rouiller and Etienne Pierroz, by Mr. Nisbet, to the minister of the United States of America in Switzerland. Circumstances have prevented me from sending this report sooner. I first sent the complaint to the commissary of guides, telling him to report upon it, and, after a month's delay, he said he preferred making a verbal report. Afterwards one of the chief witnesses, the woman an Guex Crosier, of the village of Rappes de Martigny-Combe, whom I had summoned, fell sick, and I had to go to her house to examine her.

That you may understand exactly what has been done, I will report the result of my examinations. I will then decide from the depositions if there is any foundation for the complaint, and which party is to be blamed. In the examination, the guides and others not knowing the travelers' names, called Mr. Brooks "the old man," Mr. Nisbet, "the bearded man," or "the man on the white horse," and Mr. Fowler, "the young man," but for brevity I will call them by their names.

Here is what the commissary of guides said: While in the public square of Martigny, he saw Mr. Nisbet come trotting down to the Hotel Clerc. At first he supposed he had forgotten something; but when he saw Jean Rouiller running after him, he thought an accident had happened. He went up to him and asked him what was the matter. He replied that Mr. and Mrs. Brooks, advised by Mr. Nisbet, wanted to send him back from Bourg-Martigny, but he said he would not go unless they paid him. Mr. Nisbet told them not to pay, because only one guide had been ordered, and then they came back to let the hotel-keeper decide. Hereupon the commissary started to the hotel, but when he saw Mr. Nisbet, he went up to him with Rouiller and wanted to talk to him; but he only showed them the order, which I inclose, and saying that the hotel-keeper had changed the number of guides from two to one, he galloped off. The commissary then told Rouiller he had nothing to do with that traveler; and as they had ordered two, they should pay for them, or come back and give reasons for not doing so. Jean Rouiller then went away, and that is all the commissary knows. He adds that the guides and mules that Mr. Nisbet had were ordered the day previous, and Mr. Brooks engaged his the next day, about nine o'clock.

Jean Rouiller gave the same testimony as the commissary, and added that, having overtaken the travelers at the village of Rappes, three-quarters of a league from Martigny, he told them what the commissioner said. Mr. Nisbet replied that he had nothing to do with him. The guide then asked to see the order of the hotel-keeper, reducing the two guides to one. Rouiller said the hotel-keeper had no right to do that; that the travelers must pay him, or go back to Martigny and satisfy the commissary. Mr. Nisbet insisting on proceeding, the guide took Mr. Brooks's mule by the bridle and turned it back, when Mr. Nisbet struck at him three times with his cane, striking him twice on the arm; he dodged the third blow and fell. On getting up and taking a stone, he threatened to throw it at Mr. Nisbet. Mr. Brooks's horse fell in the stream, but Mr. Brooks was not hurt by the fall. A pedestrian came up, when Mr. Brooks got on his mule again, and, on his advice, Rouiller was paid six francs for his day's work. Mr. Brooks then changed mules with Mr. Fowler, fearing to ride the one that had fallen with him, and which the guide said was now unsafe. Rouiller next claimed six francs for his mule, and it was paid him, after some hesitation. Rouiller then went back to the hotel with the animal. He said he did not insist on going to Chamouny, or force the travelers to turn back, but only asked pay for his beast. He denies taking Mr. Brooks's mule by the bridle.

The other guide, Etienne Pierroz, confirms what Rouiller said, except the interview with the commissary, which he did not see. He says he was angry with Mr. Nisbet for not giving back the order, as that was necessary for his justification. He says they both mounted to catch up with the travelers, who were ahead, and not to keep them from riding.

Alexandre Girond, Mr. Nisbet's guide, being called and informed that complaints were lodged against the other guides, he said: Those gentlemen ought not to complain, for they are wrong. He then stated that on arriving at Bourg-Martigny Mr. Nisbet wanted to send him back, because there were already two guides along. On Jean Rouiller's saying that Girond had been engaged the day before, and could not be sent back, they wanted to send Rouiller back, but he said he must go on to Chamouny. Rouiller said he would go back if they would pay him; this Mr. Nisbet refused to do, when Rouiller showed the order from the hotel-keeper for two guides for the Brooks family. Then Mr. Nisbet agreed to go back with Rouiller and see the hotel-keeper about the dispute. They started back, and the others went on towards Chamouny. Mr. Nisbet overtook them in a quarter of an hour, and Rouiller soon came up panting, and told them what the commissary had said. Mr. Nisbet said he had nothing to do with the commissary, and asked to see the order, to prove that the hotel-keeper had reduced the number of guides, and to show that he owed Rouiller nothing, and they then started; but Rouiller seized Mrs. Brooks's mule, and said: "If you will not pay me, we will go back to the commissary." Mr. Nisbet, in a rage, struck at Rouiller with his cane. Girond could not see if he was struck, but saw him pick up a stone and ask Mr. Nisbet if he intended to strike him again. At this time Mr. Brooks's mule fell with him, without injury. A young man on foot then came up and advised them to pay Rouiller and to send him back. They paid him the six francs he claimed. He left his horse with Mr. Brooks, who did not want to take it. Rouiller then said: "If you send the horse back, you must pay me six francs more." The traveler then gave him six francs.

Girond being interrogated on certain allegations in the complaint, he said Rouiller did not insist on going to Chamouny, but only said: "They have engaged me, and they must pay for my services." Rouiller did not take Mr. Brooks's horse by the bridle and cause him to fall, nor did he say all three of the horses must be taken back. He did not refuse to take the horse that had fallen back. He says the guide Pierroz did not shake his fist at Mr. Nisbet, but he heard a dispute because Mr. Nisbet refused to give up the order to him. After all was over, Mr. Fowler said ironically to Rouiller: "No dinner nor peanuts for you to-day." Even after the fall, Mrs. Brooks was willing that Rouiller should go on, but Mr. Nisbet objected.

Hearing that Eugene Sandron, of Rappes, had helped to get the horse out of the gully, I had him called. He said he saw nothing before the horse fell, but he saw Rouiller receive six francs for his own services, and six for his horse, given to him by a young traveler. From what he had heard, he thought the strangers were wrong. He said the widow Melanie Guex Crosier had seen and heard all, from her window over the road where the scene occurred.

I went to see her, and she confirmed all that Alexandre Girond had said. She saw Rouiller receive two blows from Mr. Nisbet's cane. Rouiller said several times: "Either retain me, pay me, or take me to the commissary." She says Rouiller did not touch Mr. Brooks's horse, and it was the young man who advised Mr. Brooks not to keep the animal. She saw Rouiller receive six francs at once, and six francs for his horse, given to him by the young man on foot. Mr. Fowler said to him: "No vale, no dinner for you this day," and Rouiller simply replied, "I don't want your dinner." She did not see Pierroz shake his fist at Mr. Nisbet. She was above the people, and could see and hear everything. She saw no other persons present, but some came up afterwards.

I thought this sufficient to convict Mr. Nisbet and release the guides, so I made no more examinations.

The unanimous testimony of the persons examined shows that the order of service given by Mr. Clerc, of the hotel, to the commissary of guides, mentioned two guides for the Brooks family; that they wanted to send back one guide when only a quarter of a league from the starting place; that this guide did not refuse to go back, but demanded compensation, either from the travelers or from the hotel-keeper, by virtue of article ten of the law on transport service to travelers; that it was agreed to refer the matter to the hotel-keeper, when the travelers said they wanted but one guide; that Mr. Nisbet hurried to the hotel and had the order for guides changed from two to one, which could only be done by the commissary, and not by the hotel-keeper; that Mr. Nisbet would listen to no explanation from the commissary, and even ventured to strike a guide not in his service; that Rouiller did not cause Mr. Brooks's horse to fall, but the horse fell from fright at Mr. Nisbet's cane; that the guide did not offer to take Mr. Brooks's horse away; he did not receive money for the entire journey from Martigny to Chamouny, but was paid for half the way, six francs for himself, and six for his horse; and finally, the witnesses of the scene were indignant at Mr. Nisbet for his conduct.

The guides and witnesses do not blame Mr. Brooks, but condemn Mr. Nisbet for meddling with a business that did not concern him.

I cannot understand why Clerc, of the hotel, casts all the blame on the commissary, unless for some grudge, for I cannot conceive that he is to blame. The hotel-keeper did wrong to change the number of guides without consulting the commissary, making Mr. Nisbet believe the affair was amicably settled. He ought to know that when a guide is engaged he cannot be discharged without pay, against his will, and without the decision of the commissary.

If the guide had been sent back from the hotel, or Bourg-Martigny, he would have been entitled to three francs, by article ten, second section, of the law regulating the transport service of travelers; but after starting with him, and causing him to lose much time, I think that the twelve francs that Rouiller demanded was his due for himself and his horse.

I must add that Mr. Nisbet shows that he does not know how to travel over mountains, when he complains of a halt of an hour and a half midway. If he had any sense he ought to know that a guide and horses cannot go eight or ten leagues a day over mountains without rest, particularly after waiting for the travelers one or two hours at the hotel.

What Mr. Nisbet says about every guide getting three francs from the hotel-keeper for every person brought to the hotel is too silly to be believed. It may be done elsewhere, but not at Martigny and Chamounix.

Here are the facts, Mr. Counselor, as I obtained them, and I refrain from expressing my opinion thereon.

I return the three documents you sent me, and accept the occasion, &c., &c., &c.

GAY,
Prefect of the Martigny District.

Mr. Harrington to the High Federal Council.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, May 2, 1868.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States near the Swiss Confederation, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's communication of the 15th ultimo, relative to the complaint of Mr. W. F. Nisbet and other American citizens, of the misconduct to which they were subjected on the part of certain guides serving the route from Martigny to Chamounix, by the Tête Noire, which the undersigned had the honor to submit to the high federal council under date of September 23 last.

Your excellency informed the undersigned of the result of the investigation called for by the high federal council, and, at the same time, inclosed to him a copy of the record of proceedings and of the testimony taken, as submitted by the authorities of the canton of the Valais, upon which those authorities declared the guides exculpated from all blame except for a slight misdemeanor on the part of guide Bouiller, for which, as a punishment, he would be suspended for a short period, at the commencement of the approaching season, from his functions as guide.

Accompanying this record was a paper, presumed to be the original order, by virtue of which two guides instead of one (the cause of the difficulty) presented themselves as attached to the party of Mr. Brooks, and was, doubtless, submitted by those authorities as a justification, firstly, for the appearance of the two guides, and secondly, as a further justification of the demand for indemnity, so rudely presented, and, in the opinion of the undersigned, so unjustifiably enforced from the travelers when the extra guide was told that his services had not been commanded and were not required.

Your excellency will permit the undersigned to refer to the testimony upon which the authorities of the Valais profess to have relied for their double verdict—that of acquittal of the guides, and conviction of wrong on the part of the travelers.

Aside from the counter declarations of the incriminated guides, who naturally sustained one another in pleading "not guilty" to the charges preferred against them, it appears by this record that but two witnesses were summoned, notwithstanding the assertion of the parties complaining that "about twenty persons gathered about the scene," notwithstanding the declaration of the two cited witnesses that several persons were present, and notwithstanding the statement of the landlord of the Hotel Clerc, in his communication of the same day of the occurrences, that he had that morning been informed of the gross outrages that had been perpetrated upon the travelers. These concurrent statements prove conclusively that the lack of testimony was not compulsory.

Of these two witnesses, the first one (Sandon) testified that he saw nothing of what had passed before the fall of the horse, but "from what was stated to him by the people of his village, he estimated that the travelers were wrong."

The second and only other witness is asserted to be a widow, so enfeebled as to have been unable to appear before the magistrate. Her testimony certainly confirms all the declarations of the guides. She neither saw nor heard anything improper done or said by them, but is decisive as to the numerous and frequent provocations on the part of the strangers. She asserts that she witnessed the whole scene from the window of a neighboring house, and is especially positive as to the exact sum that was finally paid by the travelers as indemnity for the dismissed guide and returned horse—that is to say, six francs for each. As it would be simply impossible for any one standing in a distant window to know, under the circumstances, how much, if any, money was passed from the hand of one individual into the hand of another, the undersigned may be pardoned for the little confidence he has either in the testimony or the witness.

Such is the testimony upon which the prefect of Martigny professes to rely in justification of his declaration that each and every charge and specification brought by the complainant (Nisbet) was false, notwithstanding they were sustained by four other unimpeachable witnesses.

The occurrences complained of took place on the 10th September, and the formal complaint of the parties was, on the 23d of that month, submitted to the high federal council, who immediately communicated with the authorities of Valais. The complaint, therefore, reached these authorities while the occurrences were fresh in memory, and before they had ceased to be a subject of comment. The landlord of the Hotel Clerc had already given voice to the general indignation by his voluntary urging the parties to bring their injuries before the proper authorities, in order to suppress the scandalous and outrageous treatment to which travelers were subjected by those guides. The undersigned fails to observe in the record that any of the "people of his village," referred to by the first witness as conversant with the facts, or that the landlord of the Hotel Clerc, or any of the witnesses known to him as being informed, were called upon for testimony, though the prefect says, "I cannot comprehend why the master of the Hotel Clerc should have thrown all the fault upon the commissioner of guides," &c. Certainly the prefect had power to ascertain why the keeper of the hotel had thus asserted, and it is equally certain, if the record be true, that he did not exercise that power. Why he did not do so he leaves to inference. That inference cannot be other than prejudicial to the good faith of the investigation. The basis of this difficulty, and the justification for all the subsequent acts of the guides, appears to have been the alleged order, above referred to, for two guides for Mr. Brooks's party, instead of one, as he asserts he commanded. It is claimed that, under and by virtue of that order, Mr. Brooks was either bound to take two guides to Chamounix, or he or some one else should pay an indemnity. And what was this alleged order? Simply a paper, without signature, containing neither the name of Mr. Brooks nor other person, upon which was written, "two guides and three horses;" a paper with no other paternity than evidences that it issued from the Hotel Clerc. By whom written or by whom uttered was unknown to Mr. Brooks, though evidently known to the guides. Can it be successfully, or even seriously, asserted that such a paper committed Mr. Brooks to the payment of any money, when he promptly, at the commencement of the journey, declared that he had ordered and wanted but one guide?

Admitting that such paper was, in the usual form, employed on such occasions, the correctness of Mr. Brooks's declaration that he had ordered but one guide was clearly and promptly admitted when the order, without hesitation or question, was changed from two to one. It is not claimed, nor even pretended, that the error, if error there was, was committed by or originated with Mr. Brooks.

In a community consisting of hotel-keepers and their employés, guides, muleteers, &c., dependent for support mainly upon travelers, collusion on the part of such for mutual benefit, at the expense of the strangers, it will be admitted are liable to occur, and to which, most frequently, the strangers submit rather than be delayed and suffer more serious annoyances. The undersigned does not charge collusion in this case, but it is certain that the indemnity demanded for the extra guide was forced from the strangers, and in amount, he is still constrained to believe, equal to the full charge for a guide and a horse for the journey from Martigny to Chamounix, notwithstanding it was not only made clear, but admitted at the time, as is shown by the record, that the error originated with the author of that order, and was in nowise the fault of Mr. Brooks. The undersigned claims that thereafter the latter should have been allowed to pursue his journey unmolested.

The complaint presented was of a grave character; it narrated a series of most discreditable acts, following each other in logical sequence, and culminating in that which endangered not only the limbs but the life of one of the party; and this narration, so clearly set forth, was sustained by five intelligent and responsible parties, one of whom, at least, Mr. Nisbet, from long residence and travel in Europe, was familiar both with the language and habits of the country. In the opinion of the undersigned, such a complaint, so substantiated, should have received from those authorities a thorough and searching investigation; it was submitted with that expectation, and in the hope that the punishment awarded to the guilty parties would have served to shield his countrymen, in the future, from like oppression and indignities, which are so offensive to the rights of protection guaranteed by treaty stipulations, and so violative alike of justice and the laws of hospitality. He regrets being obliged to say that, judging by the record, the investigation appears to him to have been partial and unsatisfactory. He has reason to believe, however, that other and further information or testimony than is shown by the record was obtained or taken, but why suppressed is left to conjecture. It certainly would have been more satisfactory had the record been complete, even had the additional testimony been only cumulative or against the complainants.

In thus submitting to your excellency the impressions which the perusal of the record made upon him, the undersigned trusts that he used no expression that may be construed as reflecting upon the action of the high federal council. He owes to them, and prays your excellency to accept, his thanks for the prompt manner in which, at his request, the authorities of the Valais were called upon for explanation.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to your excellency and the high federal council the assurances of his highest consideration.

GEORGE HARRINGTON.

His Excellency Dr. I. DUBS,
President of the Swiss Confederation.

The High Federal Council to Mr. Harrington.

BERNE, May 13, 1868.

The federal council thinks proper to inform monsieur the resident minister of the United States to the Swiss Confederation, that it has communicated the original and the translation of the note which Mr. Harrington has addressed it on the 2d instant, concerning the complaint of Mr. Nisbet against the guides Rouiller and Pierroz, to the government of the canton of Valais, inviting it to communicate this reply to the authorities who have acted in this matter, leaving it to the care of taking the measures which it may judge proper.

The federal council has also added that it thinks it would be for the interest of the country to verify how far the having omitted to give a hearing to many eye-witnesses may be confirmed, and to ascertain the motives of that omission, as well as to determine upon what may appear necessary under the circumstances.

Finally, the federal council has stated to the government of Valais that it expects a report upon the measures taken and their results.

The federal council will, then, probably have occasion to make further communications on this subject to monsieur the resident minister of the United States of America, and, meanwhile, it has the honor to renew to Mr. Harrington the assurances of its high consideration.

In the name of the federal council, the president of the Confederation,

DUBS.
The Chancellor of the Confederation,
SCHIEFS.

Mr. G. HARRINGTON,
Minister Resident of the United States of America to the Confederation of the Swiss, Berne.

The High Federal Council to Mr. Harrington.

BERNE, July 25, 1868.

The federal council thought proper to communicate to the authorities of the canton of Valais the note of the American minister, dated 2d of May last, relating to the complaint of Mr. Nisbet against the guides Rouiller and Pierroz, with the order for a new examination of the facts that gave rise to the complaint, taking into consideration the observations presented by the plaintiff.

This having been done, the federal council now sends Mr. George Harrington a copy of the report dated the 21st instant, and the result of the second investigation, confirming the first, and to repeat to the minister resident the assurances of very high consideration.

WELTI,
Vice-President for the Federal Council.
SCHIEFS,
Chancellor of the Confederation.

Mr. GEORGE HARRINGTON,
United States Minister Resident, &c., &c., &c., Berne.

The State Council of the Canton of Valais to the Federal Council.

[Translation.]

SION, July 21, 1868.

GENTLEMEN: According to your order of the 13th of May, 1868, we have caused a second investigation of Mr. Nisbet's complaint against the guides, Rouiller and Pierroz, from Martigny, as presented by the United States minister.

This second inquiry confirms the evidence given in our first report.

On starting, the travellers wanted to send back one of the guides engaged, and keep his horse. The guide claimed compensation for loss of time. This being refused, he proposed to take back his horse. Thereupon a dispute arose, and with hard words, Mr. Nisbet struck the guide with his cane, who in a rage threatened to take his horse away. At this moment the horse and rider fell in a ditch, doing no harm.

Both parties were wrong here. If the traveler had paid the guide what was due him, and had not struck him, the consequences would not have been serious. Mr. Nisbet did not ask a judicial inquiry, but only an examination before a magistrate, as a police offense.

We accept the investigations of the prefect of Martigny, though not conducted with due formality.

In this inquiry the prefect got a report from Mr. Clerc, the hotel-keeper, Mr. Nisbet's witness, showing, first, that it is not customary to sign orders for guides and mules; second, that Mr. Brooks's order called for two guides and three mules; third, that the number of guides was reduced to one, at the request of one of the travelers, who returned to Martigny for that purpose; fourth, that Mr. Clerc, on hearing of the dispute, told one of the travelers he could send the guide back if he paid him. Mr. Nisbet said he knew nothing of the widow Genx-Crosier, one of the witnesses. Now, the inquiry shows her house to be near the road—the window where she was, only one and one-half yards from the ground, and four and one-half yards from the ditch in which Mr. Brooks's horse fell; so she could well hear everything that passed. She heard the guide say he was satisfied with the twelve francs paid him; and there is no doubt of this, for Mr. Nisbet and the guide both confess it.

Another disinterested witness, the guide Alexander Giroud, gave testimony before the prefect, in favor of the guides.

The inquiry also shows that the persons present (said to be twenty by Mr. Nisbet) came up after the horse fell, and could not have seen what passed previously.

In view of this inquiry, the state council cannot alter its decision temporarily suspending the guide Rouiller from the exercise of his profession.

The state council, learning that the commissary of guides acted imprudently in advising the guide to take his horse back, it was determined to reprimand that official. In conclusion, we must say it is the commissary's duty to settle disputes with guides, and Mr. Nisbet ought to have applied to that official, and not to the hotel-keeper, to settle his dispute with the guide.

Accept, gentlemen, the assurances, &c., &c.

(Signatures of the councilmen follow hereunder.)

Mr. Harrington to the High Federal Council.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Berne, August 3, 1868.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the communication from the high federal council of the 25th ultimo, transmitting copy of a report from the council of state of the canton of the Valais, relative to the difficulty that occurred in September last on the route "Fête Noire," between a party of Americans and certain guides, heretofore under consideration.

In thanking the high federal council for their action in the premises, the undersigned can only reiterate his regrets that a portion of the testimony tending to the opposite conclusions of those originally emitted by the prefect of Martigny should continue to be suppressed, the undersigned having been assured by the party making it that such testimony was submitted in writing. The undersigned observes that, in addition to the judgment of the prefect of Martigny, the council of state has pronounced the chief commissioner also to have been guilty of impropriety, and subjected him to reprimand. Slight as the punishment has been, in the opinion of the undersigned, for such grave offences, he is not without hope that it will tend to restrain the unauthorized and improper conduct on the part of the official guides, of which there has been heretofore so frequent occasions for complaint.

The undersigned begs to renew to your excellency, and the high federal council, the assurances of his highest consideration.

GEO. HARRINGTON.

His Excellency Dr. J. DUBS,
President of the Swiss Confederation, Berne.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Harrington.

No. 35.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
August 19, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 22d of July last, No. 61. It contains a sequel of proceedings in the case of John Hürlimann of Philadelphia, a minor claimant of certain moneys in the hands of Oberentfelden, Canton Aargau, as the property of his deceased mother. Your communication to the federal council upon that subject was discreet and proper. The decision of the federal council was clearly just, and furnishes a new proof of the wisdom as well as of the friendship of the Swiss government for the United States.

The successful result of the whole proceeding must be especially satisfactory to the claimant, while it is gratifying in a national view to the United States. It is the more gratifying, for the reason that the solution has been reached by the Swiss government, acting independently and without any unfairness or want of liberality on the part of the government of the United States.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

GEORGE HARRINGTON, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Harrington to Mr. Seward.

No. 68.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, September 3, 1868.

SIR: Under date of the 27th of July, my No. 62, I had the honor to transmit copies of a correspondence consequent upon the arrest of Mr. Charles Berry by the authorities of Basle.

Since that date two communications have been exchanged between this legation and the high federal council, occasioned by a supplementary reply of the authorities of Basle to my communication to the federal council of the 27th of July.

Of this correspondence copies will be found herewith. It presents some curious points. The Basle authorities condemn the trustee, Stehlin, and have, I am informed, reprimanded him. While they claim that the alleged early transgressions of the girl (for the charges appear to be confined to a period long anterior to her marriage with Berry, of which they carefully abstain from alleging that Berry had knowledge) are sufficient to justify their acts against him. Of this, however, I conceive that I have nothing to do.

It is proper to add, that in settling the estate, it was understood that no further claim for damages for arrest and imprisonment should be preferred by Mr. Berry, nor on his account by the government of the United States. Upon this assurance the five thousand francs advanced by his mother will be considered as a gift, and that amount heretofore deducted from the fortune, formerly in the hands of the trustee, will be or has been paid over to him or his agent.

I have given no assurances in the premises, and shall await advices from the department.

I am clearly of the opinion that our position has been fully vindicated so far as Berry is considered, and that hereafter there will be no further arrests of American citizens without good and justifiable cause.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
GEO. HARRINGTON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

The High Federal Council to Mr. Harrington.

BERNE, August 17-21, 1868.

The federal council has hastened to communicate to the government of the canton of the city of Basle the late note which Mr. Minister Resident of the United States of America to the Swiss confederation addressed it on the 27th of July last, concerning the claim of Mr. Charles Berry, a naturalized American citizen, and this communication has elicited from the aforesaid government the reply which the federal council has the honor to transmit herewith in copy to Mr. Harrington, with a number of accompanying documents in support thereof, marked A and B, being annexes which Mr. Minister Resident is requested to return after having taken note of them.

The federal council believes that Mr. Harrington will be ready to concur in thinking that this affair has been sufficiently elucidated, and that there is no occasion to revert to it, Mr. Berry having gone through the formalities prescribed for the emigration of a Swiss citizen as a native of Basle, and having in fact become disconnected from the ties which bound him to his native country.

The federal council embraces this new occasion to renew to Mr. Minister Resident of the United States of America the assurances of its high consideration.

In the name of the federal council, the president of the confederation,

DUBS.

*The Chancellor of the Confederation,
SCHIESS.*

Mr. GEORGE HARRINGTON,
Minister Resident of the United States of America, &c., &c., &c., Berne.

[Translation.]

BASLE, August 12, 1868.

In regard to the note of the American legation, dated July 27, and transmitted to us the 3d instant, concerning Charles Berry, we have the honor to give the following explanations:

First of all, we think objectionable the declaration of the American legation that "the otherwise unsatisfactory report of the authorities of Basle compelled him to seek elsewhere for explanations," and such unofficial information ought to have been submitted with the other documents, in order to enable us to express ourselves more clearly in relation thereto, or they should not be regarded of value as against our statements of the facts. In this case it is of the more importance, because it has been unnecessarily exaggerated, and in fact really distracted.

Being obliged to repel earnestly all the charges and one-sided criticisms in the case, we are still ready to show our willingness to give to the legation all necessary explanations in the matter.

The fact that the high federal council has given, on the main point, to the legation an answer in accordance with our law and our views, renders unnecessary a more detailed reply to that voluminous paper.

Throughout that document the idea is kept up that Berry, as an American citizen, has entirely and long ago ceased to be a citizen of Basle, and that therefore the American authorities had the right, and it was their duty, to protect him against the enactments of our canton. However strongly this supposition is asserted, it is groundless as against existing facts and our laws.

Berry, who was discharged from his citizenship on the 27th June last, was a citizen of Basle until that day. The question why Berry was once put under guardianship has no business here; it is sufficient that the reasons therefor were cogent enough, and our judicial proceedings, previous to the withdrawal of civil rights, presented every desirable guarantee.

The trustee had to deliver annually an account of the administration of the property, and to send the interest of it to his minor, &c.; in short, the entire condition was a legal one, and recognized as such by all. Berry himself never doubted this a moment until he commenced to make bold front against his trustee with his American citizenship in order to get his property. This he did not do until the beginning of the last year.

By article thirteen of our laws in relation to allegiance, (inclosed hereby,) Berry could be discharged therefrom only by a definite resolution of the council, and it required the consent of his trustee.

On the 15th of June last, Berry forwarded from Stuttgart an application for his discharge of allegiance; the trustee recommended it; the city council agreed to it; and we gave him this discharge and made it public. The concerning documents we have annexed, marked A.

By all this it is clearly shown that Mr. Berry was till then a citizen of Basle, and considered himself as such.

The note of the minister resident shows a very grave misapprehension by producing the case of Ostermann in support of a theory which we do not wish further to discuss, as the federal council has already advised the legation. By the sentence of the court at Colmar, Ostermann was declared to be a citizen of Basle and to be no longer a citizen of France, because the French law prescribes, directly contrary to our law, that all persons who become citizens of foreign countries, lose thereby their French citizenship.

If Berry's citizenship of Basle is fully substantiated, then all the remarks of that note about the measures taken to take care of Berry fall to the ground.

It is to be regretted that the legation did not get a more minute insight into our laws; it could have been spared all these erroneous judgments which it repeatedly brings against us.

First of all it is a capital error to speak of "confinement to hard labor," "incarceration in a states prison," to make "travail forcé" out of administrative decisions, which, having strict regard to the character of such cases, are executed or inflicted in other places than the public penitentiaries. For example, Mr. Berry would have been brought doubtless to Mr. Werner's establishment at Reutlingen.

The law in regard to the situation of persons in houses of correction, which we append, also, will show that it has nothing to do with crimes, and all that is said about the non-existence of such in this case, is needless. And, as the American legation goes so far as to represent Berry as a man upon whom no blame really falls, we submit for examination the report of the trustee marked B. This shows Mr. and Mrs. Berry in a light sufficient to justify the government in taking care of him. As before stated, we had decided negatively in the matter before the communication of the federal department of justice and police had reached us informing us of the reclamation, and asking for explanations.

Otherwise it appears to us a little far sought, that his status of an American citizen is so partially forced upon our common countrymen, and everything disregarded that kept him in connection with his original and never given up home.

We must repeat here that at the time of the preliminary arrangements nothing was known to us about his American citizenship. If this had been known to us, we should, as stated above, have had the right to treat him as a Balois, but it is possible that this fact would have served to dismiss the matter.

There are two more points on which we have yet to express ourselves. The first point regards the way and manner of the trustee in having his ward come here to Basle. We agree so little with it that we must declare the insinuation of the note as to the act having been done with our understanding, as incorrect.

The second point regards the protracted imprisonment of Berry, and the letter to the consul, which the director of police did not deliver at once.

The arrest of Berry was upon the whole entirely in order. It was in consequence of the request that he should be taken care of, and this request was not, as stated in the note, the request of a single individual, but of the trustee and the whole family. For example, the brother-in-law of Berry, the military commissary here, was there in person. The prisoner declared at once that he would submit to the inflicted custody, (he had civil detention, two rooms, good board, the permission to smoke, and to promenade in the yard;) he recognized the right of the Basle government to dispose of him, but declared that if informations from Stuttgart should be acquired he would not be placed in a house of correction. At that time he did not appeal to his American citizenship. Soon after he wrote to his wife; the letter was sent at once. After this he submitted a letter to the director of police for the United States consul here. The director of police replied that it was his mission to treat him as a citizen of Basle, with the view to an investigation and his being taken care of, and he could not admit that Berry should at once involve other authorities in the matter; afterwards would be time for this. Since then nothing further was spoken of that letter; Berry never mentioned it again. The director of police had so little intention to wrong him that he at once laid the letter one side with the other documents and delivered it to Mr. Consul Wolff upon his first request.

Notwithstanding the letter was repeated, the report from Stuttgart did not arrive for a long time, because Mrs. Berry had left Stuttgart in order to make reclamations, or, at least, had sent the papers away for that purpose, whereby she committed the great fault of setting aside the authorities of Basle.

We hope that the foregoing may serve to enlighten the American legation as to how much this Berry and his affairs might be taken in consideration from our point of view, and that the censures made do not appear to be justified.

Report of Mr. Stehlin, trustee of Mr. Berry, to the Bourgermaster and Council of Basleville.

[Translation.]

BASLE, April 20, 1868.

The humble undersigned feels himself under the sad necessity to apply to your honors to have his ward Charles Berry placed in the house of correction at Kalshrain.

The reasons forcing me, with the consent of the mother and other relations of my pupil, to apply for this most extreme measure have their foundation partially in a time past, but partially and specially the present. Charles Berry showed after his majority such a light character, such an inclination to extravagance, and so little desire and ability for any sort of labor, and suffered himself to be deceived and taken advantage of by so-called friends in such a manner, that in the year 1857 application had to be made to declare him deprived of his civil rights, and the application was granted by the court of wards on the 7th January, 1858, and I was appointed as his trustee. The property which I held in trust then amounted to 25,000 francs and is the same yet.

The adventures and lot of my ward during the last eleven years have been various. At the beginning, the director of a college, Mr. Kettiger in Weltingen, attempted his education, but in vain. Berry then entered the military service of the kingdom of Naples, and, it is said, behaved himself well. The events of 1860 forced him to return home. I kept him occupied at first in my own office with copying. Colonel H. Wieland employed him for the same purpose, but he unfortunately could not hold this position by reason of culpable offense. Military service had to be sought for, as only such continual discipline would suit a character like his, and he had no objection thereto. He concluded to go to America and to enter the armies of the United States. During the civil war there all went on well, but as soon as Berry quitted the service and was thrown on the pavement of New York, the misery recommenced because he could not get accustomed to any orderly civil occupation. In the fall of 1865 he surprised his family with the news that he had married; giving the name of his wife as "Bertha Ulmer," and speaking of her in the most tender and affectionate terms. At the same time he requested the delivery of his property or a part thereof for the purpose of buying a so-called café-saloon in New York, and demanded the restoration of his civil rights. I could not respond to his wishes, but his mother let him have 5,000 francs and with them he purchased one of those numerous establishments in New York. Not long after, in the beginning of 1867 he tried again to force the delivery of his property, basing his claim on his rights as an American citizen. First, a notary received a power of attorney to collect the money, then the American consul. I declared to both of them that I would not deliver the property and titles confided to me without a judicial sentence to that effect.

In the meantime my ward had to abandon the management of that café-saloon and was deprived of all honest means of subsistence, once more upon the streets, his pretended wife with him. This seemed to have induced her to come to Europe in order to manage personally the delivery of the money. She made her appearance in August, 1867; was lodging, being in bad health, for several weeks in a hotel, till Madame Berry-Bruderlin resolved to take her to her house at Zurich. The original intention, to return to New York, was given up by her, when she saw that the obtainment of her husband's property met with invincible obstructions. It was therefore resolved that Berry should come to Europe also.

During her sojourn here, Bertha Ulmer presented a certificate of marriage signed by a Rev. Toelke of New York, and dated October 23, 1865, according to which her name was Bertha Ulmer, born on the 29th of June, 1843, at Ludwigsburg. Beside this, she stated that her father had been adjutant of the 7th regiment of infantry of Wurtemberg; that her parents had died and that she had emigrated with her uncle to the United States in 1851 and had lived with him on a farm in Rockland county, State of New York, until she became acquainted with Charles Berry.

The reimbursement of debts and expenses of Berry, with which the firm Meyer & Leber was charged, offered various difficulties; one creditor, having procured a writ for the arrest of his person, and carried on a law-suit against him. This creditor was one Mr. Sporry, of Zurich, who, by the intervention of some other Zurichois, transmitted to the family of Berry a number of documents relative to that law-suit. These were depositions of witnesses and of a most injuring character for Bertha Ulmer. They stated that this person had lived in New York as a public courtesan for several years and under different names, viz: "Bertha Freundlich," &c., that she was married to one Peter Weber, who is living now in Norfolk, Virginia, and that by the marriage with Charles Berry she committed bigamy. As a proof of this latter fact a copy of the certificate of marriage, dated May 14, 1864, was annexed, in which the person was named Bertha Freundlich, born on the 29th of June, 1845, at Hamm, district Worms, Grand Duchy of Hessen.

The authority and validity of these statements seemed to me to be questionable, the much more as Bertha Ulmer, whom I interrogated on the subject, denied everything, and weakened the import of these statements by the assertion that such certificates could be bought for a few dollars, if such a man as Sporry should find it in his interest to do so.

With such a state of affairs, I dared not to take decisive steps, but I endeavored to obtain reliable information in Europe as well as in New York, in which the honorable city clerk assisted me with obliging readiness.

The first result at Hamm, district Worms, was, that no "Bertha Freundlich" was ever born there; that this name was entirely unknown in the register of births of that community.

A twice repeated application at Ludwigsburg had also a negative result. A "Bertha Ulmer" was nowhere to be found, even after the original declarations about her parents were given.

In the meantime one of my agents in New York succeeded in getting Berry released from prison, paid his debts and transported him to Europe. He arrived here at the end of November. Before this, it was arranged that Bertha Ulmer should get in person the papers from Ludwigsburg, necessary for her admission to the Basle citizenship, and, as she alluded to the support of some of her relations there and of a paternal friend, it was decided to have her take up her abode there first.

With this intention Charles Berry and Bertha Ulmer left Basle on the 9th December, 1867. The next letter did not come from Ludwigsburg but from Stuttgart, and it was therein said that they chose rather to live in Stuttgart.

The transmission of the required papers was long delayed; finally, on the 2d of February last, they arrived and were, viz:

1. A certificate of birth;
2. A certificate of marriage.

These papers set forth:

- a. That the name of this person is not Bertha but Catherine Ulmer;
- b. That she was not born at Ludwigsburg but at Klein-Ingersheim;
- c. That her father was not an adjutant of a Wurtembergian regiment, but a peasant;
- d. That the name of her mother was not Bertha Blankenhorn, but Susanna Johannes Wacker, &c., &c.

Private information from a friend of Madame Berry-Bruderlin proved that the mother of Bertha Ulmer was living yet, and, in truth, in very poor circumstances; that Bertha, respectively Catharine, did service in Stuttgart, or, more clearly said, was a public courtesan of the lowest sort; that she was sent by her community to America about seven years ago; that she wanted now a certificate to acknowledge her as a native of that town, in which her father should be designated as an "officer." She declared her husband to be a Count Charles de Berry, a direct descendant of that ducal family de Berry of France. These papers and private information showed that Charles Berry was the victim of the meanest deceit. However, I tried, assisted by the city clerk, to have these private statements officially confirmed. The magistrates of Klein-Ingersheim and Besigheim confirmed in all the main points that which the friend of Madame Berry-Bruderlin had stated.

In the mean time the statement of an officer of the detective police in New York in regard to her history there had been received. These statements, which seem to me to be absolutely trustworthy, confirm not only the depositions of the witnesses in that law-suit, but state a number of facts of the most serious kind; especially they set aside all doubts about the marriage between Bertha Ulmer and Peter Weber.

How much of all this Berry knows, I cannot decide, but I cannot believe that he had no knowledge whatever of these facts. And I also believe that such a condition of affairs would not be suffered if the family and the authorities had knowledge thereof; and for the termination thereof I have no other and better means to propose than that of placing Mr. Berry temporarily in a house of correction with compulsory labor. I shall therefore induce him to come here, in order that the measures prescribed by law may be taken, and especially the police may be addressed thereon.

By such provision we would at least accomplish the separation of Berry from a cast away person, who had so deceived him by means unknown to us, not, however, by her personal gracefulness, and on the other side Berry would get accustomed to work. Perhaps he will make up his mind again to enter military service, the only occupation for which he is qualified. In his letter from Stuttgart he asserts that he teaches the English language and that he has several pupils, but this believe who may.

Submitting to your honor's consideration my proposition, I have the honor to remain,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, September 1, 1868.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's communication of the 21st ultimo, covering certain papers relative to the affair of Berry, copies of which will be transmitted to his government.

In accordance with your excellency's request certain of said papers, as indicated, are returned herewith.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to the high federal council the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

No. 72.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, October 10, 1868.

SIR: Switzerland has recently been subjected to what may justly be termed a national calamity. After an exceptionally dry and agreeable season the country has been visited by an heretofore unequalled rainfall, and much of the cantons of Grisons, Tessin, the Valais, Glaris, and St. Gall, and Uri, have in consequence thereof been literally desolated by inundations. The mountain rivulets and cascades suddenly swelled to torrents, swept villages, hamlets, cattle, woods, bridges, dikes, earth, and stone, as debris upon the fields below, which are thus rendered forever hopeless wastes.

The appeal of the authorities of the canton of Tessin to their more fortunate fellow-countrymen officially sets forth the effects of the storm, and this description may be taken as applicable in a greater or less extent to the other cantons named:

In the night of the 27-28th September our canton was struck by a frightful catastrophe. A volume of water precipitated itself as a deluge into the valleys of Blenio, of the Levantine, the Riviera, the Venasco, and the Maggia. This scourge was accompanied by the destruction of buildings, and by the fall of trees, by earth and rock slides, in such manner as if all the elements had combined to rival each other in the work of devastation. All the beautiful country that extends from Giornico and Olivone to Biasca, unrecognizable to day, is nothing but a mass of debris. Roads, bridges, and dikes, are destroyed; houses, mills, and stables, have been swept away; the rich forests, the fertile fields, and vineyards, but yesterday flourishing, have disappeared; cattle have perished by thousands, and that which adds to the consternation is the loss of more than fifty persons; some surprised in their sleep, and others the victims of their devotion while attempting to rescue and assist the drowning; fathers and mothers of families have been crushed under their falling houses and their bodies swept off by the rushing waters.

The disaster surpasses all that imagination can picture. Thousands of families have been struck by the calamity, and too many of them have been reduced to the last extremity, without roof, without clothes, without bread, and several deprived of their fathers.

The losses, which for the moment cannot be stated, will rise to millions. * * *

The authorities, the societies and the citizens of this canton, reserved by Heaven for so cruel an experience, are occupying themselves in providing for the immediate wants of the victims; but all our forces will not suffice for this immense burden. To you we address the appeal, which, in this supreme necessity, is an utterance of the heart rather than the thoughts. We ask of our brothers, with confidence, not to abandon us to these blows of destiny, and that they share with us the cross of adversity. All species of succor will be accepted by us with thankful hearts, and the cantonal authorities will take care that the most suffering shall be the first to receive the benefits of your charities.

To the Swiss people, * * * so blessed by God, the desolate of the valley of the Tessin address their appeals and their prayers.

LUGANA, October 1, &c., &c., &c.

Subsequent information proves that this sad picture is not overwrought.

The governments, both federal and local, as also the people, are promptly and generally responding to the appeals of which this is but one. The President of the confederation, at the instance of the federal council, at once repaired to the scene of the disaster. The military engineers were immediately dispatched to superintend and direct the restoration and rebuilding of the highways, bridges, and dikes, in order to restore communications altogether suspended. Citizen committees have been organized in the remaining cantons for the purpose of visiting each house for assistance, and every possible means is put in requisition to relieve the sufferers and repair the otherwise heavy public damages. The disaster, however, has been so extended, and the number of people left at the threshold of winter, without shelter, clothes, and bread, has been too large to be more than scantily and partially repaired and relieved by the local contributions, however generous they may be.

I am not aware that appeals will be made to the Swiss, or others, resident abroad. Should such be addressed to the resident Swiss of the United States, I beg to state thus briefly, but officially, that no human foresight could have evaded this blow, and that this cry of distress appeals with equal force to the benevolent of our countrymen of whatever origin or nationality they may be.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

GEO. HARRINGTON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington November 12, 1868.

Your dispatch of the 19th of October, No. 73, was duly received, together with its accompaniment, which is a copy of an appeal of the high federal council of Switzerland to their compatriots, both at home and abroad, on the occasion of the dreadful inundations which have desolated large and fertile districts of Switzerland. You will assure the President of the republic that the government and people of the United States are moved by profound sympathy for the people of Switzerland in this great calamity. I have taken pains to give due publicity to the appeal.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, October 19, 1867.

SIR: I had the consoling gratification to receive on the 4th of September ultimo your dispatch of May 27th, No. 36, in which you are pleased to honor me with a general approval of all the action taken by me in the offer of mediation for the termination of the Paraguayan war, and especially of my note addressed on the 10th of April to Señor de Elizalde, then minister of foreign affairs here, renewing the offer of mediation, with a request for its reconsideration. This approval I view as an additional proof of the kind forbearance with which my government judges my humble efforts to follow up the humane spirit of its instructions, and I beg leave to offer herewith to you, sir, and through you to the President of the United States, my most sincere thanks.

With the same mail I had also the honor to receive your dispatch No. 39, dated July 11th, wherein reference is made to a copy of a communication which was addressed to your department on the 9th of the same month, by Mr. B. Mitre y Vedia, chargé d'affaires of the Argentine Republic near the United States government, with special instructions for me to treat upon the subject presented by Mr. Mitre y Vedia here in Buenos Ayres, and to put into the hands of Señor de Elizalde a copy of your above alluded to dispatch No. 36, with the information that the said dispatch furnishes what you trust will be sufficient explanation of the view of the President concerning the matter brought to the attention of the United States government by Mr. Mitre y Vedia.

The copy of the note on which you instruct me to act not having been inclosed with your dispatch No. 39, I was obliged to postpone my action in the matter until the receipt of the missing document. As soon, however, as I had succeeded in securing an official copy of it, through the good offices of Señor Dr. Don Marcelino Ugarte, who has relieved Señor de Elizalde as minister of foreign affairs, and had thus ascertained the nature of Mr. Mitre y Vedia's note in question, which was nothing less than an official complaint against certain proceedings on the part of the American agents in the river Plate with regard to the offer made by the United States to mediate for the termination of the war waging between the allies and Paraguay, I hastened, in obedience to the instructions contained in your dispatch No. 39, to bring the subject before the Argentine government in an official note in the following terms:

No. 23.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Buenos Ayres, October 22, 1867.

SIR: I beg leave to inform your excellency that I have received from my government a communication which was addressed to the State Department at Washington on the 9th July ultimo, by Mr. B. Mitre y Vedia, chargé d'affaires of the Argentine Republic near the government of the United States of America. Introductory to this note, Mr. B. Mitre y Vedia says that, in accordance with instructions lately received, he intends to give in it some explanation relative to the conduct observed by the Argentine government on the mediation offered by the United States in the war with Paraguay, and at the same time to call the attention of the State Department to certain proceedings on the part of the American agents in the river Plate, which not only deviate from the usages and practices that regulate diplomacy, but which also compromise the impartial spirit which it was undoubtedly the intention of his excellency the President of the United States to give to the proffered mediation.

Well aware of the fact that your excellency is in possession of a copy of Mr. B. Mitre y Vedia's note in question, I deem it superfluous to give here its full contents, but will refer only to that portion of it which complains of the steps taken officially by me, as representative of the United States near the Argentine government, in the offer of mediation. That portion is as follows, viz:

"The Argentine government, after consulting together on the subject of the mediation initiated on the 4th January ultimo by the President of the United States of America, at the request of the House of Representatives, and after discussing the matter with its allies, communicated to Mr. A. Asboth, minister resident of the United States in Buenos Ayres, together with its expressions of gratitude, its regret at being obliged, by powerful motives, to decline the good offices of his government.

"But Mr. Asboth, perhaps animated by a strong desire to see the hopes of his own government fulfilled, and thinking that the declaration of the Argentine government was not sufficient to conclude the question, renewed his offer in a note dated the 10th of April.

"This step, under different circumstances, might have appeared as a laudable excess of zeal to see the termination of a strife which has already cost so many and such painful sacrifices; but it has been taken in so extraordinary a manner that my government has thought it its duty not to let it pass unnoticed.

"The American minister, in the dispatch alluded to, does not limit himself, as was to have been hoped, to insisting on the acceptance of his government's good offices and to making evident the advantages of peace, but has thought it proper to enter into appreciations with regard to the war, to home politics, to the state of public opinion and of the finances of the country, which he ought to have supposed had been duly studied and taken into consideration by the Argentine government.

"The Argentine government thinks that the minister of the United States did not require, in order to carry out his noble desire, to review the situation of the country, painting it in such dark colors as he does in the above-mentioned note. Were so unusual a proceeding to be passed over in silence, it would imply that Mr. Asboth, notwithstanding his very short residence in this country, was a better judge of its condition and necessities than the government elected by the people, and whose duty it is to be cognizant of that very condition and provide for those very necessities.

"Even admitting that the Argentine government was in the wrong, it surely would not belong to the diplomatic agent of a foreign nation to call its attention to the fact; the most ardent desire to promote the happiness and welfare of the country near whose government he might be accredited would not justify such a proceeding."

Further on Mr. Mitre y Vedia continues:

"The Argentine government, while desiring me to submit these remarks to your excellency's enlightened consideration, does not for an instant doubt that they will be received as a proof of its ardent desire to preserve unaltered the close bonds of friendship and sympathy which unite it with the government of the United States. It therefore confidently hopes that the United States government, which has given such signal proofs of the interest by which it is animated in not permitting that its agents should go beyond their assigned sphere of duty, will be able to give full credit to the justice of these remarks."

Such are the complaints, relative to my humble self, contained in Mr. Mitre y Vedia's communication, laid before my government pursuant to instructions received from Señor de Elizalde, your excellency's distinguished predecessor in office; and the Secretary of State instructs me, in his before-mentioned dispatch, that, in reply, he advised Mr. Mitre y Vedia "that the subject which he had presented could be treated of more profitably in Buenos Ayres than in Washington, and that instructions would be given to me for that purpose."

Accordingly, I was authorized and directed to put into the hands of Señor de Elizalde, then minister for foreign affairs, a copy of a dispatch, marked No. 36, previously addressed to me from the State Department at Washington, and to inform him, at the same time, "that the said dispatch No. 36 furnishes what the Secretary of State trusts will be a sufficient explanation of the views of the President concerning the matter brought to the attention of the State Department by Mr. Mitre y Vedia."

I am further instructed by my chief, the honorable Secretary of State, to say to Mr. Elizalde "that it is difficult to conduct a correspondence of mediation between belligerents without inadvertently giving offense to one or other of the parties, and that, considering that every care has been taken by the United States government to avoid misapprehension, the Secretary of State begs to be excused from entering unnecessarily into collateral discussion."

In obedience to these instructions, I have now the honor to append a full copy of the dispatch No. 36, with which I was honored by my government in reference to the note addressed by me on the 10th April ultimo, under No. 20, to Señor de Elizalde, requesting the reconsideration by the Argentine government of the mediation offered by the United States of America to the contending parties for the termination of the Parayan war and the restoration of peace in the countries washed by the river Plate and its tributaries, viz:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 27, 1867.

"SIR: Your dispatches of April 10, No. 20, and of April 12, No. 21, have been duly received and submitted to the President, together with the important documents accompanying the same. From these papers the President has learned with profound regret that the Argentine Republic disallows the propositions made by the United States to the several belligerents for the termination of hostilities and the restoration of peace in the valley of the Parana and its tributaries. I have carefully read the note which you addressed to Mr. Elizalde, on receiving his announcement of the decision of his government. What you have written in that note is very discreetly expressed, and is in entire harmony with the views of this government, since its proceedings have been inspired by a sincere friendship to all the South American states, and an earnest solicitude for the restoration of peace and harmony on the American continent. Your note is therefore approved.

"At the same time I think it proper to remind you that earnestness for the restoration of peace is not to be carried to the extent of invading the sovereignty or the dignity of the belligerents. Whether they would accept our well-intentioned and friendly good offices was left to their own intelligent free choice. Nothing could be further from the President's purpose than an idea of imposing any constraint or bringing any material pressure to bear upon that choice.

"Under these circumstances you will not be expected to press with undue importunity, at the present time, the tender of the good offices of this government to the Argentine Republic, or to that of Uruguay. Retaining the same attitude, however, you will wait further instructions, unless some new and unforeseen conjuncture shall seem to render it likely that our good offices will then have become more acceptable.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

"ALEXANDER ASBOTH, Esq., §c., §c., §c."

Having thus fulfilled the orders of my government, I beg leave to express to your excellency my deep regret that your distinguished predecessor in office should have thought it proper to complain to my government respecting a note of mine, which was dictated by the most sincere sympathies and best wishes for the vital interests of the Argentine Republic, and in reference to which the above dispatch of my chief, the honorable Secretary of State, says that all that I have written in it is very discreetly expressed, and is in entire harmony with the views of my government, since its proceedings have been inspired by a sincere friendship towards all the South American states, and an earnest solicitude for the restoration of peace on the American continent. Your excellency will appreciate the consoling gratification which I derived from so emphatic an approval by my government of all my action in the offer of mediation, and especially of my note complained of by Señor de Elizalde, the more so as the progress of events subsequent to my said note has fully demonstrated that all to which I therein alluded and referred relative to the internal affairs of the Argentine Republic was the true reflection of the sad reality.

In the confident belief and trust that, while your excellency continues to preside over the foreign affairs of the Argentine confederation, the representatives of a sister republic, the United States of America, will be spared similar misapprehensions, I seize the opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be your excellency's obedient servant,

A. ASBOTH.

His Excellency Dr. DON MARCELINO UGARTE,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

It was my endeavor to bring this lengthy note in accord with the instructions received from your department on the subject, and I beg leave to assure you, in conclusion, of my most grateful appreciation of the generous manner in which you were pleased fully to vindicate before the Argentine government my official action in the mediation question, assailed in Mr. Mitre y Vedia's note addressed to your department on the 9th July ultimo, pursuant to instructions received from Señor de Elizalde.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
-A. ASBOTH.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Asboth to Mr. Seward.

[Extract.]

No. 49.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, November 10, 1867.

SIR: In connection with my report No. 47, dated 14th October last, I have the honor to inform you that the French war steamer Decidée returned on the 4th instant from Paraguay, with Mr. Laurent Cochelet, late French consul at Asuncion. Mr. Cochelet brought me two dispatches from our minister at Paraguay, addressed to your department, which I beg to forward herewith.

* * * * *

At the seat of war there prevailed, during the last fortnight, unusual activity. The several battles fought were of the most sanguinary nature, indicating, evidently, an increased hatred and revenge, leading to mutual extermination, which, if persisted in, must necessarily soon result, on the part of Paraguay, in those unmistakable signs of final exhaustion which become, in the natural course of events, the fate of the weaker part.

The Standard of to-day, in its review for Europe, gives, as far as I am able to judge, an impartially correct statement of these military events in Paraguay, as well as of the advices received from the disturbed interior Argentine provinces, which I beg to submit here in the following extracts, viz:

REVIEW FOR EUROPE.

The military events of the fortnight are of a most stirring nature. Several sanguinary battles have been fought; the allies have advanced and are still advancing. The lines around Humaita are being slowly but steadily tightened, and the cause of Lopez each day becomes more desperate. The full details of all these engagements will be found in another column. The losses on both sides have been severe, but the allies have not only invariably held their ground, but have, after each encounter, advanced still further into the enemy's country. We await advices per next steamer of a powerful division at present traversing the enemy's country. Possibly ere this the important town of Villa Rica, and even the capital itself, Asuncion, have been occupied by the allies. As it is known that all the male population of the unfortunate country is centred in Humaita and in the interior, the allies will have nothing to contend with save the natural character of the country. The occupation of Asuncion will, doubtless, have a great moral effect on the Paraguayan people, and, unless Lopez is much stronger than is generally supposed, will lead to a prompt conclusion of this prolonged campaign. The last fight at Tuyuti was probably the most sanguinary since the war began. The Paraguayans fell upon Porto Alegre's encampment without the slightest warning. The surprise could hardly be more complete, and had the Paraguayan commander been able to restrain his men, the Brazilian position must have been inevitably lost; but the Paraguayans getting into the rear obtained possession of all the sutler's stores, army contractor's deposits, and the pillage was fearful. Porto Alegre, the Brazilian commander, who had been beaten back in the morning, with the eye of an experienced officer saw that the moment had arrived when he might strike the decisive blow and regain the day, and General Paranhos having come up with some reinforcements, they charged the enemy, who, completely disorganized by the pillage and plunder going on in the tents, could offer but a faint resistance. Paraguayans were cut down in the very tents which they had captured, and the day gained by the heroic Porto Alegre. Since this terrible fight we have received no new advices from Paraguay. Marshall Caxias has at last outflanked Humaita, and by holding Tayi, a commanding position on the river Tayi, cut off Lopez from Asuncion and the interior of Paraguay. On the same day that the terrible battle at Tuyuti took place, another sanguinary engagement occurred. The Paraguayans, landing from three steamers, attempted to take the place by storm, but they were repulsed with great loss and the steamers sunk.

Such constant fighting indicates that at last the campaign is drawing to a close, and from the position of the belligerents we feel justified in assuring our foreign readers that there is every probability peace will be restored in the Plate about the commencement of the new year.

Our advices from the Argentine provinces are a little more favorable; the rebels in Salta have been again defeated, and their leader is said to be prisoner. The mooted invasion from Chili has proved destitute of the slightest authenticity, and there can be little doubt on the conclusion of the Paraguayan war the provinces will acquire a more favorable aspect. Santa Fé is probably the only one of the provinces which shows signs of progress and vitality. Rosario is fast becoming the great centre of Argentine trade. The streets are being well paved, and will shortly be lighted with gas, the agent of the new company being at present in England purchasing the pipes and other material. A new line of railway is projected and being surveyed from Rosario to the Esperanza colony. This road will be private property, built by Sr. Cabal. Several important sales of real estate have been made during the month, but mostly city property. The speculation in building sites has considerably fallen off of late since the general impression is that Rosario will not be the future capital of the republic, and should Dr. Adolfo Alsina, the governor of Buenos Ayres, be elected president, which is every way probable, Buenos Ayres will, doubtless, remain the capital of the republic. The provisional chambers were formally closed last week, the legal period of the session having elapsed, but the governor has reassembled the legislators to dispatch some railway and other schemes of much importance.

THE WAR IN THE NORTH—SINBAD'S ACCOUNT OF THE LATE BATTLE.

CORRIENTES, November 5.

GENTLEMEN: I left Itapiru on the 1st instant, in order to be in time for the mail. On the 29th a formal fight took place at Potrero Obello, situated on the coast of the river Paraguay, between Pilar and Humaita. Mena Barreto, at the head of five thousand men of all arms, attacked and put to rout a superior force of Paraguayans. The published Brazilian account of the enemy's loss is seventy killed and thirty prisoners; the Brazilians own a loss of three hundred and two hors de combat. On the 2d instant a strong Brazilian force, under the same command, took possession of Tayi, routing ten battalions of the enemy protected by three steamers, which were sunk, their crews taken prisoners or drowned; one hundred and sixty are the reported numbers of the captives, and as many more killed or drowned. The allied statement of their loss is muy pocas. On the 3d a deplorable calamity befel the allies at Tuyuti. Early in the morning of that day a convoy was to have left the encampment for Tuyu-Cue, escorted by four battalions of Brazilian troops. The draught cattle were at hand, ready to be yoked; the escort was also prepared to move, waiting the order to march with the carts, when a great noise was heard in the encampment from numberless voices, such as gauchos are wont to make when driving a herd of cattle. Those who shouted were supposed to be conductors of a drove meant for the supply of the army, (this was in the gray of the morning;) the true character of the imagined drovers was not discovered until they had passed the lines and got within the intrenchments, when they were found to be many battalions of Paraguayan infantry and cavalry, who at once commenced a furious assault. The four battalions that were to have been the escort were the only troops ready at the moment to make resistance, which they stoutly but ineffectually did, with great slaughter. The enemy soon became master of the Tuyuti camp, (supposed to have a garrison of ten thousand men,) and doing a murderous work, killing without mercy, pillaging and firing everything that could burn. The sutlers' shanties after being sacked, the Argentine parque, hospital, and commissariat, the large depot of Mr. Lanuz, (who has suffered severely,) the convoy of loaded carts—in fine, I have said, all that would burn were committed to the flames. The Paraguayans for a time did pretty much as they liked, owing to a general panic throughout the encampment. The fire and fight continued until 9 a. m., when the approach of a column, under the command of Osorio, made it advisable for the Paraguayans to retreat, which they did, carrying away, some accounts state, from two to twelve pieces of artillery; other reports make the number of guns carried off to be twenty-eight, as well as a number of prisoners. Mr. Vigari, the purser of the Pingo, was at the camp in three hours after the enemy retreated; he estimated the number, (made at a cursory view,) he said, to be one thousand five hundred. The road going from Tuyuti to Itapiru was filled with Brazilian soldiers, fugitives, who threw away their guns and knapsacks to facilitate their flight; they never halted in their race till they reached the shipping. Hundreds of these were subsequently collected and sent back to Tuyuti. What else might be expected from new recruits, slaves fresh from plantations, many of whom would as soon be shot at as to fire a musket themselves? The number of Paraguayans killed are much more than those of the allies, owing to their conduct while sacking, by getting helplessly drunk, thus made incapable in the retreat to keep pace with their comrades. When the panic was over, little mercy was shown to the inebriated assailants. Among the wounded officers brought here is Major Tobson, who had his arm badly shattered, which has since been amputated.

The routed sutlers from Tuyuti complain of the Brazilian soldiers making a final finish of such goods as the Paraguayans or the flames had spared. Bad stories are told of the Paraguayan legion in the allied service. At the time of the surprise they were posted at an advanced point; it is reported that, instead of giving notice of the enemy's coming, most of them joined their countrymen. Some Correntino troops are also reported to have behaved in a like manner. Nothing more is said for the present of the cholera—a proof that it has passed away. There have been two arrivals of hay. A Brazilian transport with a contingent passed upward yesterday. The river is rapidly rising.

Yours, truly,

SINBAD.

We refer our readers to our friend Sinbad's version of the Tuyuti victory. With all the different accounts before us it is difficult to arrive at the truth in regard either to the object or result of the late vigorous attack of Paraguayans. But the prominent facts are that there are grave suspicions of treachery in the allied outposts; that Lopez's attack meant more perhaps than a raid on the stores of the allies; but to the fact of the Paraguayans stumbling on the liquors they owe their own defeat. The Brazilian officers, particularly Paranhos, Mattos, and Andrade, appear to have behaved like heroes.

The Argentine and Correntino cavalry, under General Hornos, contributed nobly to the final retreat of the enemy, and Hornos was made brigadier on the spot by General Mitre. The loss in men to Lopez, if not amounting to two thousand five hundred as reported, must have been sufficiently severe in his present circumstances, and probably the main object of the attack was frustrated; which was to prepare a more serious attempt on Tuyu-Cue.

For further particulars, I beg respectfully to refer to my inclosed daily memoranda of political events on the river Plate, marked D.

The fate threatening at the present crisis the unfortunate country and people of Paraguay is certainly of the most melancholy nature. Paraguay would seem to be morally, politically, and materially on the verge of ruin and bereft of all hope of any friendly powers being able to save it from the horrors of the wildest anarchy.

In case Lopez should lose Asuncion, this capital would no doubt be destroyed by himself or by his orders, it being his determined policy to leave nothing but ruins in the hands of the allies. In such an emergency not only would all property in the capital be lost, but the lives of the inhabitants, especially of foreigners, would be seriously endangered—exposed as they would be either to the fury of the retreating Paraguayan bands of the interior, who consider all foreigners the enemies and invaders of their country, or to the bayonets of the Brazilian soldiers, who for the most part just emerging from slavery, if once in power, could hardly be restrained from robbery and butchery.

The interior of Paraguay would not, and, desolated as it must be, could not afford any support to Lopez after his prestige had gone with his defeat, neither would it be any safe shelter to the hated fugitive foreigners.

Under these circumstances the foreigners in Paraguay can look only to their respective governments for protection, and it would be very desirable that the war steamers of all the foreign powers represented here, in Buenos Ayres, should afford such protection to their distressed countrymen in that country.

I had the honor respectfully to request in my report No. 29, under date June 17th, 1867, that a warsteamer be temporarily placed at my disposal with reference to the present complications in Paraguay, and should this request be granted I should at the present emergency feel bound in duty to station it near the blockading squadron, with the view to join the first Brazilian ship of war up to Asuncion, and to give full protection to our minister and fellow-citizens there, as well as, in the interests of humanity, to any other foreigner whose life and property were jeopardized in the only too probable sway of anarchy.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. ASBOTH.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DAILY MEMORANDA OF POLITICAL EVENTS IN THE RIVER PLATA, FROM OCTOBER 13 TO NOVEMBER 9, 1867.

October 13.—The Tribuna of to-day says:

"The extracts from a correspondence of the Semanario we publish in another column show that in Lopez's own ranks there is a prevalent conviction of the speedy termination of the war. Although this correspondent expects it will be brought about by a victory of our enemy's arms, it is easy to perceive that these are only consolatory words, indicating the last flicker of the light that is going out."

October 14.—According to the budget of the Argentine finance minister a sum of 1,000,000 hard dollars has been voted for public works, and $500,000 for contingent expenses.

A Brazilian steamer has arrived at Montevideo laden with arms and ammunition for the forces in Paraguay.

October 15.—The Diario, the official organ in Rio Janeiro, formally contradicts the statement that Colonel Fonseca was the bearer of the proposals of peace, consequent upon the attempted mediation of Mr. Gould, the British secretary of legation.

The Tribuna of to-day devotes several of its columns to the publication of documents connected with the proposed extension to Mendoza of the present Western railway, which now only reaches a place called Chirileoy, about thirty leagues from Buenos Ayres, and eventually across the Cordillera of the Andes by the Planchon Pass to the Pacific coast. The idea of connecting the interior provinces to the littoral by means of a railway has been lately seriously entertained, but some people wish it to be a prolongation of the Central Argentine from Villanueva, whilst others are anxious that it should be a continuation of the Buenos Ayres Western railway. The Buenos Ayres provincial government, jealous of the influence and importance Rosario would acquire if the former project were carried out, are straining every nerve in support of the latter project, and are ready to subscribe a considerable part of the capital necessary for an undertaking that will connect this city by a direct line of railway with the interior provinces, and eventually with Chili.

October 16.—The Espigador, arrived yesterday, brought dates from the seat of war to the 11th instant. A partial encounter between the Brazilian vanguard and a body of Paraguayan cavalry took place on the 4th, in which the latter were repulsed. Cholera is making fearful ravages in both camps, and up to the 11th there had been among the Argentine forces three hundred cases of cholera, of which one hundred had proved fatal. General Dominguez, Colonel Artiz, and other officers, had fallen victims to the epidemic. The disease is likely to be aggravated by the reported refusal of Lopez to allow the dead bodies on the field of the late encounter to be buried, and to grant an armistice for that humane purpose. The following extracts from the Standard's correspondent at the seat of war give fuller details of the last action, and also of the ravages of cholera:

"ITAPIRU, October 11, 1867.

"GENTLEMEN: On the 4th a partial fight took place between Arroyo Hondo and Huaita. About six regiments of Paraguayan cavalry issued from their intrenchments evidently for the purpose of pasturing their horses, which are in a miserable condition. They were not, however, allowed to continue this peaceful operation.

"The Brazilian vanguard, under Rivas, divided in two bodies; one proceeded to attack them, whilst the other remained in ambush. The attacking party made a sham retreat, drawing out the Paraguayans, who closely followed the supposed flying enemy until they came beyond the troops in ambush. The latter sallying out completely routed them, and pursued them to the trenches of Humaita, killing six hundred and taking two hundred prisoners. The allied loss is officially stated to be one hundred killed and wounded. The customary cannonade was kept up in the direction of Carupaí during the night with redoubled fury, the Paraguayans doubtless smarting from their recent defeat.

"October 9.—The cholera in a malignant form is making fearful havoc in Tuyuti; it entered first into the battalion of Pipo, (known as the foreign legion,) where it remained fixed for a few days, it then spread to the rest of the first corps d'armée with much virulence. Three days ago it commenced with great violence in the second corps, which had until then been exempt, causing very great loss in officers (among their numbers are Dominguez, Benites, and a long list of others) and men. In the first corps yesterday's account says that it is somewhat diminishing, but continues gaining force in the second. The Brazilians also have it diffusely spreading on all sides. It is known to be making ravages in the Paraguayan camp; it is supposed that from thence the contagion was communicated to Tuyuti. Persons well qualified to judge are of an unanimous opinion that a few days or perhaps hours to come the pestilence will be doing its work of destruction here. What else might be expected from a miscellaneous population, composed of military, inmates of hospitals, boatmen, sutlers, peons, or dissolute women, the greater part of whom have always been accustomed to live among dirt, eating lean tired meat or any trash, drinking impure water, sleeping in damp places surrounded by puddles of mud, and yet feel no inconvenience from this method of living."

The following Paraguayan version of the fall of Pilar seems sufficiently interesting to merit insertion:

"THE FALL OF PILAR—PARAGUAYAN VERSION."

"CAMP OF PASO PUCU, September 21, 1867.

"We understand that numbers of vessels are lying off the mouth of the river awaiting the arrangement of peace to bring their valuable cargoes; but the most important item on this head is that after Mr. Gould's visit to the enemy the Marquis Caxais dispatched his chief of staff to Rio in the swiftest boat, the San Paulo, with instructions to proceed direct without touching at any port and return within twenty-two days. This gave rise to the report in Corrientes that the San Paulo was bearer of peace propositions, and that the war was terminated. As I do not know how far true this may be, I confine myself to the simple rumors current here since the arrival of the English gunboat Doterel, in search of Mr. Secretary Gould, then our guest. Without questioning the authenticity of these rumors, which probably emanate from the desires of the enemy and the kind offices of a disinterested friend, I may be permitted to express my private conviction that no peace can be arrived at before some great and decisive feat of arms has taken place; in other words, notwithstanding the sentiment of the belligerents and the good will of our mutual friends, 'peace just now is very improbable,' for our haughty enemy, not yet brought to a full sense of his impotency, will always be throwing some ambitious hints in the way, thus rendering the conditions quite unacceptable to a noble, patriotic people.

"The latest deserters to us report the enemy suffering frightfully from hunger. Our victorious legions have cut off the supplies, and so hard pushed are the Brazilians now that dried hides are sparingly distributed among them as rations. This stupid predicament it was which impelled them to make the most hopeless movement of the 19th. At daybreak on that auspicious day we observed a strong body of horse advance from San Solano toward the Arroyo Hondo. It was in reality nothing more than a foraging raid, an oft-repeated attempt to cut off our supplies. Not succeeding, they pushed on to Pilar, which they attacked the same evening, but were driven off with great slaughter; but if unable for us in arms they are our superiors in limbs; otherwise many more must have fallen in the retreat; as it was, the most our victors could lay hold of were the disregarded clothes, weapons, &c., &c.

"This slight action, in displaying the cowardice of the enemy and the certain triumph of determined valor, ought to have inspired our men against any odds. Unfortunately it had a different effect. The brave garrison, while regaling themselves after victory, made but little allowance for the pangs of hunger on the half-starved imperialists.

"With the morning the enemy returned to the charge, and quickly wrested victory from the disordered ranks of the defenders. They were not destined to enjoy long the fruits of victory. Commander Saturnino Garcia, coming up in the Birabebe, opened fire on the enemy, and compelled them to evacuate the town. At first the Brazilians manifested a decided disinclination to stir until the valiant Garcia landed, at the head of fifty marines, and charged the hostile masses then engaged pillaging. The gunboat meantime kept up a brisk fire, one shell bursting into the Brazilian general's coach. At sight of this the streets became suddenly cleared of the marauders, except such as had already fallen victims to their valor; but the real difficulty was to root them out of the houses, where they had stowed themselves in every hole and corner, to escape the fall of their comrades below.

"Lieutenant Galon has behaved well, and merits the decorations with which our Marshal President has been pleased to requite him. To his determination and valor the country owes this glorious victory, the inhabitants their property, and the enemy a memorable defeat. While I write, the enemy are scouring the country some leagues off. I would not give them much for their chance of getting anything in those sterile wastes; and after all the loss of men, horses, and honor, they will return as hungry as they came.

"Marshal Lopez's plan has been supremely strategic, for, by surrounding the enemy with our trenches, there is no way left for him but to march through boundless deserts, or, by remaining as he is, to be decimated by our guns or disease. Such is the history of the whole campaign, and with the failure of the exploring expedition we may hope the allied commanders will change the tactics, and by trying their fortune in our trenches give us an opportunity of creating in our country's history another day like that of Curupaity."

October 17.—The mail from Rosario yesterday brought news that the alarm about cholera has led to sanitary regulations, special committees having been named and every precautionary measure possible adopted.

In Montevideo, also, urgent steps have been taken by the municipal board to protect the city against the possible approach of cholera. In Buenos Ayres alone nothing has been done, and the press clamors loudly for all vessels coming from the seat of war to be placed in quarantine.

October 18.—The provincial senate of Buenos Ayres has passed the bill for the Mendoza railway, in prolongation of the Buenos Ayres western railway. By this bill it is proposed to raise the funds necessary for this great undertaking by the emission of six per cent. provincial bonds at seventy-five. The bill goes now before the deputies, where it is rumored the measure is likely to meet with some opposition.

The Standard of to-day says:

"The steady arrival of Brazilian transports in Montevideo, with reinforcements for the army, shows that the Rio cabinet is straining every nerve to carry on the war with redoubled vigor. Within the last four days four transports have arrived."

October 19.—There is no further news from the seat of war, but the Standard has the following relative to a new difficulty which the Paraguayans have to contend against, viz: want of salt:

"Our own advices from Paraguay are of a character which inspires a conviction in the immediate termination of war. The great want in Paraguay is salt. Some of the English doctors in Paraguay have now a splendid opportunity of gathering the most interesting data in this respect. Salt seems to be as necessary to life as air; disease and sickness defeat all skill, owing to the primary want of salt. Extraordinary diseases are said to exist in Paraguay, owing to the want of salt."

From the time that the national government withdrew its subsidy from the Nacion Argentina, which at once began a series of attacks on the private life of Vice-President Paz, a fierce polemic has been raging between that paper and the Tribuna. On this subject the Standard makes the following remarks:

"The wars of the roses were nothing in comparison to the tremendous battle between the Tribuna and Nacion. Few of our readers take any interest in such intensely political subjects; in fact, none but a native would understand them. The gist of the question is to make out Don Marcos Paz the head rebel in the republic. The Nacion has each day powerful articles and fiery leaders, impeaching the vice-president. The Tribuna takes up cudgels for the government and replies. Each day the attack and rejoinder are becoming more and more acrimonious. The Americans have a very apt expression for such matters—'fighting for spoils.' The only possible result for such a polemic is the disclosure of much scandal which, for many reasons, it is desirable to avoid."

The same paper publishes in its to-day's number the following relative to the rebel movements in Salta:

"REBEL MOVEMENTS IN SALTA.

"SALTA, September 15.

"The traitors, Varela and Elizondo, are sacking the country in all directions. Nothing escapes the lawless marauders. Everything portable is swept off to the Chilian markets, and such as cannot be conveniently moved are destroyed on the spot. We live in a perfect chaos; but what else can be expected, when the place is entirely in the hands of banditti? The inhabitants are powerless, and the government takes no steps to prevent the depredations; so that Varela, with a dozen men, may at any moment take the capital, and then God help the unfortunate citizens, the most resolute of whom have long since learned the utter futility of attempting any resistance.

"About the middle of August we heard of the arrival of Varela, and the government at once dispatched a force under Don Pepe Frias to confront him. This gentleman spoke in such a pompous manner of whipping the rebels, even did they muster double their actual strength, that our authorities were content to trust all to his honor, without taking any measures for possible emergencies. On the 31st ultimo we received intelligence that a party of three hundred montoneros, under Elizondo, had routed a corps of seven hundred, led by the redoubtable Frias. The disgrace of the defeat was heightened by the shameful nature of the fight. On the approach of the enemy Frias displayed the most cowardly indecision, neither forming to receive or attack; the men were impatient to meet the foe, but Frias assured them 'twas no use, as odds were too heavy against them, and that their only chance lay in flight. Some add that he was bribed to this. Certain it is that he returned to this city without his corps, and endeavored to raise another; but as we had already lost seven hundred men, with a large quantity of arms and ammunition, the authorities did not like to trust themselves again to Mr. Frias; so seizing all the fighting materials they could lay their hands on, they enrolled all the men, about four hundred in number, and marched off for Tucuman—governor, ministers, (with their families and treasurer,) and all, leaving only women and children in the town. In this way we awaited for their return with Tucumanos, but they are not forthcoming, and there is nothing for it but that the women and infirm left shall perch themselves on the house-tops, and assail the rebels when they come, with broken bottles, stones, boiling water and oil."

October 20.—In noticing the attacks made upon Dr. Rawson, minister of the interior, by the press of Buenos Ayres, which, while criticising his public acts, have outstepped the limits of fair discussion by imputing to him interested motives, the Standard of to-day says:

"Although we make it our general rule to abstain as much as possible from taking any part in local politics, we cannot avoid noticing with sincere regret the very unbecoming manner in which the leading organs of the Liberal press here treat our distinguished minister, Dr. Rawson. We must emphatically deprecate the disparaging insinuations touching the private motives of a gentleman who is not only devoting his time and energies to the service of his country, but whose character has ever enjoyed a spotless reputation. Dr. Rawson's chief fault in the eyes of his countrymen is his pedigree, and this alone would entitle him to a prior claim on our support; but, independently from this, we can assure him that whilst we are ever fearless in denouncing abuses, we also pride ourselves in being foremost in doing justice where justice is due, and that in the name of our country we shall ever be too glad to bear our testimony to his liberal and enlightened policy, which entitles him to the rank of one of the most distinguished and disinterested of Argentine statesmen."

October 21.—The Cisne and Rosa steamers, from Corrientes, have been placed under sanitary surveillance for three days, and only the mails brought by them, after being duly fumigated, have been allowed to be landed.

October 22.—The news from the seat of war is of no great importance. Cholera had diminished in the Argentine camp, but was still prevalent among the Brazilians.

The national government has ordered the formation of two lazarettos, with their proper staff of medical attendants, &c.: one in the island of Martin Garcia, and the other at the Tigre, the terminus of the northern railway on one of the channels of the Parana River.

The documents connected with the resignation of General Martinez of the post of minister of war are published to-day. It appears that the general addressed a letter to the vice-president from Rosario, dated 24th of September, shortly after his liberation from the hands of the rebels in Cordova, tendering his resignation, which was not attended to. On his arrival in Buenos Ayres he addressed a second note to the vice-president, under date of the 9th instant, insisting upon his previously announced determination to resign. The vice-president, after having ineffectually endeavored to induce him to alter his mind, was obliged to accept the general's resignation. In the note which Minister Rawson addresses, under date of the 19th instant, to General Martinez, informing him that his resignation has been accepted, he expresses the lively regret of the vice-president at the loss of his services, for which he tenders to the general the best thanks of government.

Señor Don José Maria Moreno, the present under-secretary for the war department, who has been acting minister during General Martinez's protracted absence, has been offered the vacant portfolio, which he, however, is said to have preemptorily refused.

October 23.—The steamer Wasiman has arrived in Montevideo, having on board a locomotive engine and other railway materials, destined for a railway which the Brazilians are about to construct between Tuyuti and Tuyu-Cué, in Paraguay.

October 24.—The Provender arrived yesterday from Corrientes; brings no news of interest from the seat of war, save that the cholera appears to be greatly on the decline. It was rumored that an important movement was about to be made by the allies on Tayi, an important position on the river Paraguay, above Humaita.

The following correspondence, translated from the Republica, contains some interesting information relative to the Brazilian iron-clads:

"LETTERS FROM THE SEAT OF WAR—THE IRON-CLADS—HUMAITA.

"On the 9th I started from Tuyu-Cué, and on the morning of the 10th I arrived at Tuyuti; from there I went to the Paso de la Patria, and embarked at 1 o'clock in the afternoon for the island of Avisto. Then I put myself on board a small steamer which took me to the Princess de Joinville, bearing the flag of Commodore Elisario de Santos, who had the politeness to place at my disposal a steam launch, which carried me to the Chaco by the river Quio. At the expiration of one hour I found myself landed at the port of Quio, where Admiral Joaquín José Ignacio has established a depot of provisions and munitions of war. From the port of Quio I rode to Elisario, on the Paraguay. The distance between these ports is about six miles. At Elisario is stationed the second division of iron-clads, under the command of Commodore Albin. Thence to Humaita the distance is about one league. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon I went in the steam tender Lindoya to the Colombo, which is stationed between the first and second divisions of the fleet. At 4.30 we anchored alongside of the Brazil, which I boarded to pay my respects to the admiral.

"Admiral Ignacio appears to me to be about sixty years of age. He is of low stature, and has all the rough but frank characteristics of an old salt. The admiral did all in his power to facilitate the object of my mission, which was to make a nearer examination of the fortress, whose name is now so famous. The first division of iron-clads is anchored about three hundred yards from the London battery, which is the first that presents itself after rounding the elbow of the river. The iron-clad Bahia is stationed about two hundred and thirty yards from the same battery, which is rectangular in shape, and has eight casemated embrasures on each side. The Bahia is under the enemy's fire. The Lynch battery crosses its fire with the sixteen guns of the London battery in the first bend of the channel. The water being low, a sand bank is visible in the middle of the river in front of the batteries, and we can discover three recently made roads leading to the river from behind the Lynch battery. Any vessel attempting to force a passage would have to sail within ten yards of the Paraguayan batteries, receiving on the beam the fire of the eight guns of the London battery parallel to the river, whilst ahead she would be exposed to the fire of the Lynch and three other batteries to the north, and to the horizontal fire of the London battery from astern; and not only that, for if she touched the chain laid obliquely across the river she would swing on to the bank with the current, and remain a helpless target for the enemy's artillery. The channel of Humaita is now so low that all the pilots are agreed that the iron-clad Brazil from the breadth of beam would be unable to maneuver or obey her helm with sufficient rapidity to get through a pass not more at this moment than forty rods wide. The channel is not only obstructed by sunken ships, but to the naked eye there is distinctly visible a whole line of torpedoes. The squadron is daily employed, it is true, in fishing them up, but this does not much diminish the danger. Your readers may have often asked, why do they not cut the chain? A few words will convince them of the impossibility of doing so at a spot upon which the seven batteries of Humaita converge, and watched, moreover, by a guard on the Chaco. The Chaco is swampy, and the whole extent of its banks, with the exception of the place where the guard is stationed, is protected by the guns of Humaita. To attempt to capture the guard and cut the chains with boats' crews, under the fire of the batteries, is simply an impossibility. The vessels in the vanguard have fired at the obstruction with cannon, but as it contains no wood-work the balls glance off and harmlessly bury themselves in the river or the mud banks.

"For a long time past men competent in the art of war, and distinguished naval men of all nations, have been of opinion that the fortress of Humaita was impregnable. It is thus unjust to accuse the Brazilian iron-clad squadron of failing in its duties, for, on the contrary, it is little less than rash to expose the Bahia within pistol-shot, as she now is, of the enemy's fortress.

"As for the effects of the bombardment from the squadron, it is known positively that it has caused considerable injury and losses to the enemy. On the 12th instant the squadron bombarded Humaita, and the division abreast of Curuzú directed its fires on the headquarters at Paso Pucu, where, upon the same day, there happened to be on a visit Messrs. De Couverville and De Libertad.

"REPUBLICA."

The annexed extract, translated from the Comercio del Parana, an Entre Riano newspaper, leads one to believe that the allies cannot boast much of their reputed victories over the Paraguayans:

"I am quite certain you have all heard of the grand victories we have obtained in the last few days. Oh, what victories! Precisely like all the rest we have obtained upon the present, costing as dear as that of the 24th September, and the taking of Pilar, the former of which cost the Brazilians some twenty-five hundred men, and the latter not much less. A friend who writes to me from Tuyuti says: 'I was present at that massacre, for I can call it nothing else. The engagement was brought about by the Paraguayans endeavoring to rescue forty-four prisoners taken at Pilar. A regiment of allied cavalry in attacking the enemy fell into a pantano or swamp, their ammunition got wet, and the whole of them remained at the mercy of the foe.

"In Tuyuti there exists the most frightful misery among the Brazilians, who are, as you may probably have heard, the best cared for. I do not exaggerate in telling you that not only are they reduced to begging from the shopkeepers in the camp, but from the passers by. It seems that our respectable allies, the gentry of the Chaco, are reappearing on the scene. Three days ago I met a party of them, Guaicurus. It consisted of a lieutenant, armed with a saber, two sergeants, with muskets, and five rank and file, with long knives. I had the curiosity to ask the chief where he was going, and with indescribable coolness, he answered, 'to Humaita.' Great hopes we must have of reducing the fortress with such contingents.

"Notwithstanding the unfavorable result of the first negotiations for peace, there are many who believe that the negotiations will be resumed."

The Standard to day gives the accompanying item of news from the seat of war. The scarcity of meat, both in the allied and Paraguayan camp, seems to be a fact beyond doubt:

"By a private letter from the army we learn that, owing to the prevalence of cholera, coffee and caña are now given to the Brazilian soldiers. The meat is so poor that officers and men, for the most part, live on biscuits, rice, and farina. The Brazilian hospitals are well cared for, and upon a splendid footing. The allied strength in Tuyuti is twelve thousand Brazilians and two thousand Argentines, including the Paraguayan legion."

October 25.—The last news received from the provinces respecting Juan Saa is of a less alarming character. It appears that this celebrated rebel leader has found no support and little sympathy in Bolivia, and well-informed parties give the assurance that the Argentine republic has nothing to fear from Bolivia.

General Paunero, who applied some time ago and obtained leave from the government to absent himself from his command, and come to Buenos Ayres on account of a family affliction, but would not avail himself of it until affairs in the interior were in a more settled state, is now preparing to return, and it is rumored that he is likely to be appointed to the vacant post of minister of war.

The following extract from the Standard, giving the number of vessels aground in the Parana River, proves the difficulties in navigating its waters:

"Vessels aground in the Parana—17th.—A Brazilian gunboat, with some troops on board, was aground some fifteen leagues below Corrientes, cargo trimmed to port to assist to get her off.

"18th. There are a great many vessels aground below Goya. American bark T. C. Cushing, Captain Rogers, laden with horses, is aground below Yaquarite, on the left bank of the river.

"19th. The British bark Quickstep and British brig Adelaide were at anchor at La Paz, having no water to pass the shallows.

"20th. An Italian gunboat under sail was passed, just above Rosario, proceeding down the river.

"21st. British brig Albion, of Liverpool, was at the Boca Guarzu, bound for Liverpool; British three-masted schooner, E. Shun, was at anchor on the bar below Martín García.

There are about thirty sailing vessels aground or at anchor waiting for water between La Paz and Goya."

October 26.—The question of the future presidency of the Argentine Republic is every day more and more engaging the attention of the public. The local papers both in this city and in the rest of the confederation devote a great deal of their space to this important subject. The Tribuna, which is undoubtedly the most influential organ of the River Plata press, has boldly proclaimed Señor Sarmiento as its candidate, whilst the Nación Argentina attacks this candidate without openly proposing any other, although it is well known that it is determined to support Señor Elizalde's pretensions. The press of Entre Rios, as was to have been expected, is unanimous in writing in favor of General Urquiza, as the fittest candidate for the presidency. Besides these there are other names that have been mentioned as likely to be brought forward as competitors for the highest magistracy in the republic, such as Señor Alsina, governor of Buenos Ayres, Señor Velez Sarsfield, Dr. Rawson, General Taboada, and others. Of these, however, only the first is believed to have any chance of success. Indeed, it has been asserted and very currently repeated that the Tribuna is only using the name of Señor Sarmiento as a mask, and that its candidate in reality is Governor Alsina. Nothing, however, has appeared that could substantiate this assertion. On the contrary, the Tribuna evinces every day more zeal in defending Señor Sarmiento's cause. In its number of yesterday, it published a letter addressed to its editor by Colonel Mansilla from the allied camp, a translation of which is given below. Colonel Mansilla, although a nephew of the celebrated dictator Rosas, is an influential member of the liberal party, and has succeeded in establishing for himself a high reputation, not only as a brave soldier and good officer, but also as an accomplished writer. His advocating, therefore, so warmly Señor Sarmiento's nomination cannot fail to have considerable weight; and the statement he moreover makes that Sarmiento is the favorable candidate in the army, if true, is of considerable significance. Colonel Mansilla's letter to the editor of the Tribuna is as follows:

"CAMP TUYU-CUÉ, October 20, 1867.

"You are aware, ever since I was in Buenos Ayres, that my candidate for the future presidency of the republic is the same as the Tribuna's—Sarmiento. For the honor and glory of our country the man whom I pointed out as the ideal candidate, when we talked over the subject, is becoming every day more a possible, a real candidate. I, who do not insult you by harboring the supposition that you advocate this candidate insincerely, and who, in my sphere, and within the compass of my limited resources, am working for it and anxious for its success by means analogous to the end and to the principles it symbolizes, am happy to inform you that our candidate can rely upon the support and sympathy of many of our most notable officers in the army, who are all individually ready to work for him.

"By and by, I will write to you more at length on this subject. In the meantime, I am anxious that this letter should be published.

"Yours, truly,

October 27.—A fraud involving the loss to government of the rather large sum of seven millions of paper dollars ($280,000) has been discovered in the custom-house here. The authors appear to have been one or two employés of the custom-house in league with several clerks of different commercial houses of high standing and respectability in this city. The matter is under judicial investigation, but the guilty parties are said to have escaped before their evil doings were discovered.

The news brought by the last mail from the interior provinces shows that tranquility is far from having been restored. The Tribuna publishes a letter dated Santiago, 15th instant, announcing that official intelligence had just been received of the rebel chief Varela having attacked the town of Salta and taken it after a short resistance. Although General Navarro hurried up with a respectable force and obliged the rebels to abandon the city only a few hours afterwards, Varela and his men committed unheard-of excesses in the few hours they remained in Salta, murdering and pillaging its inhabitants and carrying off an enormous booty.

The Banda Oriental seems also to be on the eve of new troubles. The papers report that a certain Colonel Aparicio, one of the principal leaders of the Blanco party, has crossed from Entre Rios to the left margin of the Uruguay, somewhere between Paysanda and Salta, accompanied by a few followers, with the avowed intention of raising the standard of revolt against General Flores's government. It is also reported that General Urquiza and the Entre Rios government have endeavored to frustrate Colonel Aparicio's expedition, and given timely warning of it to the authorities of Paysanda.

October 28.—The news of Colonel Aparicio's intended invasion of the Banda Oriental, communicated from here by telegraph to Montevideo, has caused there considerable excitement. It is, however, believed that the move is an isolated attempt, which, if discountenanced by General Urquiza, will be easily put down.

October 29.—The regular steamer from Corrientes, due yesterday, did not arrive, and there is in consequence a dearth of news to-day.

The Standard has the following in regard to Colonel Aparicio:

"Yesterday we heard that Aparicio is one of the greatest Blanco Caudillos of the day. He it was who, when Flores entered Montevideo in 1865, made a great raid into Rio Grande, carried off prisoners of war, and liberated slaves by the hundred. Respecting his pedigree there is much obscurity; at an humble mud rancho on the wayside in the Florida district, it appears, he first saw light. He has figured in most of the unhappy broils of his country. Profound political observers regard him as the creature, the tool, of others, who, now that the elections are approaching, find it convenient to have him running about the country. What truth there may be in this version it is difficult to say; but the calling out of the national guards is inevitable, as is also the result of the elections under such circumstances."

October 30.—The Espigador steamer from Corrientes arrived yesterday, and brought the news of some partial fighting in Paraguay, in which the allies, as usual, according to their own account, have obtained another success. The following is the Standard's version, which agrees with what is given by the other papers:

"SUCCESS OF THE ALLIES.

"The following telegram was received from the Tigre yesterday, at 3.15 p. m.: On the morning of the 21st instant a Brazilian ambuscade, composed of three divisions of cavalry, on the right of the line of the allies, surprised eight hundred Paraguayans, taking two hundred prisoners and killing three hundred. The Brazilians lost seventy to eighty, rank and file, and one cornet killed and one captain wounded.

"On the same morning, on the left of the line, an Argentine ambuscade, composed of two divisions of cavalry, were hotly engaged with the enemy; and at the moment when victory was still doubtful, Colonel Videla arrived with a squadron of the 3d regiment of cavalry, which charged furiously, completely defeating the Paraguayans, who left eighty dead on the field. The Argentine loss was sixteen rank and file and three officers wounded and one officer killed. At the last moment it was reported that a picket of one hundred men, with its commander, had passed over to the Argentine camp."

The Tribuna of to-day publishes a long letter of Señor Hector S. Varela, co-proprietor of that paper, from Paris, giving an account of a brilliant speech made by him at the peace congress, held at Geneva, in defense of republican institutions, and more particularly of the United States and the republics of South America, which had been virulently attacked by a M. Dupasquier.

From Cordova the news of Governor Luque's resignation is confirmed. It appears that when he sent it in to the legislature the latter showed some disinclination to accept it, and Governor Luque then informed that body that he had delegated the governorship into the hands of a Señor Peña, an extreme liberal, until his successor should be duly elected.

October 31.—With reference to the last news from the seat of war, the following letter of the Standard's correspondent contains some interesting details:

"THE WAR IN THE NORTH.

"CORRIENTES, October 25, 1867.

"GENTLEMEN: All I can communicate with certainty respecting the last battle is that the Paraguayans sought the combat and got worsted, leaving four hundred killed or badly hurt, and two hundred prisoners. The allied loss is reported to have been very insignificant. Other versions state the loss on either side to be nearly equal. Caxias was to have marched from Tuyu-Cué on the 24th to take a position at Tayi. It is not known here if he has effected the desired purpose. If he can accomplish it, and maintain himself at that point, the reduction of Humaita must soon follow. The cholera is on the decline at the different encampments; still it is far from being extinct. Every precaution is being taken to prevent the further spread of the plague. The sale of all conserves, no matter if of flesh, fruit, or fish, is strictly prohibited. Due attention is given to cleanliness, while all care is bestowed on those that are convalescent; four and five patácones are paid for fowls for the sick. At Itapiru measures are in progress to remove the garbage. Here no preventive steps will be thought of until the plague is widely disseminated, when 'saue qui peut' will be the watchword—people flying in all directions to escape perdition. Till now the authorities and denizens in general are indifferent as to what may come—Brazilian gold absorbing every other consideration. An extensive conflagration of hay has been going on at Isla de Itapiru for the past three days; many hundreds of bales, said to be the property of Mr. Dufour, have been consumed. It is supposed to have been purposely set on fire, which is probable, as the flames, when first discovered, were seen to issue from different parts of the pile. The loss is a serious one, as much of the provender was in a sound condition. Holders of the article here, since the fire, have advanced their prices.

"Yesterday the steamer Paysauder passed upwards, with a brig in tow; both vessels were loaded with horses. Other remittances of horses are daily arriving at Paso de la Patria from all parts of this province, as well as Entre Rios, notwithstanding the prohibitory decree. Most of the animals are stolen ones. However, few questions are asked as to how the sellers became possessed of the horses. The brute, as soon as sold, has its ear clipped, which at once determines the ownership in an indisputable manner. It is to be hoped the allies will bestir themselves and bring the wretched war to a conclusion, now that they have a good supply of sound horses, in all respects fit for the campaign, while those of the enemy are known to be utterly unfit for service. The Sisters of Mercy have arrived, and proceeded to their destination. Here has been a large sale of every description of goods; the value of the amount sold was 55,000 patácones. Many of the articles sold would have brought more in Buenos Ayres.

"I remain yours, truly,

"SINBAD."

Colonel Aparicio, whose invasion of the Banda Oriental has been already alluded to, appears to have retraced his steps and crossed over again to Entre Rios territory. He has been subsequently arrested at Concordia by the jefe politico of that department, Don Justo Carmen Urquiza.

November 1.—The following, relative to proceedings in the Santa Fé legislature, is an extract from the Standard's Rosario correspondent:

"The legislature of Santa Fé will meet again for the dispatch of business on Friday next. Dr. Quintana intends presenting a project of a minute, to be addressed to the national government, praying them to conclude the war by arranging a peace with Paraguay. I have no doubt but that it will pass with a large majority. The communication commences with this strong language:

"As no voice has been raised within the precincts of the national assembly, (to urge for peace,) it falls upon the people to do it, to the shame of those who have not fulfilled their duty."

New governors have been elected in the provinces of Mendoza and San Juan, in the first a Señor Villanueva, and in the second a Señor Zaralla. They both belong to the liberal party and enjoy a good reputation.

A lieutenant colonel and a major of the late Confederate States service are reported by the papers to have arrived here from the headquarters of the allied army in Paraguay, recommended to the national government by President Mitre, to whom they have proposed to raise a foreign legion, composed, if possible, of North Americans and Englishmen, for service in Paraguay. The name of the first of them is McTuor.

November 2.—On account of yesterday being a closed holiday, no papers appeared this morning, and there is no news.

November 3.—The Tribuna publishes a translation in Spanish of a note which I addressed to Don Luis Varela, brother of its proprietors, Don Hector and Don Mariano Varela, congratulating him upon the remarkable oratorical triumph of his brother Hector at the peace congress of Geneva, in its session of 11th September last, in defense of assailed progress and civilization under republican institutions in this hemisphere.

The news from Montevideo is not very satisfactory. General Flores, eldest son of Colonel Fortunato Flores, whose brutal behavior obliged his father to send him to Europe about three or four months ago, has just returned to Montevideo from Paris, to the great disgust of his fellow-citizens in general. It is reported that in consequence of this, Señor Flangini will resign the portfolio of foreign affairs, and his successor is likely to be Señor Bustamante. With reference to this the Standard of to-day says:

"Things in Montevideo look rather stormy again; the government has notified General Suarez that for the present he must remain in the city and abandon his proposed excursion to the camp. This is doubtless on account of some information received respecting the squashed-up invasion on the Uruguay; but even in the city affairs are in an unsettled state. Minister Flangini has sent in his resignation, also many of the officers of the liberated battalion; all this is said to be owing to the premature return from Paris of Fortunato Flores, the son of the governor. It is thought that Señor Bustamante will succeed Flangini; his promotion will be a loss to Montevideo, since he has made an excellent chief of police, and it will be difficult to get any one so well qualified to fill this important post."

November 4.—A great public open air meeting took place yesterday, in one of the principal squares of this city, in accordance with a printed invitation, as a public manifestation in honor of Señor Hector Varela, for his great success at Geneva. The meeting was well attended, several speeches were made, and funds collected to present an album and a gold medal to Señor Varela.

The French gunboat Decidée arrived yesterday from Corrientes, having on board M. Cochelet, late French consul in Asuncion. She has also brought dispatches for this legation from the United States legation in Paraguay.

November 5.—A telegram from Montevideo announces the arrival there of the Marcelo Diaz, a Brazilian transport, direct from the seat of war, with news that on the 29th ultimo an action took place between the Paraguayans and Porto Alegre's forces at Tuyuti, which resulted in the latter occupying three of the enemy's trenches on the right flank; the loss on both sides is reported to have been considerable.

The published correspondence from the seat of war reaches only to the 27th, up to which date the only news of importance was the assurance that cholera had completely disappeared.

A file of Paraguayan papers to the 5th of last month has come to hand. If any credit is to be attached to the statements of the Semanario, it would appear that the most patriotic and indomitable spirit of resistance pervades all classes of Paraguayans, who are animated by unbounded confidence in their ruler, and in the ultimate triumph of the Paraguayan arms in this sanguinary war of independence. These papers teem with accounts of public meetings held by the Paraguayan ladies, and eloquent speeches made by them for the purpose of raising contributions of jewelry and other objects towards the expenses of the war.

They also contain some interesting data on the commerce between Paraguay and Bolivia, which seems to be so much on the increase that the latter republic has appointed a consul general in Asuncion.

November 6.—General Mitre's official report to Vice-President Paez of the action of the 29th ultimo is published in to-day's papers. This action, which had been erroneously reported to have taken place at Tuyuti, happened near a place to the north of Humaita, called the "Potrero Ovella." This Potrero Ovella is the converging point of all the roads that lead from the interior to Humaita, a position strong by nature, and rendered more so by the fortifications raised by Lopez to protect it. It could only be approached by a narrow causeway, along which the Brazilians, under the immediate orders of General Mena Barreto, charged with the bayonet, and, after suffering considerable losses, succeeded in carrying the position. Marquis de Caxias's official report to General Mitre of this action is herewith appended :

POTRERO OVELLA.—TAYI.

[Official dispatch from the Marquis de Caxias to General Mitre.]

"HEADQUARTERS T'UYU-CUE,

"November 1, 1867.

"I have to inform you that, according to information received from Brigadier J. M. M. Barneto, charged by me with the operation already known to your excellency, he marched, on the morning of the 29th ultimo, at the head of a force composed of the 1st, 2d, 7th, 8th, and 9th battalions of infantry of the line, and 23d and 24th of volunteers, four pieces of artillery, fifty-four sappers, and first and second divisions of cavalry, arriving at the bridge of the Arroyo Hondo, when he left one of the cavalry divisions to guard that position and the rear of the expeditionary force. Continuing his march and approaching the Potrero Ovella, he received information from the vanguard that a line of skirmishers was in sight, supposed to be the vanguard of a superior force. He then ordered his own skirmishers to advance, protected by the 1st and 3d regiments of cavalry, he following with the bulk of the column.

"He might have advanced about half a league, when Colonel Manuel de Oliveira Bueno, who was engaged in watching the movements of the enemy, sent word that he was in possession of a pass leading to a redoubt, which, after the action, he found to be defended by two deep ditches, and in the flank covered by marshes, and in front by a narrow and deep lake. He then ordered the before-mentioned brigadier to advance with two pieces of artillery, protected by two columns of cavalry in echelon, supported by a battalion of infantry, masked by a line of skirmishers, which kept up a fire with those of the enemy. He sent two battalions to the right and left of the pass, and two others in the direction of the redoubt, followed by the cavalry and artillery in the rear. The column thus proceeded in the form of a half-moon, and were soon engaged in a bloody contest, resulting in the retreat of the enemy not only from their first lines already described, but from the others, equally well protected by extensive and deep swamps. The lines were carried successively by our troops at the point of the bayonet. I have much pleasure in saying that General Mena Barreto reports that officers and men alike distinguished themselves.

"The enemy then endeavored to retreat within the fortifications of Humaita, but were pursued and completely cut to pieces by our cavalry. We have buried eighty Paraguayan corpses, and have taken fifty-six prisoners, besides a quantity of ammunition and arms. Our loss in killed and wounded amounts to three hundred and seventy men.

"According to my instructions, General Mena Barreto marched yesterday at 5.30 in the morning, with a strong force and two pieces of artillery, to reconnoiter the barranca of Tayi. He halted there at 7.30, sending forward a picquet of carbineers to explore it. It was discovered that there were no intrenchments.

"Our two guns then fired upon a steamer in the river Paraguay. She replied with two shots that did not reach the barranca, and then steamed away towards Humaita. We made two prisoners, one of them a sergeant, who formed part of the guard at Tayi, which had fled, leaving a few lances and fortification tools in our possession.

"At 11.30 Brigadier Mena Barreto returned to the Potrero Ovella, leaving a regiment of cavalry at Tayi.

"Afterwards I received news that the before-mentioned steamer had returned, accompanied by another. They commenced to bombard Tayi, and succeeded in burning some carts I had placed there to imitate pieces of artillery. They fired also at the brushwood on the banks of the river, thinking naturally we had infantry concealed there. A third steamer was seen, but she passed up the river. One of their steamers and an armed raft remained all the day in the port of Tayi.

"From what we have hitherto ascertained, there exists a road by the coast of the river Paraguay to Humaita. The Potrero Ovella is, we find, about three leagues in extent, and composed of woods, lakes, and marshes, all of which we have explored. There is roaming within it a number of scattered cattle, which we shall collect on the first opportunity.

"The town of Pilar was explored, and it was found that there exists neither garrison nor fortification of any kind. The few people who were there on our arrival had embarked in rafts, and remained in the center of the river.

"Congratulating your excellency on this new triumph over the enemy, I have only to communicate that orders have been given to the general in command of the expeditionary force to retain the present positions until further instructions."

The Tribune of to-day, in its telegraphic news from Montevideo, says:

"It is beyond doubt that Flangini will shortly withdraw from the Foreign Office. Señor Bustamante is to be named prime minister, and will also discharge ad interim the duties of foreign minister, until the return from Europe of Señor Hector Varela, who is to succeed Flangini."

November 7.—The Standard publishes to-day my note to Señor Don Luis Varela, alluded to under date of the 3d of this month; it is herewith appended:

THE UNITED STATES LEGATION AND MR. L. VARELA.

"LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Buenos Ayres, November 1, 1867.

"MY DEAR SIR: It affords me great pleasure to congratulate you upon the signal success which your distinguished brother, Señor Don Hector F. Varela, has achieved in his masterly speech, delivered in the most worthy and eloquent manner at the peace congress, in Geneva, during its session of the 11th September ultimo, in defense of assailed progress and civilization under republican institutions in this hemisphere. This manly and noble defense will live as a lasting monument of respect and sincere gratitude in the hearts of all the American people north and south.

"I am, with sincere regard, your obedient servant,

"A. ASBOTH.

"SEÑOR DON LUIS VARELA, Buenos Ayres."

The last mail from Paraguay has brought the intelligence of the death of President Lopez's eldest son, killed in a late cavalry engagement.

Certain of the native local papers having given currency to some absurd information about President Lopez, said to have been communicated by the French consul, the Standard of this morning makes the following remarks:

"Respecting the assertions ascribed to the French consul, some have foundation. The imprisonment and ill treatment of Mr. Capdevila is, for instance, too true, and the general complexion of the gossip from Humaita may be more or less well painted; but the absurd history of the caged tigers, to which Lopez, like a second Caligula, flings his human victims to be devoured, is an abominable falsehood. And the circumstance that M. Cochelet was lodged in a part of the fortress of Humaita exposed to the fire of the allies, is easily explained by the fact that there is no part of that fortress which is thus not exposed. It is a pity that our colleagues should go out of their way to publish silly exaggerations, as the state of affairs in the interior of Humaita is doubtless quite bad enough, and we are all pretty well disposed to believe that the resources of the ruler of Paraguay are well nigh exhausted. Let the allies push on their reinforcements and be above calumny. Marshal Caxias is at least better employed, and we find on the 29th of October General Mena Barreto, under his orders, took possession of a very important position, which may lead to final results."

November 8.—The Standard of to-day has the following leader on the position of the allies:

"THE POSITION OF THE ALLIES.

"Never since the commencement of the Paraguayan war has the campaign possessed so much interest for the general reader as at present; the allies, profiting by dearly bought experience, are at last adopting tactics which must result in either hemming in the Paraguay army at Humaita or forcing the enemy to attack on disadvantageous terms. It is much to be regretted that we have no book or guide at our command to describe the country in the neighborhood of the present operations, but as far as we can judge from the hasty sketches in the Semanario, the allies are entering localities every way dangerous to an invader. At Tayi, a commanding position on the Paraguayan river, just a stretch above Humaita, there is an immense isleta or jungle, in the vicinity of which already a sanguinary battle has been fought; according to the Paraguayan version, the Brazilians were driven back here on the 3d with great loss, while the allies claim a great victory on the occasion. The subsequent operations, however, remove all doubt as to this fight, for we find, on the 27th, a regular hand-to-hand fight at a point midway, called Potrero Ovello. This potrero occupies a very commanding position a little out of Humaita and on the road to Asuncion; here were posted the abastecedores of the army, and since the move of Caxias to Tuyu-Cué, Lopez has had hundreds of his soldiers digging trenches and strengthening the position. Up to the 3d ultimo, Caxias, it appears, knew nothing of this place, but the fights at the isleta taught him the topography of the ground, and on the 27th ultimo a powerful division was dispatched to take the place by storm. The brave cossacks of Rio Grande, under General Andrade Neves, and seven battalions of infantry, under Salustiano, marched in single file through a tortuous path from the allied encampment. The road passes through a glen, where a handful of Paraguayans, if well posted, might have held the pass and checked the invaders; but the Brazilians encountered no opposition until they came face to face with the enemy at the Potrero. The enemy seemed to trust more to the strength of their position and their bravery than to numbers. Two hundred and fifty Paraguayans held the place undismayed at the splendid charge of the Brazilians; there was nothing for it but the bayonet; the fire of the enemy was steady, well directed and concentrated; but the Brazilians with equal heroism charged up to the very ditches at double-quick step. The Rio Grande cavalry won new laurels, and dashing up to the very trenches of the Paraguayans, sabred the gunners. The Paraguayans never flinched an inch until they saw the Brazilians at their flank; they then retreated in good order to Humaita, the nature of the country being such as to impede pursuit.

"Important as is this position in a strategic point, it costs the Brazilians dearly, and those who know the difficulties attending the attack of an intrenched position will not read with surprise that the Brazilians had over five hundred hors de combat, whilst the enemy did not lose a tenth of that number. A very sad episode occurred during the fight. Colonel Oliveira, who but the day previously had been promoted, was shot dead by a subaltern officer, owing to some high words passing between them. The position once gained by the Brazilians was occupied, and the Marquis Caxias, in person, inspected the place, and ordered the cavalry to hover about Tayi, whilst the artillery mounted some brass pieces to command the river. The Paraguayan guard at Tayi only numbered a sergeant and a few men. From the willful weakness of the place it is thought that Lopez wishes to get the Brazilians in this dangerous spot, but lines of the allies are so extended that if Lopez adopts the first Napoleon's tactics the allies will find out their error. The allies at present stretch over an immense extent of country, and the only feature in their favor is that the enemy may be said to be without cavalry. During the last month the allies have invariably attacked with success, and a summary of the various engagements shows great advantages gained by the allies and heavy losses by the enemy. This has led to a complete change of tactics on the part of the allies; large divisions are at present penetrating the country, and very possibly ere long we shall hear of the crossing the Tebicuari and the occupation of Villa Rica. Porto Alegre has been ordered to move to the right, and thus, in fact, form the rear-guard near Tuyuti; the evident object of this move is to strengthen the allied line which shuts Lopez in the peninsula, but all these movements and tactics can only have one result; a terrible and sanguinary battle has to be fought. Ten thousand desperate Paraguayans have to force their way into the country; the allies under no circumstances can avoid this, and the sooner it comes to pass the better for friend and foe; the base of operations will evidently be the Villa Pilar, when Porto Alegre evacuates that most useless of all positions, the fens of Tuyuti."

The telegraph wires from the Tigre announce the arrival of the Uruguay steamer with dates from the allied camp to the 3d instant. Great fighting has been going on. On the 2d the Paraguayans made an attempt by land and water to retake the positions of Potrero Ovella and Tayi to the north of Humaita, but were repulsed with great loss on both sides, whilst the next morning before dawn they surprised the allies in their rear at Tuyuti, and very nearly succeeded in taking possession of Porto Alegre's whole encampment; here, too, they were eventually repulsed, but although they suffered great losses they contrived to inflict even greater losses on the allies, and carried off several pieces of artillery, after setting fire to the Argentine sutler's camp.

To-day's Standard has the following leader, implying a covert threat to Lopez, which I have reason to believe has been inspired in an official quarter:

"ENGLISHMEN IN PARAGUAY.

"If President Lopez has ever speculated on the chances of intervention in his favor from abroad, or of domestic changes in the states now hostile to him, he must by this time be thoroughly undeceived. It is in the highest degree improbable that his position will be altered by any occurrence extraneous to the natural course of the campaign. We may take it for granted that he must rest the issue of the contest on his own military resources. What may be the strength of these it is difficult for us to form any reliable estimate; but the latest reports, after careful sifting of ex parte statements, present unmistakable signs of that gradual exhaustion so long predicted.

"On the other hand, it may be doubted whether, since the war commenced, the bonds of the triple alliance have been more firmly knit than at this moment. The primary stipulation of the treaty of alliance, that Lopez shall abdicate his power, runs more chance than ever of being exacted to the letter. The Brazilian empire, it is certain, will shrink before no sacrifice of men or money to attain that object.

"As far, then, as we can judge from appearances, Lopez is either obstinately fencing with his fate, or he is the dupe of parties personally interested in the continuance of the war. Neither of these alternatives is very creditable to his sagacity.

"We may say safely that we have never been the political advocates of General Lopez. We have always considered his system of government as an anachronism, and, even more, as an impossibility, confronted as it must be by the steady advance of European ideas in these regions. But, in common with many of our fellow-countrymen, we have sometimes closed our eyes to his political acts, and have chosen to contemplate him only in the light of a ruler who, on the margin of a desert, and surrounded by an indigenous population, has made great efforts to foment industry and introduce the mechanical arts. In fostering these he has employed the revenue of the country with an uprightness which defeats calumny, and has patronized and well treated the English and other foreigners who have aided him in the attempt.

"What sympathy we may still entertain towards General Lopez we cannot better expend than in cautioning him against information which, for mercenary ends, may be given him to disguise the real truth of his position. If his position is such as it is now commonly represented, he may be sure that his enemies are not sanguinary, and that they will be only too glad to give him the opportunity to escape, if he chooses to accept it. Impartial spectators of the events now in progress would advise him to do so with all convenient speed.

"But it is possible that other counselors of President Marshal Lopez may ridicule this officious advice, as well as the views which seem to prevail as to the position of a potentate who, far from being in the straits we speak of, is secure, they would tell us, in the assurance of ultimate triumph. In that case, we have even greater reason for now adverting to a question of more serious import to us than mere speculation as to the result of a contest in which we are neutral.

"There are still Englishmen in the employ of General Lopez; and were we not averse to parallels, that might be thoughtlessly drawn between him and another distant potentate with whom Great Britain is now about to cast up accounts, we would say there are still certain Englishmen forcibly detained in captivity by General Lopez. But we prefer to consider them as foreigners, who from choice of interest have entered his service, and who have hitherto faithfully served him. From the nature of their callings, civil rather than military, we can yet hope that, proprio motu, he will be inclined to accept their resignation, although he may have lately refused that boon to a direct demand in their behalf.

"President Marshal Lopez must be aware that, as far as Europe is concerned, his future reputation is bound up in the safety and honorable treatment of foreign residents in Paraguay, and we can scarcely believe the too commonly expressed opinion that Lopez, now brought to bay, is callous to praise or censure, present or posthumous; and that the safety of the foreigners in his clutches has no other guarantee but the immediate personal ends, the caprices of a barbarian.

"On the contrary, we see in his diplomatic notes that he makes some sacrifice, even of veracity, to give a plausible coloring to his acts, when they are to be judged in distant countries, or where, in his own almost pathetic words, "his voice cannot reach." We know, also, that he spends large sums for no other purpose than to enable his agents in London or Paris to represent his proceedings favorably to the civilized world. We may, therefore, reasonably conclude that, as it has been remarked of the rest of us, he is neither so great a philosopher as to be above censure, nor so great a beast as to be beneath it.

"And, moreover, when he reflects on the responsibility of holding in his hands the lives of a few innocent foreigners, he will probably hesitate before he permits any willful injury to them, either in the hour of his triumph or of his fall. In the former case, he would risk the fruits of his success by incurring the vindictive and instant chastisement which we can positively assure him powerful European nations are preparing to inflict; and in the latter case, whilst permitted to live, he would be branded as a monster, or would subject his memory uselessly and gratuitously to the execration not only of his immediate enemies but of the world in general."

With reference to the new British minister near this government the Standard says:

"Mr. William Lowther, whose appointment as minister plenipotentiary to the Argentine Republic has been announced by the telegram from Montevideo, is the youngest son of Colonel, the honorable Henry Cecil Lowther, (M. P. for Westmoreland,) brother to the Earl of Lonsdale. Mr. Lowther was born in 1821, and married, in 1853, Charlotte, youngest and only surviving daughter of Lord Wensleydale, by whom he has a large family. He is one of the oldest secretaries of embassy in our diplomatic service."

November 9.—The papers to-day publish full details and official reports of the late fighting in Paraguay. The battle of Tuyuti, viewed in any light, is a bloody and ugly business, and shows the danger the allies incur in having their line stretched too far to be safe from attacks such as the one they suffered at Tuyuti on the 3d instant. In the action of Tayi there seems to be no question that the Paraguayans were worsted. They landed in three steamers, attacked and got repulsed completely, and of the three steamers one was sunk by the Brazilian artillery, the other burnt, and the third entirely disabled. The following detailed account of the Tuyuti business, as well as Marquis de Caxias' official report of the affair at Tayi, are from to-day's Standard:

"THE LATE BATTLES OF TUYUTI AND TAYI.

"TUYUTI, November 4, 1867.

"At daybreak (4½ a. m.) yesterday morning the Paraguayans made a fearful onslaught on our position. The sutlers and camp followers suffered heavily at the hands of the cowardly enemy, who plundered and murdered all before them. From one of the run-away merchants I gleaned the following, which I hasten to communicate, knowing your anxiety to have a full and true account of the engagement.

"Scarcely had the sun peeped above the horizon, dispelling the dark shades of night and lighting up the neighboring woods and valleys with its million rays, when we were startled by the ring of musketry on our right; presently the war clang increased, and it became evident that the Johnson battery, held by the Correntino division, was being assailed. The rapid discharge of two heavy guns, followed by a deadly silence, too plainly proclaimed the issue of the fight, at least so I felt, knowing that the few Correntinos left there could never hold out against any formidable attacking column. My conviction was shared by the Brazilian generals, who hurried forward their men on the first sound of alarm. While all around was bustle and excitement, General Porto Alegre, with becoming serenity, scanned from a slight eminence in front the whole line, adopting instantaneously the most energetic means of defense.

"The enemy must have numbered 8,000 bayonets, for the most infantry. They advanced in loose file, quick pace, but good order, and extended over our entire front line. The column approached in two divisions, the first of which fell deliberately on our right as if to carry all before them, while the second or reserve, from a little to the rear, practiced a series of harassing assaults on the Brazilian left. The combat deepens around our ramparts, of which the enemy boldly endeavored to possess themselves; the Brazilian reserves dispute their own hand to hand with the assailants, whose numbers at length prevail over valor and discipline; the Paraguayan banner waves triumphantly over the heaps of slain as the Brazilians fall back on Porto Alegre's headquarters; here they concentrated and awaited the advance of their comrades.

"This slight incident was the turning point of the whole day, and this early repulse it was which threw the final victory into the hands of the allies.

"For while the enemy, unable permanently to occupy the position, were actually impeded in their retreat by the trenches they had so dearly won, our retrograde movement, without entailing disorder, had so contracted our line of defense that we were enabled, with a small force, to hold at bay the fiercest assaults of the enemy until our reserves came up, which quickly changed the fortune of the day. Nothing but the stern determination of our veterans could withstand the hairbrained daring of the enemy; and as each column advanced large gaps were opened in their massive lines by our own incomparable gunners. We had now time to load and take deliberate aim with our field-pieces, for, as the Paraguayans were unprovided with artillery, they could not get at us except with the bayonet, no easy matter either, behind stone walls. It may be Lopez had calculated on capturing our guns and ammunition, and in this he was not out, for two fine rifled pieces were left behind by the Brazilians; but in future the gallant marshal would do well to instruct his braves in the use of "spiked cannon;" he would doubtless find it of great service in concluding a campaign with men who "never give up the ship." I am more inclined to believe, however, that the marshy and wooded nature of the country through which they marched would not permit of a long carriage train, otherwise it was a grievous error, and entirely blasted the fruit which, with a little judgment, might have ripened under the dazzling rays of their early success.

"In this critical moment the rapacity of our savage enemy proved our best friend. During one of those occasional lulls, whilst the enemy were organizing a fresh attack and we preparing to receive them, dense volumes of thick black smoke, commingled with flames, were wafted by on the morning breeze; overcome by the suffocating vapor, we stood motionless on our arms until aroused by the commotion among the camp followers. It was indeed a life and death struggle for these defenseless wretches; all who could not fly were butchered as they stood, their goods robbed, and houses burned. When Porto Alegre saw this, he charged at the head of a picked corps, driving back the enemy with dreadful carnage. From this dates the enemy's repulse, which, as the day wore on, was followed by increased disorder.

"General Hornos coming up with the San Martin 3d of the line and Correntino divisions, charged home on the broken masses, retaking the lost trenches and compelling the pursued to leave behind all their booty except two light guns, which, despite the noble efforts of the allied horse, were carried off to Lopez, the scanty trophies of that bloody day.

"The enemy's loss must have been fearfully heavy; more than two thousand of their dead were buried by the victor. The trenches, streets, and even the huts of the little village are filled with slain, so as to render it impracticable to pass on horseback. Our own loss may be laid down at seven to eight hundred, including many Argentine and Brazilian officers. The valiant Porto Alegre had two horses shot under him, and was finally disabled by a wound in the left arm. Major Castilla led the Paraguayan charge, and was killed by Alegre whilst tearing down the Brazilian flag from the battlements in front of the imperial commander's tent."

[Second dispatch.]

"HEADQUARTERS, TUYU CUÉ, November 2, 1867.

"I hasten to inform you that, in accordance with my instructions, Brigadier J. M. M. Barreto attacked Tayi with the infantry under his orders.

"Disposed in parallel lines, supported by three columns of attack, one on the right, one in the center, and one on the left, they charged with the bayonet with the greatest intrepidity, and advanced up to the intrenchments which the enemy had raised with incredible celerity, and not only did our troops take these, but they completely defeated two battalions of infantry, eight hundred strong, without firing a shot, killing five hundred and taking sixty prisoners. Many of the enemy in escaping threw themselves from the banks of the river into the water.

"Our 4-pounders fired with such certainty at the three steamers in front of Tayi, (and which no doubt had conveyed thither the forces engaged,) that one of them was sunk, another burned, and the third moved off with her paddle-wheels damaged.

"It is satisfactory to me to be able to transmit such favorable intelligence, and the more so that Brigadier Barreto informs me our loss did not exceed thirty men in killed and wounded.

No. 2.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Buenos Ayres, September 11, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you of my arrival at this place on the 29th of August, having sailed with my family from New York on the 23d of July, and proceeded directly to my post of duty. On Monday, August 31, I communicated with Señor Rufino de Elizalde, minister of foreign affairs, inclosing with said communication copy of my letter of credence and the remarks I would make upon the occasion of my presentation, and requested the appointment of the time when such presentation to the President of the Argentine Republic could be had. On the evening of the 31st I received a reply, designating the 2d of September for such ceremony. On Tuesday, the 1st, I was taken violently sick, and being confined to my bed, at my request the presentation was deferred until this day at 1 o'clock, and which will take place, not, however, in time for me to write my dispatches for the steamer, which leaves here at the hour fixed for this ceremony. I will therefore defer transmitting to the department copies of the correspondence until my next dispatch, so as better to preserve system and regularity in my correspondence.

As we sailed from New York, it was my good fortune to become acquainted with Señor Domingo F. Sarmiento, who was returning to his country from his diplomatic mission to the United States, in anticipation of his election to the presidency of this republic. We cultivated with and for each other a most friendly feeling, and it gave me pleasure to find him so imbued with the spirit of our institutions. On our arrival at Bahia, Brazil, he received positive information of his election, and communicated said information to me. The flag-ship of the South Atlantic squadron, Admiral Davis commanding, being in that port, honored him with a salute as we left that harbor for Rio de Janeiro. The same compliment was paid him by our ships as we left the harbor of Rio de Janeiro.

* * * * *

The general opinion prevails now that the war is rapidly approaching its conclusion. I can hardly share in that conclusion. By recent news (yesterday's boat) the allies have free navigation to Tebicuari, but it is a noticable fact that every fortification occupied by the allies had been abandoned by Lopez, who has retired to the interior at the head, it is said, of about sixteen thousand men, and fortified himself at Villeta, where it is said he will give battle to the armies of the alliance. The allies do not relax in their determination to continue the war until Lopez and his power is destroyed, and this resolution has been strengthened by the news brought by yesterday's boat, which created a profound sensation in this city. This news is regarded as most reliable. You will discover from the same the insecurity of life and property in that country. The outrage to the American minister has developed the feeling of hostility which all Americans residing in this city entertain towards Lopez. I have no definite news relative to the Wasp.

The news above referred to, and which I add to this sheet, has been published in all the papers.

I have taken this from the Standard, which is our English paper, dated this day.

THE WAR IN THE NORTH—ARRIVAL OF THE PARANA.

The mail steamer from Paraguay has brought news of much importance, and advices of the most afflicting character. At first we refused to believe the accounts of the wholesale butcheries in the Paraguayan camp, which our colleagues published. We had hoped, for the sake of common humanity, that the stories from the mouths of deserters and prisoners of war were but a tissue of falsehoods; but we deplore the fact that subsequent advices confirm the sad narrative, and this desperate war is about to wind up with one of the bloodiest chapters that has defaced South American history.

The onward march of the allied army seems unchecked by a single contretemps. General Osorio, at the head of the vanguard, has crossed the Tebicuari without meeting the enemy.

It appears that the commander-in-chief ordered the squadron to pass up the river, enter the Tebicuari, and bombard the enemy. To this mandate the admiral replied that it was impossible to enter the Tebicuari for want of water; but Caxias consulted with some skilled Paraguayan pilots, who insisted that there was sufficient water for the iron-clads, whereupon Caxias repeated the order, informing the admiral of what the pilots said. The admiral at once weighed anchor and got up to the appointed place and commenced shelling away; but soon he was acquainted with the fact that the enemy had long since fled, and had marched to the headquarters at Villeta. Upon Caxias being informed of this, he at once ordered Osorio to advance with the vanguard, swim the Tebicuari with his troopers, and establish his quarters on the right bank of the Tebicuari, all of which this brave officer did without a moment's delay. A general order for the whole allied army to advance on the morning of the 8th was then given, and all the steamers in the river—even the transports—were ordered up to ferry the troops across the river.

Timbo is razed; it never was a place of any strength; but the little fortress which the Paraguayans had constructed has been dismantled, and will not be occupied by the allies.

The little town of Pilar is now crowded with shipping. When the allies entered the place they found the inhabitants were all fled, and everything of worth or value carried off. A kind friend who, it appears, would stop at nothing to help the Standard, entered the church and carried off one of the figures for the Standard museum. Although most anxious to enrich our museum, which has cost us many years to get to its present position, we confess that we lament any subscriber of ours should presume in this way to obtain an article of pious virtu; and we receive the gift only on the strict understanding that when the war terminates we shall be at full liberty to restore it to the little chapel in question.

Humaita will soon be deserted; the Argentine troops under Gelly have received orders to march, and the few dealers who had temporarily established themselves there now move up in the wake of the army.

Lanuz and Lezica, the army contractors, keep a remarkably small stock on hand. They seem to think that the war may collapse at a day's warning, and they wish therefore to be on the right side. All their stores are kept afloat. Mr. Riestra keeps almost nothing on shore. The supply of forage has fallen off of late, and arrivals of hay and corn are now looked for.

Gelly Obes has obtained very important advices from a Paraguayan officer who has been taken prisoner by the Brazilian forces whilst marching along the left bank of the Tebicuari. He stated that the picket which he held was stormed and taken by the Brazilians on the 27th, and that on the 28th ultimo the remnant of the garrison swam across the Tebicuari to the opposite bank, where horses were in waiting to convey them to Lopez's encampment. That some ten or twelve days previously, Lopez, with the bulk of his army, had marched for Villeta, where, according to all accounts, Lopez intended to make a stand, having fortified the place. That his whole force numbered nine thousand men, with a "parque" of light artillery numbering over sixty pieces. That Lopez had rewarded all troops that had escaped from Humaita with a medal. Some soldiers with these medals have been taken prisoners.

That the battle in the Chaco is claimed by Lopez as a splendid victory, over two thousand Argentines having perished, according to the Cabichuy.

That Gaspar Campos is alive, but Colonel Martinez de Hoz was killed in the fight; his body was recovered and sent to Lopez, who had it buried with military honors on the lonely banks of the Tebicuari. The grave has since been identified.

This officer fully confirms the report about the revolution, which, it appears, was got up in Asuncion, and most of the principal men took part in it. On the 1st of July, Lopez got information of it. He at once ordered the arrest of Captain Gomez, the commander of Asuncion, who was sent prisoner to headquarters. It is stated that this unfortunate man was tortured in order to make him divulge; he died in torture. Colonel Denis, commander of Cerro-Leon, was next arrested with all his subordinates. They were all shot. On the same day Venancio and Benigno Lopez, brothers of President Lopez, and Captain Hermosa, Venancio's aide-de-camp, arrived in irons from Asuncion. Hermosa was at once shot.

For several days prisoners from Asuncion kept arriving by steamer. Among these were Carreras, Rodriguez, Telmo Lopez, Pereira, and all the Argentines and Orientales in Asuncion. All shot. Laguna, Garay, Costa, and Lucero, also shot. Sinforoso Caceres also shot. Two Correntinos made their escape.

Whilst this lasted it was indeed a reign of terror in Paraguay. Men feared to speak even to their most intimate friends. Several parties took refuge in Mr. Washburn's (the American minister's) house, but the rude soldiery rushed into the rooms and dragged the unfortunates out, heedless of the consequences. Mr. Washburn, as a matter of course, protested against the outrage, and notes have been interchanged.

There is no positive evidence that Berges has been shot. He has been arrested and removed from office. Gumecindo Benitez, the editor of the Semanario, was named his successor, as minister of foreign affairs; but Benitez has been arrested since, and will be tried for treason. This same officer declares that Lopez having reason to believe that the bishop and some of the clergy were implicated in the conspiracy, a guard was placed on the bishop's residence, and three clergymen arrested; some of them, he states, were put to the torture. His description of the executions is, indeed, too horrible to relate. The first batch numbered nearly fifty, among whom were General Brugges, Colonel Nunez, Majors Mesla and Haedo, and Captain Rojas, all the first and best people in Paraguay. The family of Rojas is one of the oldest, and was the richest in the country, and we deplore the fate of this talented young man.

These wholesale executions lasted for eight or ten days, the ruffian soldiery vying with each other in heaping insults on these unfortunates. But their hour is fast approaching, and blessed be the hand that shatters at a blow the accursed and savage despotism of a rabble and shoeless soldiery.

We throw down the affidavit of this prisoner of war, too shocked to continue such a chapter of horrors. Further details would be repugnant to our readers. Whatever sympathy the heroism of the Paraguayans may have secured from an impartial public, the awful butchery which surrounds the impotent throes of their tottering ruler calls for execration. Common humanity shudders at the picture which this officer discloses. It may be that such terrible episodes are necessary to uproot the power which Francia planted; but the lesson should not be lost sight of, and the allies should push on at once to finish the chapter.

* * * * *

I cannot close this dispatch without adding that I have received every assurance of good feeling towards my government, and I know it to be the desire and purpose of the President elect to cultivate the most friendly and intimate commercial relations between the two governments, in which I will most heartily co-operate.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
H. G. WORTHINGTON.

No. 3.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, September 12, 1868.

SIR: The unexpected departure of a mail from this port to-morrow affords me an opportunity of communicating to the department the correspondence and circumstances attending my presentation and reception as minister resident of the United States to the Argentine Republic. On the 31st of August I addressed to Señor Rufino de Elizalde, minister of foreign affairs, a letter informing him of my arrival, and requesting the appointment of a time for my presentation to the President of the Argentine Republic, a copy of which said letter is hereto annexed, marked A. On the evening of the same day I received a reply to the same, a copy of which, together with a translation of the same, is hereto annexed, both of which are marked B. As I informed you in my dispatch No. 2, dated the 11th instant, my presentation was deferred, in consequence of my sickness, by mutual verbal understanding, until the 11th instant, at which time I was waited upon by Señor Delfín B. Huergo, sub-secretary of state, in company with an aide-de-camp of the President, in the government carriage, which the President very kindly put at my disposition, and conducted, in company with Mr. Hollister, United States consul, whom I invited to be present at the ceremony, to the governor's mansion, where was provided a band of music and the usual military display, which is part of a custom of the country attending this ceremony.

On reaching the governor's mansion I was most courteously received and taken charge of by Señor Rufino de Elizalde, by whom I was presented to his excellency the President, to whom I addressed the remarks hereto annexed, marked C, a copy of which I had previously transmitted to the minister of foreign affairs. I was received by the President, both in my official as well as in my personal character, with every manifestation of regard and good will, as indicated in his reply to my address, which is hereto attached, with a translation of the same, marked D. The President was surrounded by his entire cabinet, in the uniform of their highest military rank, as well as by a large concourse of citizens who had assembled to witness the ceremony.

After the exchange of remarks between the President and myself, which was followed by a short personal conversation, I was presented to the several members of his cabinet, from all of whom I received expressions of admiration for our government, and their great desire to see cultivated more intimately, if possible, the good relations between the two governments. These ceremonies being concluded, I returned, accompanied by the same escort, to my hotel, after which I made the usual visits to the various officers of the government and members of the diplomatic corps resident here.

All the circumstances attending this ceremony afford the most gratifying assurance of the happy relation existing between the two governments, and I feel confident that I will encounter no difficulty in preserving this good correspondence.

Nothing of any consequence has developed itself since my last despatch, except the speculation indulged in by the press as to who will succeed Señor Sarmiento as minister to the United States. There seems to be considerable unanimity in the belief that this distinction will be accorded to President Mitre, a gentleman of fine martial bearing, and, I learn, of fine cultivation and ability, and, withal, having a high appreciation of the superior excellence and advantage of our system of government and its institutions.

I have the honor to be, very truly, yours,

H. G. WORTHINGTON.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, August 31, 1868.

I have the honor to communicate my arrival here as the minister of the United States to reside near this government, and herewith transmit a copy of a letter from the President of the United States accrediting me as such, and respectfully request the appointment of a time and place at which I may be admitted to present personally a sealed letter of credence addressed by my government to his excellency the President of the Argentine Republic. I also have the honor to inclose herein the remarks which I shall address to the President of the Argentine Republic in behalf of my government at said presentation.

With great consideration, permit me to subscribe myself, very truly and respectfully, yours,

HENRY G. WORTHINGTON.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Buenos Ayres, August 31, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your dispatch of this date, by which you please to inform me of your arrival, and to inclose a copy of the letter of his Excellency the President of the United States, which credits you in the character of minister resident to this government.

The President, to whom I have delivered the inclosed copy of the speech you propose to address on presenting the credentials, has fixed the 2d instant, at 1 o'clock p. m., in order to receive your excellency with that purpose in the government house.

It is with pleasure that I avail myself of this occasion to offer Mr. Worthington the assurance of my highest consideration.

RUFINO DE ELIZALDE.

His Excellency General HENRY G. WORTHINGTON,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

C.

MR. PRESIDENT: In presenting myself near your government as the minister of the United States, I am especially charged by the President of my government to communicate to you the great satisfaction with which he regards the harmony and the good understanding which has existed and which has been so successfully maintained between the two governments. He therefore has authorized me to express, in behalf of the Great Republic of the North to her sisters of the South, the best wishes of my government for the development of your resources, for the prosperity of your people, and for the stability of our systems of government, which so eminently testifies the excellence of republican institutions.

In commencing, Mr. President, my official relations with the Argentine Republic, I am inspired with a confidence that those relations, which have been so pleasantly maintained by my distinguished predecessors, and which I shall be so careful to preserve during my residence in your country, will conduce to the benefit of both governments by a preservation of the happy correspondence, and I assure your excellency that, both in my personal efforts as in my official relation, nothing shall be left undone to contribute to that result.

And now I have the honor of presenting a letter from the President of the United States to your excellency, accrediting me as minister to reside near this government.

D.

[Translation.]

SIR: I am pleased with receiving the letter which credits you as minister resident of the United States of America to the government of the Argentine Republic; and I acknowledge the fraternal wishes you express in her name for our prosperity and aggrandizement.

The analogy of our respective institutions and the common interests of both countries will powerfully contribute, sir, as the result of your mission, to render even stronger, if it be possible, the bonds of perfect friendship which happily link them, testifying at the same time the excellency of the republican principles they both profess.

The people and government of the Argentine Republic do not forget what they are indebted for to the Great Republic in the recognition of their independence, and bearing in mind the high examples given them by her on the track they follow, I greet in their name, through your distinguished person, the people and government of the United States, praying for their happiness.

Mr. Worthington to Mr. Seward.

No. 4.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic, October 13, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, on the 3d of this month, of dispatch No. 2, dated August 19th, 1868, inclosing copy of dispatch No. 233, dated August 17th, 1868, addressed to James Watson Webb, esquire, United States minister to Rio de Janeiro. It is a source of congratulation that this question has reached a solution by the passage of the Wasp, as ordered by the government, and her return to this place on the 20th of September, with Charles A. Washburn, United States minister to Paraguay, and his family, on board. Mr. Washburn having informed me that he had transmitted elaborate dispatches by this steamer, I am relieved of the duty or necessity of writing much about the condition of affairs in Paraguay, or the movements of the allied armies. It is well to observe, however, that no important progress is being made, the situation being the same as mentioned in my dispatch No. 2. Yesterday, Mr. Sarmiento was duly and formally inaugurated President, and Dr. Alfonsa Alsina vice-president of the Argentine Republic. The ceremonies were impressive and orderly, nothing of an insubordinate or revolutionary tendency developing itself. The inaugural address of the President was well received, particularly those parts in "italics" in the copy I inclose with this dispatch. The diplomatic corps was fully represented, and after the ceremonies were over we called on the new President in a body and offered our congratulations. The cabinet or ministry is composed of able and, said to be, just men, and is as follows: Minister of the interior, Señor Delamacio Velez Sarsfield; minister of foreign affairs, Señor Mariano Varela; minister of agriculture and public instruction, Señor Nicholay Avellanda; minister of finance, Señor Benjamino Gorostiago; minister of war, Señor D. Martin Gainza, all of whom share largely the feelings of the President toward our government and people.

A magnificent demonstration was spontaneously accorded ex-President General Mitre, by the citizens of this city, on the occasion of the retirement from his high position; and it is at least suggestive of some improvement, that after the expiration of his constitutional term of office he handed over to his successor the government intact, the treasury comparatively full, and, though engaged in a war, the people enjoying a prosperity they never before realized; and to whatever position General Mitre may be called, I feel confident our government will always find in him a reliable friend. The question of the seat of the national government is again exciting much interest. Before the last session of the national congress adjourned they located it at Rosario, but it did not receive the sanction of President Mitre. In my judgment there is no reasonable probability there will be any change for some years to come.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

H. G. WORTHINGTON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT.

SENATORS, DEPUTIES, AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: After the solemn oath which I have just taken, it is needless for me again to promise that I will fulfill the laws and the constitution, by worthily exercising the authority conferred on me by my fellow-citizens. This is my duty, my fixed resolve, my highest aspiration. If rectitude of intention and a wish to do good are claims upon the aid of Divine Providence, I dare to hope that the blessings of Heaven will at last visit this part of the earth, so long abandoned to the errors and misfortunes that retard the progress of nations and their governments.

The attention of the country is at present naturally fixed, after so long and bloody a war, on the exorbitant sacrifices imposed on each and all of us for the common safety. I therefore hasten to assure you that the guiding spirit of my administration, and especially in the election of public employées, will be to insure, by every means, economy and integrity in the disposal of the national moneys. I shall also try to maintain our rising credit, the source of all wealth, by religiously fulfilling our obligations, and thus strengthening the confidence that the nation is acquiring both at home and abroad.

The constitution makes the President sole head of the administration, and I can therefore solemnly engage, since it depends on my own acts, that the administrative morality will be complete during my term of office.

I must also speak of the war wherein we are engaged, and the alliance in connection with the same. Nations have duties to perform in respect for their past history and their future prospects. A war abandoned in disgust of weariness, in 1827, did not give the much-desired peace for six months; and after breaking the links of union, there ensued a terrible tyranny and series of wars, that have not yet ended with the fall of Humaitá. The present war seems drawing to a close, but we must not be too sanguine, for all judgment is at fault when events depend on the caprice and unbridled passions of a semi-barbarous tyrant. We must never for a moment lose confidence, but strenuously prosecute the war till obtaining security for the future.

To offer peace to an enemy that does not sue for it after so many disasters, would be to change our position from conqueror to conquered. Such errors are always dearly expiated.

I trust that under my government the Argentine Republic will show itself worthy of its glorious antecedents, and maintain its high position among the nations of the world. I think that the alliance with Brazil and Uruguay nowise compromises the principles of our government, and I consider it not only lawful and necessary but highly honorable. This alliance will be maintained and faithfully observed while the security and honor of the republic so require.

The social and political bonds that hold a nation together should never be closer than when its honor and safety are threatened from abroad; and you know well how far the republic has been from offering such an example of duty, patriotism, and good sense, on the part of its sons.

Whilst some were filled with love of country, participating in its glory or disgrace, its greatness or humiliation, and rushed forward to the frontier for its defense, there were others who availed themselves of the occasion to take to the highways or join the Indians, thus increasing the confusion of the time and calling off the national forces, which should have been entirely occupied in the noble and heroic enterprise of saving the honor of our flag.

I am still ignorant of the names of the leaders who appeared in this obscure epoch, since they had attained no notoriety either in the social or the political sphere; I am not, however, ignorant of the duties of every government; and foremost is that of giving security to life and property, keeping the high-roads clear, and encouraging commerce and industry.

The constitution, in all free countries, admits not of discussion by force of arms. To take up arms against the Republic, no matter what the pretext, is an act of treason, and our constitution, after the model of the United States, provides the government with efficacious means to prevent such a calamity as that the people should curse the day on which their constitution was framed.

Meantime, I think I may promise you that the tranquility which has been disturbed in some places will speedily be re-established, and that the ill-advised persons who took up arms will quietly lay them aside, confiding in the national justice for a remedy for their complaints whenever such shall appear well-founded.

The evils that afflict the Argentine Republic are not of to-day's growth, neither are they peculiar to our country. The spectacle of provinces convulsed by insurrection has been a constant repetition for the last fifty years, with the same characteristics and features, and differing only in names and pretexts. These social phenomena are, moreover, reproduced throughout the rest of Spanish America, with only slight variations incidental to climate and other circumstances. Few states have become organized after sixty years of strife and contention, or can quietly set themselves down to work with security for the future.

Thus the evil is deeper than seems at first sight, and we see chronic causes producing everywhere the same results. To study the fatal causes of such prolonged inquietude would be the noblest task of our thinking men, and to cure them in their origin should be the great aim of our law-makers in Congress and the special study of government.

The insurrectionary movements that call in question every moment the solidity of our self-chosen institutions and impede our progress have their focus in the barbarism of the country districts and the ignorance and destitution of the poorer classes. The defense of the frontier presents the same features. All the efforts of successive governments, after half a century, have failed to protect the settlers from the Indians; and more than once we have seen the savage tribes invade our tribes as auxiliaries of this or that faction.

Public patience can no longer tolerate such evils, and the time has now arrived to see if our government is really what it ought to be under our republican institutions, namely, the means of distributing the greatest possible amount of felicity to the greatest possible number of individuals. A nation loves not its institutions unless when these conditions are fulfilled.

The work before us is even of a more pressing nature. We have inherited ignorant and destitute popular masses, and the uniformity and cohesion which are the essential conditions of all societies have been violated. The public powers are, nevertheless, called upon to foster liberal institutions on a soil thus badly prepared, and to combat the difficulties that obstruct the way.

Our situation is, however, neither desperate nor irremediable. If population is wanting to fill our extensive territory, other nations only ask from us security and protective laws, and will give us millions of men who constitute their superabundant population. If distances are enormous, steam shortens them. But, all these resources must be distributed and utilized by wise and even-handed laws, avoiding that, whilst the elements of civilization accumulate on the coast, the remainder of the country shall not be abandoned to barbarism, and that an apparent benefit shall not give rise to further calamities and disorders.

The public lands, under an equitable system of distribution, will fix the population that is to-day houseless, give a home to the thousands of emigrants that come in search of it, and put a stop to the depredations of the hordes of the desert, by effacing that very desert which is their theater and their element. Some organic laws on education will suffice to render the prosperity which we are bound to secure for future generations a reality. Nations, like individuals, have almost always to blame the recklessness of their fathers for the evils that afflict them.

To spread civilization over that part of the republic that is as yet deprived of its benefits, to provide efficiently for the defense of the frontier, to give security to property and life, are conditions as essential as the very compliance with constitutional precepts, because they all tend to the same end. A majority enjoying the liberty of being ignorant and poor does not constitute an enviable privilege for the educated minority of a nation which is proud of calling itself republican and democratic.

I repeat it again: the time has come to ponder seriously upon these grave social questions, since, fortunately, political ones are in a great measure settled.

The national sentiment that leads us, without any local preference, to interest ourselves in all that affects our common mother country, has assumed in these later years a deeper intensity. The nation acquires every day more consistence; and, thanks to the progressive development of that noble feeling that makes of an assemblage of individuals a social being animated by the generous passions of heroism and justice, we may soon hope that the name of Argentine will be associated in men's minds with those moral, intellectual, and progressive qualities that characterize a free and enlightened people.

The general progress of mankind comes also to our help. Men's blood is not spilt in vain for the supremacy of a principle; and its triumph, once obtained, does not become the exclusive patrimony of the nation that has been its redeemer. The abolition of torture, the disappearance of slavery, the liberty of conscience, the declaration of rights which we have inscribed in our constitution, are no conquest of ours, but a legacy which we are bound to preserve intact. In this category we can add to-day "The indissolubility of federal nations." A million of men, whose corpses have strewn the battle-fields, have put the seal for us and for all federal republics on this mighty principle. Henceforward there can be neither nullifiers nor separatists, but only traitors and criminals.

Thus far we may at any rate rest tranquil. Our political agitations will ever be preserved within the limits of the nationality which has cost our forefathers so much blood, and of the constitution which we ourselves have cemented by so many sacrifices.

I have thus sketched the policy of my government. I am not cowed by the difficulty of the undertaking, although I am not ignorant how much those who are called upon to assume the arduous task of governing are destined to suffer for their reputation and repose. I am bound to submit to this doom, since our mother country is not yet sufficiently well organized to afford enjoyment to those who are fortune's favorites. But I am overwhelmed by the confidence and the hopes reposed in me. Our history reveals to us that we possess the conscience of good much more than the patience and capacity to attain it. Many of those who tried it died in the attempt or in exile. It is only future generations that can revindicate the memory of those faithful servants who failed to be popular because they preferred being deemed worthy of esteem.

A majority has raised me to power without my having sought it; and I have, therefore, the right, on taking possession of the hard seat to which I am called, to ask that that majority may continue united, and not throw upon me alone the responsibility of its own government. I am bound, likewise, to ask that it may attract to its ranks all those who deserve to figure therein for their patriotic aims and their liberal ideas.

With regard to those who have opposed my election, I can only say to them, in the words that Jefferson addressed to his opponents, "That they have their own rights and position as citizens of this country, and that I have not received from the constitution any power to change them;" and will conclude by reminding them, with Lincoln, "That the electoral urn is the legitimate successor of bullets, and when the suffrage has declared itself, freely and constitutionally, the only appeal from its verdict is by consulting again the polling-booths of a subsequent election."

Protected by Providence, in whose help I confide, aided by the active co-operation of my fellow-citizens, guided by your prudent laws, honorable senators and deputies, enlightened by the wisdom of my councillors, looking to the constitution as a guide and to the force it places in my hands as an auxiliary, I shall attain the realization of some of the hopes that I have sketched, and shall deliver up to my successor the republic undivided, the revenue prosperous, a greater number of happy and educated men, the laws respected, and, perchance, although I scarcely hope it, the government the object of everybody's blessing.

Mr. Worthington to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, December 11, 1868.

SIR:

* * * * *

General McMahon, minister to Paraguay, having visited me here on the 8th of November and presented to me the instructions contained in the dispatch to him, to wit, "That I ascertain from the government of the Argentine Republic if all military obstacles to his passage up the river to his post of duty had been removed," I addressed a letter on the 9th of the same month to Mr. Mariano Varela, minister of foreign affairs, desiring said information, a copy of which letter is hereto attached, marked A. On the 10th instant an answer, desiring time to consider and consult, a copy of which is also herewith attached, marked B, with translation corresponding to letter. Immediately following the reception of letter marked B, the President of the republic, Mr. Sarmiento, communicated to me his desire to have me call on him. I accordingly did so on the 11th instant, and found him in a condition of high excitement arising from the report that was in circulation that the United States squadron, Rear-Admiral Davis commanding, intended to accompany General McMahon up the river, and if necessary force their way through the lines of the allied armies. Up to the time of this interview I was not informed of the purposes of Admiral Davis nor General McMahon; except of his intention to proceed to his post of duty. I was therefore unable and unauthorized to make any explanation to his excellency, otherwise than to remind him of the established policy of non-intervention which has been invariably pursued by our government. The President then remarked that "he was satisfied the United States would do nothing to embarrass the interests of the Argentine Republic," and that "my note of the 9th should receive an answer that should be satisfactory, but to do that he would be obliged to consult the special envoy of Brazil, Mr. Almaral;" to which I replied that "My instructions only required me to obtain the information desired from the government to which I was accredited."

Our interview closed with the most perfect good feeling, and I parted with his excellency more than ever impressed with the assurance of his kind and friendly disposition towards the United States.

On the 13th I received from the minister of foreign affairs the answer promised in his note of the 10th instant, a copy of which in Spanish, and a translation of the same, being hereto annexed, marked C.

General McMahon being in this city, making his arrangements for his journey up the river, I addressed him the letter, a copy of which I attach, marked D. I deemed it proper he should be prepared with all the information and correspondence in the event of any attempted delays or interference on the part of the Brazilian commanders.

On the 19th Rear-Admiral Davis arrived here on the Wasp, on his way up the river, followed by the Kansas, Pawnee, and Quinnebaug. His presence, and the presence of our vessels, had already excited much remark. The allies and their friends were highly delighted at the supposed hostile status of the United States towards Paraguay, in consequence of the conduct of President Lopez towards Mr. Washburn and the rights of his legation; while, on the other hand, those here anxious for peace, and in favor of anything that will effect that result, were equally elated, because they believed the presence of an American minister and the admiral might develop something that would facilitate a speedy termination of the war.

Directly upon the admiral's arrival, he, accompanied by myself and his staff, paid the usual visit of courtesy to the President, and we were all received by him with every mark of respect and consideration.

* * * * *

On the 21st of November I addressed the note, a copy of which is hereto annexed, marked E, which was answered on the 23d, a copy of which, with translation corresponding to letter, is hereto attached, marked F.

Directly after the reception by me of the note of minister of foreign affairs, dated the 13th, and marked C, Mr. Almaral, the special envoy from Brazil to the alliance, called on me and said, "He called especially to assure me of the pleasure it afforded him to unite and concur in the purposes indicated in that note; that no communication whatever had been submitted to Brazil on the question; by uniting his assent to that of the other allies, he hoped the United States would regard it as evidence of the justice and good disposition of the Brazilian government, it not having been consulted concerning it." I thanked him for this expression, and said I would communicate his friendly assurances to my government. Since then this minister has been recalled by his government for purposes of consultation.

On the 21st of November General McMahon and Admiral Davis left here on the Wasp, and (by steamboat arrived here last night) I hear had reached Paraguay and were in communication with President Lopez. I attach here an extract from the paper of to-day, which is the latest information from that quarter:

General McMahon, the American minister accredited to Paraguay, has gone up the river in company with the American admiral. His excellency General McMahon has reached Angostura, and has held an interview with Marshal Lopez. It is not thought probable that the difficulties created by Mr. Washburn will lead to anything very important. On the contrary, the general belief is that the arrest of Messrs. Bliss and Masterman will be fully and satisfactorily explained, and that General McMahon will use his best exertions to mediate, and thus bring this protracted war to a conclusion.

The allied army have at last made a movement, the difficult character and results of which we have yet no authentic information. They have, however, crossed into the Chaco, and a portion of the army recrossed so as to be in the rear of Villeta. Thus far, however, Lopez still remains at Villeta, showing no disposition to abandon that point. Even if the entire army should succeed in reaching the point desired, it would only compel Lopez to abandon the river and retire to the interior, and still prolong the war. The allies have demanded twenty thousand new troops.

* * * * *

Mr. Minister Washburn left here on the packet of the 12th of November, en route for Washington.

* * * * *

The state of affairs in the frontier provinces is in an extremely unsettled condition. While everything remains quiet in Entre Rios and Corrientes, serious revolts and disturbances have occurred in the province of Salto. I have every confidence, however, in the capacity of the existing administration, which I am confident will not only restore order in Salto, but afford more protection to the frontiers than they ever before received.

Don Manuel R. Garcia, at present secretary of the Argentine legation at Paris, has been appointed minister plenipotentiary to the United States. He is represented as a gentleman of fine cultivation, and, as assured me by the President, to employ his own language, "eminently worthy to represent the Argentine government in the greatest liberty-loving republic in the world."

It is with great satisfaction I can testify to the healthy condition of this country at present. This time one year ago the cholera was raging here with fatal fury. Thus far we have had none of it, nor do I hear of its existence in the armies. The sanitary arrangements are such, taught by last year's terrible lesson, that we may reasonably hope to be free from this most unwelcome visitor.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
H. G. WORTHINGTON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, November 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you of the arrival in this city of General M. T. McMahon, minister resident of the United States accredited to the republic of Paraguay, who is proceeding to Asuncion, the capital of said republic; and for the purpose of avoiding delays in the progress of his journey to his destination, I am instructed "to ascertain whether the military obstacles to his passage up the river to his post of duty have been and are now removed by and on the part of the government of the Argentine Republic."

I pray your excellency to pardon me when, in view of my absence from the city for several days, I solicit an early answer to this inquiry.

Cordially reciprocating the consideration with which your excellency honors me, and begging you to accept the assurance of my great regard, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

H. G. WORTHINGTON.

His Excellency Don MARIANO VARELA,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

FOREIGN OFFICE,
Buenos Ayres, November 10, 1868.

MR. MINISTER: I have made the President of the republic acquainted with the dispatch of your excellency, whereby I am informed of the arrival of General McMahon, minister resident of the United States to the government of Paraguay, and whereby I am requested to inform your excellency whether the military obstacles to his passing up the river have been and are at present removed on the part of the government of the Argentine Republic. As the inquiry of your excellency relates to the war we sustain against Paraguay, my government needs to come to an agreement with the representatives of the allies on the answer to be given to your excellency. This is the reason why, notwithstanding its good will, the Argentine government is compelled to delay that reply two or three days.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my high and distinguished consideration.

MARIANO VARELA.

His Excellency H. G. WORTHINGTON,
The Minister Resident of the United States of America.

FOREIGN OFFICE,
Buenos Ayres, November 13, 1868.

MR. MINISTER: The Argentine government has solicited the assent of its allies to resolve on the affair spoken of in the note your excellency made me the honor to address to me, dated the 10th of the current month; and I have the satisfaction to say, in answer thereto, that the allied governments order the generals of their respective forces not to put any obstacles to the transit of General McMahon, save that they find it necessary to delay him in the interests of the war operations that may be at the point of being executed, as it was declared in the recent case of the steamer Wasp. The allied governments are persuaded that General McMahon, understanding the importance of those operations and the interests depending on them, will contribute on his part so that they do not suffer any embarrassment.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the expressions of my highest consideration.

MARIANO VARELA.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, November 20, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a dispatch addressed me from the Argentine Republic in relation to your passage to the republic of Paraguay.

I have the honor to be, very truly yours,

H. G. WORTHINGTON,
Minister Resident to Argentine and Uruguay Republics.

His Excellency M. T. McMAHON,
Minister Resident of the United States to the Republic of Paraguay.

Mr. Worthington to Señor Varela.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, November 21, 1868.

SIR: In a general conversation which his excellency the President of the republic did me the honor to grant on yesterday, he expressed a desire to know "the purposes for which the ships of war of the United States navy, under Rear-Admiral Davis, commanding the South Atlantic squadron, were proceeding through the waters leading to the republic of Paraguay."

It affords me pleasure to assure your excellency that the presence of these vessels, as well as their purpose in prosecuting their voyage, in no manner tends upon the part of the United States to disturb the peaceable and friendly relations existing between our governments, and which I most earnestly hope and believe may be most happily continued.

Renewing the assurance of my most distinguished consideration, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

H. G. WORTHINGTON.

His Excellency MARIANO VARELA,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

FOREIGN OFFICE, ARGENTINE REPUBLIC,
Buenos Ayres, November 23, 1868.

MR. MINISTER: I have received the note of your excellency, dated the 21st instant, whereby your excellency is pleased to declare that the presence of the North American war vessels going up to Paraguay under Rear-Admiral Davis tends by no means on the part of the United States to interrupt the good and friendly relations existing between our governments, and that your excellency firmly believes and hopes they will be continued with every success.

My government cordially acknowledges this frank declaration, which credits once more the fidelity of the one which your excellency so worthily represents, and which (declaration) implies the noble promise of not using but towards peace and friendship between both countries the passage of the North American squadron by waters of the domain and sovereignty of the Argentine republic.

Begging of your excellency to be pleased to transmit to the government of your excellency this testimony of gratitude of mine, I have the honor to renew the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Petropolis, Monday, January 27, 1868.

SIR:

* * * * *
This country is greatly agitated in consequence of the continuance of the fruitless war against Paraguay, and I have, therefore, to-day addressed a note to the minister of foreign affairs, a copy of which you will find inclosed, marked A.
* * * * *

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. WATSON WEBB.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Webb to Senhor Paranaguá.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Petropolis, January 27, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to inform his excellency Joao Lustoza da Cunha Paranaguá, councillor to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, that he is in receipt of a dispatch from the Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, in relation to the war still pending between Brazil and her allies, against the republic of Paraguay, which declares that "the continuance of the war on the La Plata is a subject of deep concern in the United States."

In conformity with instructions to that effect, the undersigned again tenders to the belligerents the good offices of his government, and renews the proposals for mediation which he had the honor to submit on a previous occasion. And he is instructed to add, that while renewing the proposals heretofore submitted by the government of the United States in the interest of peace, the United States is neither tenacious of its own views nor jealous of the good offices of others. It belongs to the belligerent sovereign powers not only to choose the terms of peace, but the forms which should be adopted to secure it.

The undersigned is exceedingly desirous of avoiding everything which might, by possibility, be construed into a desire on the part of his government to intervene in the affairs of the different governments on the American continent. But the people of the United States have declared, through their representatives in Congress, that the pending war in the La Plata "is destructive of commerce and injurious and prejudicial to republican institutions," and the government of the United States, in obedience to instructions from Congress, renewed in February last, in the most formal manner, the tender of its good offices. When those good offices were declined, the undersigned was directed to "express to the imperial government the regret of the President and people of the United States, that the allies do not find it compatible with their rights and interests to avail themselves of the good offices of the United States, which were conceived in a spirit of entire respect and friendship for the several belligerents; and an earnest desire for the restoration of peace throughout the American continent." And Mr. Seward added:

"Not at all wedded to their own proposition, which has thus been disallowed, the United States will yet indulge a hope that the wisdom of the belligerent states will be competent to devise means, within a reasonable period, which may enable them to afford to their people the advantages and benefits of peace. Such measures being devised, any good offices that may be at any time required of the United States will be cheerfully rendered."

Another year of war has elapsed without apparently bringing the contest any nearer to a termination, and again the undersigned is instructed to tender the good offices of his government, and to inform Brazil "that the continuance of the war on the La Plata is the subject of deep concern in the United States."

The undersigned perceives with great regret the injurious effects of the pending war upon the labor, the commerce, the finances, and the general resources of the Brazilian empire, and he would be neglectful of his duty if he did not keep the government of Washington advised of these matters, and of the tone of public sentiment in regard to the war; at the same time that he fully exonerates Brazil from all responsibility in its occurrence, and most earnestly sympathizes with her in its continued protraction and most disastrous consequences. Deeply impressed with the expediency, if not the necessity, of an early termination of the war to Brazil, the undersigned experiences great satisfaction in renewing to Brazil the offer of the good offices of the government of the United States and the personal services of the undersigned, whenever they "may be at any time required," to bring to a successful issue any "measures devised" in the interest of peace, and calculated to benefit the people of the belligerents to this most disastrous war on the La Plata. The dangers to all parties from a continuance of the struggle are palpable, while the very serious consequences to the finances, commerce, labor, and future prosperity of Brazil are no longer matters of conjecture, but monstrous evils, absolutely present and brought home to the daily experience of all. That Brazil is, and has been, right from the beginning, no candid and intelligent man can for a moment doubt. But, whether right or wrong, the tax of this war upon the labor of Brazil, which is her one great want, cannot fail to check her prosperity for years to come; while its exhaustive strain upon her finances and future resources demands its termination at the earliest day compatible with the honor of the empire.

There are other considerations in favor of an early termination of the war, obvious to your excellency and the statesmen of Brazil, but to which it would be unbecoming in the undersigned to refer. It is manifest, however, that the people and the governments of the great commercial nations of the world are getting restive at the too probable continuance of a state of things in this region which promises no results. And while the government of the United States disclaims the remotest intentions of any, the slightest, interference with the purposes and actions of the belligerents, it may not shrink from conveying to Brazil the voice of its people, proclaimed through their Congress, that "the continuance of this war is a subject of deep concern," and that it is absolutely "destructive to commerce, and injurious and prejudicial to republican institutions."

The undersigned is happy to avail himself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the expression of his great personal esteem and most distinguished consideration.

J. WATSON WEBB.

Councillor to his Imperial Majesty, Minister and Secretary of State for War, acting as Minister of Foreign Affairs.

SIR: General Asboth, the United States minister resident at Buenos Ayres, died on the 21st January.

I sent to the Presidents of the Argentine and Uruguayan Republics copies of my communication to the government of Brazil, renewing the tender of good offices. You will find a copy of my letter inclosed, marked B.

Mr. Webb to Mr. Hollister.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES IN BRAZIL,
Petropolis, February 1, 1868.

SIR: In consequence of the impossibility of the late General Asboth's having received instructions from Washington, which left here on the day of his death, it has become my duty to renew to the Argentine and Uruguayan Republics the tender of the good offices of the United States, in connection with the war in the river Plate, which were rejected last year. You will oblige me, therefore, on the receipt of this, by delivering in person the letter addressed to the President of the Argentine Republic, and by mailing for Montevideo the one addressed to the President of Uruguay.

* * * * * * *

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. WATSON WEBB.

MADISON E. HOLLISTER, Esq.,
Consul of the United States, Buenos Ayres.

Mr. Webb to the President of the Argentine Republic.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES IN BRAZIL,
Petropolis, February 1, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, accredited to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, has just been apprised of the death of the minister resident of the United States accredited to the Argentine Republic. This melancholy event leaves the United States without any representative near your excellency, invested with the necessary diplomatic powers, to convey to the Presidents of the Argentine and Uruguayan Republics a renewal of the tender of good offices made by the United States, in 1867, for the termination of the pending war between the allies and the republic of Paraguay. And, in consequence, it becomes the duty of the undersigned to transmit to your excellency a copy of a communication made by him to the government of Brazil on the 27th ultimo.

If the late minister to the Argentine Republic had been alive when the mail from Washington, of the 25th of December, 1867, reached Buenos Ayres, beyond all doubt he would have conveyed to your excellency a similar communication. But Providence having interposed to prevent such a proceeding, it devolves upon the undersigned to convey to your excellency the earnest desire of the people of the United States to see peace restored on the La Plata, and the tender of the good offices of their government, to aid in bringing to a close the pending war between the allies and Paraguay.

The undersigned, therefore, in transmitting to your excellency a copy of his communication to the government of Brazil, has the honor to request that you will be pleased to consider it addressed also to the government of the Argentine Republic. And the undersigned is most happy to avail himself of the opportunity thus presented of conveying to your excellency the expression of his personal esteem and most distinguished consideration.

J. WATSON WEBB.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT of the Argentine Republic.

N. B.—I addressed a precisely similar note to the President of Uruguay.

WEBB.

Mr. Webb to Mr. Seward.

SIR:

* * * * *

Great excitement, attended with very great exasperation against the government, exists among all classes in Rio de Janeiro, in consequence of its neglect to accept of the renewed tender of our good offices. I studiously concealed the fact of our having renewed the offer previously rejected; but they deemed it expedient to proclaim through their official journal that such renewed tender of "good offices" had been made, and the subject referred to the consideration of their allies. In the mean time they promised the public an immediate triumph of their arms.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Petropolis, March 9, 1868.

SIR: I am happy to announce that the allied army and navy have achieved a great triumph over the dictator of Paraguay, and that in all probability the war in the river Plata is rapidly drawing to a close. Six of the iron-clads belonging to Brazil passed the fortress of Humaita on the 19th of February, and at the same time a combined attack was made by the army, which resulted in a complete victory over the enemy, and the capture of all the strongholds except Humaita, together with an enormous amount of munitions of war.

* * * * *

A revolution has broken out in the republic of Uruguay, and General Flores, the dictator, who had just abdicated in order that a President might be elected by the people, was assassinated in the streets by the leaders of the Blanco party. The outrage was followed by the slaying of one hundred and eighty of the Blancos; and thereupon order was restored in the city of Montevideo, where the Blancos are in a minority. In the country, however, they are in a large majority; and it would be idle to predict the final termination of this proceeding. The success of the allies against Lopez will go far towards restoring order in Uruguay. That success was most timely. Had it been delayed another three weeks at farthest, both Uruguay and the Argentine republics would have withdrawn from the alliance with Brazil.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[From the Buenos Ayres Standard, February 25. 1868.]

*GREAT NAVAL VICTORY—THE BATTLE OF HUMAITA.

The cannon of the Brazilian iron-clads, as they forced the passage of Humaita, has re-echoed over this continent, and will reverberate through Europe. No event of equal importance has occurred in this part of the world during the present generation; and, to the high honor of the Brazilian flag, it must be said that the naval victory achieved is every way worthy to rank with Aboukir or Trafalgar.

Brazil may well be proud of her victory, for not only will it give her the complete command of the Paragnayan river, and crumble the greatest bulwark of Paraguayan strength, but it has given a birthday to her naval power which posterity will revere.

Party feeling and political rancor may seek to strip this great naval victory of its magnitude, and attribute the success less to the bravery of the Brazilian sailor than to the worn-out and exhausted condition of the enemy; but we have it on the best of authority that the guns of the fortress were fired with the most incessant rapidity, and that such was the terrific effect of this awful discharge of heavy artillery, that the earth shook at Itapiru, a distance of seven or eight miles from Humaita, and the river dashed in billows on its banks. This proves that the guns of Humaita were well manned, and that notwithstanding the immense delays the enemy was well prepared to dispute the pass. Experienced American and English and French naval officers, who had seen Humaita, inspected the position, and gone through the batteries, all unanimously agreed on its extreme strength. For three years the greatest squadron ever known in these waters has ridden at bay below range of the guns; the difficult navigation of the river, the constant bends in the channel, all tended to convince a doubting and possibly jealous public that Humaita would never be passed by a Brazilian fleet. But Brazil has at last vindicated her honor and established a naval reputation before which the rest of South America must bow.

The passage of Humaita is equally a triumph of science, and we commend it to the attention of our naval men at home, that three Brazilian iron-clads, all built in England, survived for forty-two minutes the combined fire of one hundred and eighty guns, and this for at least half the time within pistol-shot range. We have nothing previous in naval history to equal this; on the contrary, naval men, since the memorable battle of Lissa, lost faith in these iron-clads; but we hold that the battle of Humaita establishes forever their supremacy, and Europe may take a lesson from the engagement. No fight in North America, no engagement in the open seas, can be compared with this memorable battle. The ships had to double the projecting headlands to make the canal, when they at once came within range of a raking fire from the London battery. They had to push on under this fire and hug the very shore where the finest artillery in South America were splendidly mounted to riddle them; up almost to the very mouths of the guns they had to steer, all the while enfiladed by 140-pounders from the opposite bank. Doubling again a slight bend in the canal, they came where the chains lay in the river, and the chain batteries facing on the left bank. Iron plates have, indeed, asserted their supremacy, when, for the space of forty-two minutes, three monitors could live under such a fire. And let us take nothing from the bravery of the officers and men who dared almost certain death to carry their flag triumphant in such an hour. No, the Brazilian commander has proved the bravest of the brave, and he and his men merit the highest recompense their country can afford.

The fortress of Humaita is not of yesterday's formation. If it took three years to humble, it took ten times that to erect. The earnings of a whole nation, the wealth of a country, aided by the best engineering talents Europe could afford, have all been brought into subserviency to render Humaita impregnable. None who have ever seen the place have questioned its strength. Old President Lopez had such implicit faith in its impregnability that he believed if even Xerxes attacked Paraguay he could not pass Humaita. The same implicit confidence in its strength was inculcated in the minds of the Paraguayan people. Their watchword was "Humaita!" and possibly to the exaggerated idea of its strength by the present Lopez may be traced the grave political errors which, step by step, led this unfortunate man from the cautious policy of his father to become the great champion of river Plata equilibrium.

Brazil, by this victory, has flung open the navigation of Paraguay to the world. Shall we question the importance of this engagement when such are the results? It may be that the hardy Paraguayans will still cling round the banner of their unconquered leader; it may be that on the hill-tops in their native country they will light watch-fires, and dispute inch by inch their native soil with the invader.

Already this extraordinary people have given proofs of courage and patriotism which wrings, even from their enemies, admiration and respect. But, in the interest of humanity, we now appeal for peace. The chief and great object of the war is at last at hand. Humaita, and not Lopez, was the real stumbling-block in the way; the stupidity of South American politicians tolerated its erection; the blood of thousands has at last washed away its battlements.

The victory, in a political and in a moral light, is complete; and if this war has cost millions of treasure and torrents of blood, we trust that its results to the river Plate and Brazil will be commensurate.

GREAT VICTORY OF THE ALLIES—STORMING OF FORT "ESTABLECIMIENTO."

At dawn on the morning of the 19th the whole allied line advanced and simulated an attack on the enemy's lines at Tuyuti, Tuyu-Cue, and even facing Tayi. The outposts of the Paraguayans returned the fire, but for some time the divisions did not come up. A little after daybreak an immense rocket, seen all along the lines, shot into the heavens, the signal that the monitors had passed the Humaita fortress, and heavy guns from the north proved that the iron-clads were shelling Humaita from the north, while the rest of the squadron kept booming from their old position.

Suddenly the shrill Brazilian trumpets were heard to echo in the woods, and a picked force, the finest the Brazilian army could boast of, about sixteen or seventeen thousand strong, emerged from the encampment, headed by Marshal Caxias. The men marched in close column, and, when approaching the trenches, came under a tremendous fire; but the Brazilian legions pushed on, nothing daunted, and never halted until they came upon the bristling bayonets of the heroic garrison. The Paraguayans fought with their wonted heroism, but nothing could withstand the charge of the Brazilians; they leaped the ditches, and in an instant poured in on all sides on the strongest fort outside of Humaita.

As might be expected, the carnage was terrific, for before the serried columns of the Brazilians got to the trenches fully five hundred men lay stretched on the plain. The Paraguayan officer in command, a young man named Gill, finding it impossible to hold out, drew off his men in good order, and got into Humaita; but the place is even more important than Curupaity; it is the key to Humaita. The guns were not spiked, and are now in the hands of the Brazilians. The position is, however, very exposed for the allies, and difficult for Caxias to retain over twenty-four hours, unless Humaita falls. The adjoining fort, Laureles, it was thought, would surrender, being cut off from Humaita by the allies.

STILL LATER.

CORRIENTES, February 23—6 a. m.

Fighting still going on. Two iron-clads gone up to bombard Asuncion, and were attacked by several chatas from the Chaco side.

One of the Brazilian commanders and a pilot blown to pieces in passing Humaita. Paraguayans still working trenches. Lopez has electric light in the Chaco.

THE WAR IN THE NORTH—ATTACK OF HUMAITA—OFFICIAL DISPATCH.

FUERTE ESTABLECIMIENTO, February 19.

To his Excellency BARON DE HERVAL:

I have the extreme pleasure of informing your excellency that at 5 a. m. this morning I commanded an attack, with part of the troops which had been brought up from Tuyucue, against a fort of the enemy's called Establecimiento, which is a little beyond Laureles, and a place of the greatest importance to Lopez for maintaining communications and facilitating the supply of cattle.

The fort was surrounded by two deep ditches and formidable earthworks, on which were placed at convenient points fifteen light field-pieces. The garrison was about one thousand six hundred strong.

Against this formidable battery our men advanced openly, and the bravery of the attack well merited the success with which it was eventually crowned. After a stubborn resistance the garrison were overpowered, and retreated disorderly across the adjacent bogs, pursued by our victorious battalions.

The enemy's loss is from five hundred to six hundred killed, and leaving in our possession, besides the fifteen mounted guns mentioned above, a large quantity of arms and ammunition held in reserve. On our side there were about six hundred hors de combat, including killed and wounded.

Your excellency will please not fail to forward at once as many carts as you can secure, even at the expense of commercial interests. These measures are of the utmost importance, so that the wounded and prisoners should not remain long exposed here.

This evening I purpose sending to San Solano the two brigades which suffered most in the attack, the remainder staying to occupy the position.

I purpose leaving immediately for Tuyi, to confer with the Captain del Mar y Guerra, Delfin Carlos de Carvalho, whom, as I have just been informed by Field-Marshal Victorino, forced the passage of Humaita at daybreak to-day with the monitors and iron-clads. My object in conferring with the gallant admiral is to plan our subsequent movements, following up our present successes.

Congratulating your excellency on these glorious events, I have the honor to remain, CAXIAS.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

CORRIENTES, February 20.

As I announced in my last, the attack on Humaita was inevitable. Time, the great test of all things, has proved the truth of my assertion. The great and long-expected attack on Humaita has taken place. The invincible stronghold of tyranny and the bulwark of the only little corner in free America where haughty oppression ruled has been overcome by the Brazilian iron-clads.

A division of the imperial navy, consisting of three iron-clads under the command of Carvalho, at half-past three yesterday morning forced the passage of Humaita. At the same time the wooden fleet kept up a steady fire on the land batteries at Curupaiti and at Piris and Paso Pucti.

The army, from 2 o'clock in the morning, stood ready to attack along the entire line from Tuyi to Tuyuti. At 3 a. m. a feint attack was made, and then the squadron commenced to force the pass, which took forty-two minutes to effect. The iron-clads suffered very little. The moment Caxias knew of the fleet having passed, he ordered the whole line to fall back.

The Brazilians having taken two important fortresses to the north of Humaita, Lopez is cut off from the Gran Chaco; it is impossible, therefore, that Humaita can hold out much longer.

The monitors can run up the Tebicuari, and thus facilitate the crossing of the allied army, in order to attack Lopez's reserved force stationed behind that river. In a few months it is possible, therefore, the war will be over.

Marshal Caxias deserves the highest praise for his tactics, which have led to such an important success.

On the morning of the 17th an ugly fight took place between Paraguayan and Argentine forces; the latter lost eighty men and a commander, and the enemy lost about the same.

THE WAR IN THE NORTH.

GRAN CHACO, February 18.

GENTLEMEN: On the 13th I left Itapiru in one of Mr. Lanuz's steam transports, loaded with commissariat stores, bound to Curuzu. The recent heavy cannonade heard in that direction impelled me to the undertaking. In due time we arrived at La Guardia Cerrito, where a short stay was made in order to land cargo. Here were four Brazilian gun-boats, a bomb vessel, five pontoons, six sea-going sailing vessels, (mostly Dutch,) seven transport steamers, besides a number of river craft. Here is also an arsenal well supplied with all the paraphernalia necessary to promote the rapid progress of civilization and the swift onward march of intellect. Guns, mortars, large piles of cannon-balls, and shells, explosive shot of every description, iron, timber, and heaps of coals, containing many thousands of tons, and an extensive machine shop; in fine, the Ports-month of the naval forces stationed in Paraguayan waters. Also may be seen a neat, decent chapel, hotels, billiard tables, not forgetting a photograph concern, a hundred or more stores of sutlers, who have been driven out of their shanties by the freshet, and have taken refuge upon a strip of high ground near at hand, which is overrun with snakes, lizards, rats, toads, spiders, scorpions, ants, and every other species of horrible vermin near at hand. Judging from the numbers of empty brandy casks, the smashed demijohns, and bottles seen in all parts, the consumption of alcoholic drinks must be very large, particularly of Hamburg gin, English ale, or "vin ordinaire." The place is under strict military rule.

Proceeding on the voyage, we pass a gunboat anchored at the entrance to the Laguna Piris. Shortly after, we passed the Brazilian transport Donna Francisco, which has lately been sunk in consequence of having come in collision with an iron-clad. The transport has since been got afloat, and is now moored to a clump of willow trees upon the coast of an island, in company with a gunboat.

Six leagues distance from La Guardia Cerrito we reach the fleet of gun-boats at anchor in the stream, abreast of the abandoned works of Curuzu, and go alongside of the commodore's ship for orders. Here were eight gun-boats, two bomb-sketches, four sea-going vessels, a floating battery, seven pontoons, and a few river craft.

Opposite the fleet, upon the Chaco side, is the entrance to the arroyo, (Anglice "dirty creek," and a very objectionable place to remain at, even for a short time,) which we enter; it is scarcely twenty yards wide at its mouth, and has the same breadth for five miles, which was as far as we navigated. It inclines to the westward, following a serpentine course. The current is scarcely perceptible; the water is very black, has an offensive smell, brackish, and highly insalubrious. Infamous as are the bogs and fens of the Estero Bellaco, yet there it is a paradise in comparison. At the mouth of the arroyo, upon the left bank, is the starting point of the railroad which goes close to the brink of the creek, following all its sinuosities. For a distance of three miles from the starting place there is not a trace visible of the railway, other than pieces of floating timber; all else appertaining to the road is deeply submerged, the land on all sides, far and near, covered with stagnant water, a perfect hotbed of pestilence, abounding with tormenting insects. At a league's distance from the main stream the ground is higher, where the rails are in places discernible. Here are numerous abandoned ranchoes, (the huts that served the Brazilian soldiers as quarters,) and earthworks partly under water, the garrison of which has been ejected by the creechente, and have taken a new position upon higher ground further inland, where they are fortifying themselves again, and building new huts with all possible expedition. We perceived two shining bright brass guns in the abandoned works, the water reaching up to their muzzles, a sad proof of the deficiency of mother wit. However, the new works are amply supplied with efficient artillery; still, it would be well to remember the fate of the Whitworth gun, that, since its capture, has caused much mischief to the allies.

From where the railway becomes visible, it leaves the creek, taking a northerly course; hence to where the iron-clads are the distance is two miles; in places the ground is miry, the rails sunk in the mud; of course, as a means of transportation the railway is of no avail.

In the mean time the necessities requisite for the beleaguered iron-clads have to be carried upon the backs of mules, or in tumble-down carts, which are continually sticking fast in the pantanos. I must not omit to mention that the sleepers of the track are of hard Brazil wood, a foot broad, of a suitable thickness, and are placed a vara asunder, to which the rails are permanently fixed; a telegraphic line accompanies the track. The Brazilians have explored the arroyo forty leagues inland, and found it to be navigable thus far, flowing through a well-timbered country, inhabited by a few families of filthy Guaycuru Indians, whose sole shelter from the inclemency of the weather is the branches of trees, being too lazy to build huts; as for planting, they never do it, living upon carpinchos, ostrich eggs, and wild honey. Like all other barbarians, they are exceedingly fond of strong drinks and tobacco.

Upon the right bank of the arroyo, at a mile's distance from its mouth, and a little way in the interior, are seen the vestiges of the ancient "Mission" of San Fernando, where the Jesuit Dobrizhoffer labored twenty years, and here composed a Latin history of the Alipone Indians, a work which long since has been translated into every European language; quoted by Southey, Sir Woodbine Parish, Commodore Page, and others. Late in the evening of the 13th, the three monitors passed Curupaíta. As soon as perceived, the battery opened a furious cannonade. The only damage done by it was striking the hindmost monitor twice, doing no injury whatever, while the gunboats sent a very storm of shot and shell at the enemy's works, probably without causing much effect. On the 16th one of the Newcome monitors, under the command of Señor Ioquim, passed the obstruction at Humaita, and returned in triumph. Yesterday there was a report of an encounter at the Tuyu-Cuó; that Pipo, the commandant of the foreign legion, and one hundred of his men, had been killed. We do not vouch for the truth of the statement; still there was much firing in that quarter at the time, and subsequently the distant vessels were seen with colors at half-mast.

GRAN CHACO, February 20.

GENTLEMEN: Yesterday, at 3 a. m., the long-contemplated move to force the passage of Humaita was made, when an unheard-of cannonade commenced, which was truly awful; the heavy artillery of the iron-clads and monitors was fired in rapid succession, while the guns of the fortress were quickly plied. This continued till 10 a. m. without a moment's pause; the reports came faster than one could count; those of the enemy made the loudest sound, as the mounds of their guns were pointed in the direction of the Chaco, while those of the Brazilians were directed in an opposite way. Both parties made a lavish use of shells, explosive shot, and Congreve rockets. A dense cloud of white smoke covered the horizon as the firing was going on. As for the results of the infernal din, all that can be said with certainty is, that three iron-clads and three monitors have passed the obstruction, and are above Humaita, where they are annoying the enemy from the north, while those that remain below are not inactive. On board of the gunboats there is a grand display of bunting, music, and much glee. Nothing is known positively of the affair other than the iron-clads and monitors were maltreated somewhat in the passage, and the fortress badly mauled. It could not be otherwise, as the cannonade was kept up at close quarters.

It is now 12 m.; firing of heavy artillery has been going on at intervals since early dawn. It is the prevalent belief that Humaita will soon surrender. It is out of the question to forward any details at the present moment that may be relied upon. All is wild excitement and bustle. The weather is awfully hot, particularly so for the past few days.

Truly yours,

SINBAD.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 27th of January last, No. 57, has been received.

Your proceeding in renewing the tender of the good offices of the government of the United States to the government of Brazil, with a view to the restoration of the peace on the Parana, is approved and commended.

To guard, however, against possible misapprehension, I think it proper to say that the President is not to be understood as adopting or sanctioning that portion of the communication which you have made to the Brazilian minister and secretary of foreign affairs, in which you remark that you fully exonerate Brazil from all responsibility in the occurrence of the war. This government has at no time thought it necessary or expedient to assume to pronounce on the merits of that unhappy and protracted controversy.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 6th of February, No. 58, has been received. It contains our first official or reliable information of the lamented death of the late Major General Asboth, United States minister resident at Buenos Ayres; accredited also in the same capacity to the government of the Oriental Republic. As the deceased had been a gallant and effective soldier at home, so he was an enlightened and indefatigable representative of the country abroad. His death is deplored by the President, and will awaken profound sorrow throughout the United States.

The letter which you addressed to Madison E. Hollister, United States consul at Buenos Ayres, on the occasion of the minister's death, is approved; as also are the letters which you addressed to the President of the Oriental Republic, renewing the tender of the good offices of the United States for the establishment of peace among the nations upon the banks of the Parana.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Montevideo, March, 1868.

MR. MINISTER: The Oriental government had the honor to receive, in due time, your communication, dated the 1st of February last, addressed to the President of the republic, and containing a copy of your note to the minister of foreign affairs for the empire of Brazil, renewing, by order of your government, your good offices for the settlement of the war now carried on by the allied countries against Paraguay, hoping, by an amicable intervention of the United States, to come to a solution that may prove satisfactory to the belligerents.

Recent lamentable events that have occurred in this city, now known to the world, deeply disturbed the government internally, and prevented a more prompt reply to your important communication; but now that the country is restored to its constitutional order, the President thinks this a propitious moment to answer your note, and instructs the undersigned to do so in the following manner:

Some time ago the worthy minister of the United States, in the name of his government, sent to the minister of the republic a communication similar to the one you have just sent, expressing a sincere wish to settle the question now debated between the allied countries and Paraguay in a just and honorable manner.

At that time the provisional government regretted to be obliged, for reasons communicated to your government through its minister, to reject the mediations so freely and sincerely offered.

We are sorry to say, Mr. Minister, that the same reasons still exist for refusing the pacific proposition of your government, and therefore the President, through the undersigned, respectfully informs you that it is impossible to take the note of the United States government into consideration in such a manner as to receive the proposed result, because the same reasons given to your government by our minister for not accepting the proposal still exist. All we can say in this communication is to request you to thank your government, in the name of this republic, for the new proof of friendship and interest for the well-being of this country which has just been received from the North American government.

Moreover, Mr. Minister, the latest news from the seat of war, announcing that the Brazilian squadron had passed the battery of Humaita, gives good cause to expect a speedy conclusion of the war.

Having thus replied to your communication, by order of his excellency the President, the undersigned has the honor to present you the assurance of his very high and distinguished consideration.

JOSÉ. E. ELLAURI.

His Excellency J. WATSON WEBB,

Envoy Extraordinary, &c., from the United States to Brazil.

Senhor Elizalde to Mr. Webb.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Buenos Ayres, March 24, 1868.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your note of the 1st of February last, making known to his excellency the President the renewal of the proffer of good offices made by the United States of America to put an end to the war pending between the Argentine Republic, the empire of Brazil, and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, and the government of Paraguay.

In thanking you for that communication, made because your government was without diplomatic representation here, owing to the death of the minister resident accredited to the Argentine government, I have the pleasure to inform you that the allies were consulted in regard to the answer to the friendly offers of the government of the United States, and this was done for want of diplomatic representation, which obliged you to transmit the documents that came to hand in due time.

I am pleased to have this occasion to repeat to you the assurances of my high and distinguished consideration and esteem.

Minister Plenipotentiary, &c., from the United States to Brazil.

RIO DE JANEIRO, DEPARTMENT FOR FOREIGN RELATIONS,
April 8, 1868.

The undersigned, of the council of his Majesty the Emperor, minister and secretary of state for affairs of war, and ad interim of foreign affairs, has before him the note which, under date of 27th January last, General James Watson Webb, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, was pleased to address to him, renewing the offer of good offices of the government of the United States for the termination of the war with Paraguay, and the proposals for mediation, which, with this object, were presented in a note of 21st January, of the year last past.

As I declared to General Webb when I acknowledged the reception of his note of the 27th, I had to hear from the allies of the empire before giving a definitive answer.

This obligation of loyalty discharged, I now have the honor to state to the general, after thanking him in the name of the imperial government for this fresh proof received of the friendly feelings of the people and government of the United States towards Brazil, that the same reasons continuing which were already explained in the note from this department of the 26th of April of last year, which would prevent the government of Brazil and her allies from accepting at that time the first proposition of the United States, and, beyond that, the close of the war approaching, as was to be hoped from the important fact of the passage of Humaita, and the events which have followed, the same government cannot at this day act differently. Thus, therefore, the imperial government thanks, but feels that it cannot accept the generous proffer which is made to it, and trusts that the United States will acknowledge that she is justified in her action.

The undersigned avails of the occasion to offer to General Webb the reiterated assurances of his highest consideration.

No. 68.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Rio de Janeiro, July 7, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a communication from Rear-Admiral Charles H. Davis, commanding the United States South Atlantic squadron, in which he advises me that the United States steamer Wasp, sent by him to Asuncion to bring from there our minister, Mr. Charles A. Washburn, and family, and thereby remove them from their "embarrassing and possibly dangerous situation," has been prevented passing the lines of the allies by the Marquis de Caxias, the Brazilian commander of the allied forces.

You will perceive from the correspondence accompanying Admiral Davis's communication, that the United States steamer Wasp arrived at Curupaiti, the headquarters of the allies, on the 25th of April, and remained there until the 11th of June, forty-seven days, when her commander was compelled to return to Montevideo without accomplishing the object of his visit, in consequence of the persevering refusal of the Marquis de Caxias to permit the steamer Wasp to pass up to Asuncion, although he was very willing to send a Brazilian iron-clad up the river under a flag of truce and the protection of the stars and stripes, to spy out the state of affairs in Paraguay. Nay, he was quite willing that on the return of the iron-clad she should, similarly protected, pass Humaita and land Mr. Washburn and family below that fortress, which iron-clad, it is said, cannot repass that strong hold!

The admiral's report of what has occurred on the Paraguay was placed in my hands on the 1st day of July, and on the 2d, at 2 p. m., my private secretary and clerk of this legation placed in the hands of the minister of foreign affairs the official note of which inclosure B is a copy.

I assume that your opinions, as expressed in dispatches 170, 171, 174, and 180, and the instructions therein in regard to Mr. Washburn's detention in going to his mission—there being no other mode of reaching it than by the Paraguay River—are equally binding upon me in regard to his return, when, at your request, a national vessel has been sent for him in the well-grounded conviction that "the settlement of this annoying question" in 1866 was a finality. The offense at that time perpetrated against the "sovereignty and honor of the United States" might be palliated on the plea of ignorance, but not so now; and consequently its repetition by the Marquis de Caxias, and the circumstances under which it has taken place, are doubly offensive, and doubtless are intended so to be. Such, at all events, is public opinion here; and as the fact of the Wasp's return was officially known to this government and communicated to the press eight days before the admiral made his communication to me, and as up to this time it has not leaked out that I have moved in the matter, the triumph of Brazil is considered complete.

You will perceive by my note to the minister of foreign affairs that I assume the Marquis de Caxias has acted without authority, and that his conduct will be apologized for and disapproved; and, thereupon, I demand his censure in the language you used in instructing me to make a similar demand in reference to the conduct of the President of Maranhão, and consequently I urge the immediate issue of instructions to permit one of our national vessels to proceed to Asuncion without delay or hindrance from the allied forces at Curupaiti.

* * * * *

I have recently asked for a furlough, and considering the state of my health and that of my family, there are those who, if I demanded my passport, would ascribe my doing so to my desire to return to the United States, even at the sacrifice of the peace of the country. To avoid this imputation, therefore, and at the same time be within reach of instructions from you, I shall, if compelled to demand my passport, repair to Buenos Ayres.

Besides the mail line of steamers to Brazil, England has two commercial or freight lines to Rio. One of these, from Buenos Ayres, will touch here about the 12th instant. By that time the intentions of this government will have been communicated to me, and I shall of course write to our legation in London the necessary telegram, to be transmitted to you by the Atlantic cable.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Webb to Senhor Silveira de Souza.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San Domingo, July 1, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, begs leave to inform his excellency João Silveira de Souza, councillor to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, that he has this day received a communication from Rear-Admiral Charles H. Davis, commanding the United States South Atlantic squadron, informing him that the United States steamer Wasp, sent by him to Asuncion for the purpose of bringing from that city the United States minister, Charles A. Washburn, and family, has been prevented by the commander of the allied forces from going to Asuncion, as her commanding officer was ordered to do, in the performance of a duty to which he was assigned, by command of Admiral Davis, in obedience to instructions from the Secretary of the Navy, based upon an application from the Hon. William H. Seward, the Secretary of State of the United States; and, in consequence of such grave denial of the rights of the United States, the commander of the steamer Wasp, after making repeated applications to pass the lines of the allies engaged in a war against the government of Paraguay, has returned to Montevideo, and reported to the commanding officer of the United States South Atlantic squadron that he has been prevented from executing the duty upon which he was detached by the peremptory refusal of the commander-in-chief of the allied forces, the Marquis de Caxias, to permit him to pass his lines on the Paraguay.

This very extraordinary and most unjustifiable proceeding on the part of Marquis de Caxias, "commander-in-chief of all the Brazilian forces, and, in the interim, of the allied armies," as he signs himself, is in open defiance of the rights of the United States, and, in view of what transpired between the undersigned and the government of his Imperial Majesty in August, 1866, is an outrage against "the sovereignty and honor of the United States" which calls for prompt and severe censure of the offender.

When, in 1861, the President of Maranhao outraged the feelings of a friendly nation by admitting the pirate Sumter within his port, and furnished her with the necessary coals and provisions wherewith to continue her depredations upon the unarmed and unprotected commerce of the United States, and when the then minister of foreign affairs justified that act of the President of Maranhao, the Secretary of State of the United States said "the proceedings of the President of Maranhao, and the approval of his conduct by the minister of foreign affairs, is intolerable," and the undersigned was directed to "ask that such measures shall be taken in regard to the case as will make the President of Maranhao sensible of his Majesty's displeasure."

The proceedings of the Marquis de Caxias against the "sovereignty and honor of the United States" is far more offensive than was the conduct of the President of Maranhao, because he well knew that in 1866 the United States had formally advised Brazil that she would permit no such violation of her sovereign rights, and that Brazil had thereupon reconsidered and reversed her offensive action. He has therefore acted with full knowledge that he was grossly offending the sovereignty and honor of the United States, and setting at defiance its remonstrances and the recognition of those remonstrances by Brazil.

Rear-Admiral Davis, in his official note to the undersigned, says: "Acting under instructions from the Secretary of the Navy, I recently sent the United States steamer Wasp, of my squadron, to the seat of war, for the purpose of taking Mr. Washburn and family out of Paraguay, in compliance with a request from the Secretary of State to relieve Mr. Washburn from his embarrassing and probably dangerous situation." This humane purpose on the part of the government of Washington has, your excellency well knows, been thwarted by the representative of Brazil on the Paraguay, he well knowing at the time that he was outraging the "sovereignty and honor of the United States," and setting at defiance the explicit understanding at which the United States and Brazil had arrived in 1866.

The undersigned therefore feels it his duty to ask such censure of the Marquis de Caxias as, in the name of his government, he demanded when the President of Maranhao offensively placed the piratical vessel of parties in rebellion against the United States on a footing of equality with the national ships of the friendly nation against which they were in rebellion.

That Brazil will promptly and most emphatically repudiate the extraordinary and very unfriendly conduct of the Marquis de Caxias, the undersigned does not for a moment doubt; and as his indefensible interference has already caused a delay of at least four months in relieving the United States minister and his family from what his government consider an "embarrassing" and possibly "dangerous situation," the undersigned earnestly entreats that the government of Brazil will, without any unnecessary delay, issue instructions that all hindrance to the United States steamer Wasp passing through the lines of the allies be withdrawn, and promptly advise the undersigned that such hindrance has altogether ceased, in order that he may inform the commanding officer of the United States South Atlantic squadron that there will be no further interference by any representative of Brazil with the performance of his duty to humanity and to his government.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurance of his respect and high consideration.

J. WATSON WEBB.

His Excellency JOÃO SILVEIRA DE SOUZA,
Councillor to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor,
Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Admiral Davis to Mr. Webb.

UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP GUERRIERE, (1st rate,)
Rio de Janeiro, July 1, 1868.

DEAR SIR: Acting under instructions from the Secretary of the Navy, I recently sent the United States steamer Wasp, of my squadron, to the seat of war for the purpose of taking Mr. Washburn out of Paraguay, in compliance with a request from the Secretary of State to relieve Mr. Washburn from his embarrassing and probably dangerous situation. The commander-in-chief, Marquis de Caxias, declines to allow the Wasp to go up to Paraguay, and while he professes a desire to facilitate Mr. Washburn's departure, he proposes such methods of accomplishing it as are regarded by Mr. Washburn either as impracticable or illusory. It would be very gratifying to me, as a means of carrying out the wishes of the department, and very acceptable to Mr. Washburn, whose desire to leave Paraguay shows itself plainly in his letters, if you would procure an order from the government here to the commander-in-chief to allow the Wasp to go up the Paraguay to a convenient point of embarkation.

President Lopez offers no obstacles to Mr. Washburn's departure, but, on the contrary, promises to aid it.

The inclosed copies of a correspondence with Mr. Washburn and the Marquis de Caxias will make you acquainted with the relations of the parties, and will save my writing a long letter.

Very respectfully and truly, your friend and obedient servant,

C. H. DAVIS.

His Excellency J. WATSON WEBB,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in Brazil, Boa Viagem.

Mr. Washburn to Commander Kirkland.

HEADQUARTERS PARAGUAY ARMY,
San Fernando, May 14, 1868.

SIR: Your two letters of April 26 were received by me in Asuncion on the 7th instant. In your official note you advise me of the arrival of the Wasp, under your command, at Curupaiti, and that you are in readiness to take me, my family, and effects on board, and convey me to such point on the Rio de la Plata as I may prefer. You are probably aware that all land communication between this point and Curupaiti is very difficult, and that it would be impossible or nearly so for my wife, child, and servants to reach the latter place except by way of the river. You are also aware that for military reasons the Paraguay steamers do not go so far down the river. In order therefore that my family may be put on board the Wasp it is necessary that it should come higher up the river. I have therefore come down to this place to consult with his excellency Marshal Lopez, and ascertain if the military situation were such that the Wasp could without risk or difficulty come up the river to near this place. His excellency advises me that there will be no objection made on the part of Paraguay, and that the steamer can come without inconvenience to such point below the mouth of the Tebicuary as may be signaled on her arrival. At such point the transfer of all persons and effects from a Paraguay vessel may be easily made.

His excellency not only interposes no objections, to the coming up of the Wasp, but with great kindness and courtesy he has offered me letters to the commanders of the two fortified places on the river between here and Curupaiti, in which he has given orders that on your arrival at those places you will be allowed to pass without molestation. These letters I inclose to you herewith to be delivered by you accordingly as they are addressed. His excellency President Lopez has also offered kindly to provide a pilot for the steamer from Humaita to and above Timba, should it be found necessary. I think therefore you will have no difficulty in coming up to near this place.

With your letter of the 26th April I also received one, dated April 4, from Mr. Hollister, United States consul in Buenos Ayres. In this he advises me that a few days before he had delivered to the honorable Mr. Borges, Brazilian minister in Buenos Ayres, a package of correspondence, including dispatches from Washington, from Admiral Davis, and from Minister Webb, besides private letters, and that he had promised to forward them with a letter to the Marquis de Caxias, requesting him to pass them through the military lines. The consul also advised me that he had been presented with a bill against me for some provisions that had been sent some months before, and that he would notify you of the fact, that you may look for them and take them on board if you found them, and bring them up the river to me. But neither the dispatches nor the provisions have ever reached me, and you make no mention of having looked for them in your letters. It is very important that I receive everything intended for me before the Wasp returns, and I trust you will try and find all that may have been sent, and bring it with you.

I return immediately to Asuncion to have everything ready on being notified of your arrival near this place. There being constant telegraphic communication between here and the capital, you will probably be detained but a short time before all would be ready for your departure. The point on the river where you will probably come to anchor is off a place called Tacuaras, where there is a guard-house and some soldiers stationed. It is but a short distance below the Tebicuari.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

Commander WILLIAM A. KIRKLAND,
Commanding U. S. Steamer Wasp, off Curupaiti.

Mr. Washburn to Lieutenant Commander Kirkland.

HEADQUARTERS PARAGUAY ARMY,
San Fernando, May 15, 1868.

SIR: Since writing my letter of yesterday President Lopez has given me some further information in regard to the navigation of the river above Humaita. His officers at all points will be advised beforehand of your coming, and when a little below Humaita you can communicate with the comandante, and deliver to him the order of President Lopez, and he will furnish you with a pilot to take you above Humaita, when you can put him ashore and move on towards Timba. As you approach you will do well to bear a little to the left, though keeping a good distance from the shore. Here you can communicate with the officer in command as at Humaita, and there pass on until you get near the mouth of the Bemajo. At this point it will be necessary to make a particular signal that the guard there may know that it is not an enemy, and that it is the same they have been advised of beforehand, and been ordered not to molest. The signals that the guards will be instructed to look for will be as follows: A stern the American flag as usual, at the fore the Paraguay flag, and an American flag at each of the other two masts: thus having up three American and one Paraguay flags. Another precaution, that probably will not be necessary, will be, in case there should be any signs after passing the Bemajo that the orders given by President Lopez have not been fully understood, to dip the two forward flags, the Paraguayan and the one at the mizzenmast. It is not apprehended, however, that this will be necessary, as orders will be sent to all points describing the steamer and giving the signals. But no special signals from the steamer until you get near the mouth of the Bemajo will be required.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

Commander WILLIAM A. KIRKLAND,
Commanding U. S. Steamer Wasp, off Curupaiti.

Lieutenant Commander Kirkland to the Marquis de Caxias.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP,
Curupaiti, May 22, 1868.

SIR: I have this day received a communication from his excellency Charles A. Washburn, minister resident of the United States at Asuncion, Paraguay, in which he says as follows:

"You are probably aware that all land communication between San Fernando (the headquarters of the army of Paraguay) and Curupaiti is very difficult, and that it would be impossible, or nearly so, for my wife, child, and servants, to reach the latter place, except by way of the river. You are also aware that, for military reasons, the Paraguay steamers do not go so far down the river. In order, therefore, that my family may be put on board the Wasp, it is necessary that it should come higher up the river, and his excellency Marshal Lopez advises me that there will be no objection on the part of Paraguay, and that the steamer can come to such point below the mouth of the Tebicuari as may be signaled on her arrival; at such point the transfer from a Paraguayan vessel may be easily made."

Under the above specified circumstances, therefore, I have the honor to request that your excellency will allow the United States steamer Wasp to pass through the allied fleet anchored below and above Humaita, in order that the said vessel may proceed to Tucuará, below the mouth of the river Tebicuari, for the purpose of embarking his excellency Mr. Washburn, with his family and private effects.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. A. KIRKLAND,
Lieut. Com. U. S. N., Comd'g U. S. S. Wasp.

His Excellency Marquis DE CAXIAS,
Marshal and Commander-in-chief of the Allied Army in operation against the Government of Paraguay.

The Marquis de Caxias to Lieutenant Commander Kirkland,

[Office of Commander-in-chief of all the Brazilian forces, and for the time being of the allied armies operating against the government of Paraguay.]

HEADQUARTERS IN PERA-CUÉ,
Before Humaita, May 23, 1868.

ILLUSTRIOUS SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of the note dated the 22d instant, directed to me by Lieutenant Commander W. A. Kirkland, of the United States steamer Wasp, which reached me yesterday at 7 o'clock p. m.

Lieutenant W. A. Kirkland asks my permission for the steamer under his command to pass the Brazilian squadron, the division lying below Humaita, and that which forced its passage above, and to continue on up as far as Tucuará, below the mouth of the river Tebicuari, in order to receive on board Mr. Washburn with his family and baggage. Commander William A. Kirkland bases his request on the reasons given him by the above-mentioned Minister Washburn, which may be reduced to the following:

1st. The great difficulty which exists at present in the land communication between San Fernando (the headquarters of the army of Paraguay) and Curupaiti, which renders it impossible, or almost so, for his excellency, his family and servants, to arrive at the last-named place, except by water transportation.

2d. That since for military reasons the Paraguayan steamers do not descend the river so far, Minister Washburn infers that in order for himself and family to leave Paraguay, it is necessary that the United States steamer should go to some point below the mouth of the Tebicuari, signaling its arrival there; that Marshal Lopez advises him that there would be no opposition to all this on the part of Paraguay; and that, finally, at the point above mentioned, it would be easy to transfer to the North American steamer Minister Washburn and family, servants, and baggage, arriving there in a Paraguayan vessel.

In reply, I will commence by expressing to Lieutenant Commander W. A. Kirkland the great regret I feel at not being able to comply with his request, in which I am governed by considerations of the first importance and of manifest propriety.

Those military reasons of which his excellency Minister Washburn speaks as preventing the Paraguayan steamer from coming so far down the river, and which indeed hardly admit that they should go to the point indicated below the mouth of the river Tebicuari, are the same that govern me and place me in the disagreeable position of not being able to accede to the wishes of his excellency Minister Washburn and of Lieutenant Commander W. A. Kirkland.

Operations and movements of war which shortly have to be carried into effect near the place indicated as the destination of the North American steamer render it less suitable and convenient for the proposed object of the worthy commander, whom on this occasion I ought to inform that a few days since a Paraguayan steamer, the Pirabete, I judge, in despite of these military reasons, arrived at Pilar, where she was seen and watched, and where she fired several cannon shots on shore.

What I have here briefly stated to Lieutenant Commander Kirkland does not mean that I intend to obstruct, in the least, the departure of his excellency Minister Washburn and his family from Paraguay.

If I cannot accede to the means proposed, I will point out another method which will produce the same result, uniting all the advantages prescribed by the laws of nations and of war for the observance of belligerents and neutrals. Let his excellency Mr. Washburn embark his family, servants, and baggage, as soon as may be convenient to him, in a Paraguayan steamer, which, with a flag of truce, can come down the river as far as Pilar or as Tagy. His excellency will find at either of these points all the vehicles of transportation which may be necessary to carry his family and baggage by land as far as Curupaity, for which I will give immediate orders, satisfied that his excellency Minister Washburn will make a comfortable journey until he embarks on board the steamer Wasp at Curupaity.

You herein see, Lieutenant Commander Kirkland, the good will and earnest desire that prompt me to aid his excellency Mr. Washburn in leaving Paraguay and in going wherever he wishes.

The reply of Lieutenant Commander Kirkland will guide me in taking the measures and the orders that may be necessary.

I cannot omit improving this opportunity of tendering to Lieutenant Commander W. A. Kirkland the assurances of my high consideration and perfect esteem.

M. DE CAXIAS.

Lieutenant Commander W. A. KIRKLAND,
Commanding North American Steamer Wasp.

Lieutenant Commander Kirkland to Mr. Washburn.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP,
Curupaity, May 23, 1868.

SIR: Your communications of the 14th and 15th instant were received by me on the 21st instant. On the 22d I wrote to the Marquis de Caxias, and asked permission to pass through his fleet, in order to reach Tacuara, below the mouth of the river Tebicuary, for the purpose of embarking yourself, family, &c. On the 23d, (this afternoon,) I received his answer, which was partly as follows:

"In reply, I must express to Lieutenant Commander William A. Kirkland the great regret I feel in not being able to comply with his request, being forced to this by considerations of great importance, and moreover it would be very improper to do so. The military reasons given by Mr. Washburn why the Paraguay vessels could not descend so low, and why they might not be permitted to go to a certain point below the mouth of the Tebicuary, are agreed to by me, and put me in the unpleasant position of being obliged to deny the request of Minister Washburn and Lieutenant Commander William A. Kirkland, whom I must now inform that, a few days ago, a Paraguayan vessel, (the Pirabete, I think,) contrary to all supposition, came down as far as Pilar, where it was seen and watched, and whence several cannon shots were fired towards the shore."

The marquis then goes on to say, if Mr. Washburn will embark in a Paraguayan steamer and come down the river to Pilar or Tagy, with a flag of truce flying, that he will meet at either of these two points all the vehicles which may be necessary to transport his family and baggage to Curupaity by land; and he concludes his letter by assuring me that he will give the necessary orders, and that you shall be well provided for. He even goes so far as to say that he is convinced you will have a comfortable voyage until, in Curupaity, you embark on board the Wasp.

The admiral is in Rio, and has sent me no orders. Therefore, if you wish to, and can come, it will be advisable to accept M. de Caxias's offer, otherwise a very long delay may occur. Let me know at once whether I shall expect you. Your letters, I understand, were returned to Mr. Hollister at Buenos Ayres. Your other articles I have heard nothing about; but it must be all right, as you have the bill.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. A. KIRKLAND,

Lieutenant Commander U. S. Navy, Commanding U. S. S. Wasp.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States at Asuncion, Paraguay.

Lieutenant Commander Kirkland to the Marquis de Caxias.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP,
Curupaiti, May 24, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 23d instant, in which you state that you cannot satisfy the request made in my communication to you of the 22d instant, which was to the effect that the United States steamer Wasp should be permitted by you to pass through the allied fleet, and as far up the Paraguay river as a point called Tacuara, below the mouth of the Tebicuary river, for the purpose of receiving on board the United States minister resident at Asuncion, his excellency Charles A. Washburn, with his family, servants, and baggage.

Your excellency, as I understand it, proposes that the American minister, Mr. Washburn, should come to Pilar or to Tagy in a Paraguayan steamer, with a flag of truce, and that at one of these points to be agreed upon, your excellency will cause to be provided such transportation as under the circumstances may be fitting and necessary to bring himself, family, and baggage to Curupaiti by land. As the mission here of this vessel is to embark the American minister, your refusal to permit the United States steamer Wasp to pass through the allied fleet and up to Tacuara for that purpose, leave me only one course to pursue. I shall, therefore, inform his excellency Mr. Washburn of your answer and your courteous offer, and shall await his reply.

In conclusion I have to request that you will cause to be forwarded at an early moment the accompanying letter to his excellency Mr. Washburn at Asuncion.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. A. KIRKLAND,

Lieutenant Commander U. S. Navy, Commanding U. S. S. Wasp.

His Excellency the Marquis DE CAXIAS,

Commander-in-chief of all the Brazilian forces, and, in the interim, of the allied army in operations against the government of Paraguay.

Marquis de Caxias to Lieut. Commander W. A. Kirkland, U. S. N.

[Office of the Commander-in-chief of all the Brazilian forces, and for the time being of the allied armies in operation against the government of Paraguay.]

HEADQUARTERS IN PERA-CUÉ,
Before Humaita, May 25, 1868.

S. Sa. Lieut. W. A. KIRKLAND,

Commander of the North American Steamer Wasp:

I have to acknowledge the receipt of the note dated the 24th instant, sent me by Lieutenant Commander W. A. Kirkland, commander of the North American steamer Wasp.

In reply, I communicate to you, to-day, that, as you will perceive by the accompanying copy of a report made to me by the Baron of Passage, commander of the advanced division of the Brazilian squadron, the note directed to Mr. Washburn, American minister at Asuncion, was delivered to-day to a Paraguayan officer appointed to receive it, at the enemy's fort in front of Timba.

As soon as a reply comes to hand I shall hasten to transmit it to Lieutenant Commander W. A. Kirkland, to whom I reiterate the assurance of my consideration and esteem.

M. DE CAXIAS.

Baron of Passage to Marquis de Caxias.

TAMANDARÉ, (iron-clad,) Off the Island of Guayaqueru, May 25, 1868,

ILLMO. EXMO. SR.: In execution of your excellency's order of yesterday, inclosing a letter from Commander Kirkland, commanding the North American gunboat Wasp, to the American minister, residing in Asuncion, which order reached this division at 4.30 p. m., I set out immediately in the monitor Para; but arriving at night at the camp in front of the island Guayacaru, I returned in the monitor, and this morning I went in the Tamandaré to the enemy's fort fronting Timba, near which I delivered the letter in question to a Paraguayan officer who came in a boat to receive it.

God keep your excellency.

BARON OF PASSAGE,
Commander of Advanced Division.

His Excellency MARQUIS DE CAXIAS,
Commander-in-chief, &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Lieutenant Commander Kirkland.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asunción, June 3, 1868.

SIR: Your interesting letter, bearing date of the 23d instant, has been received. In it you advise me that you had asked permission of the Marquis de Caxias to pass through the allied squadron, which request had not been acceded to, but that he had promised that if myself and family would go down the river in a Paraguay steamer as far as Pilar or Tagy, he would provide all the vehicles necessary to transport us to Curupaity. In answer to this proposition of his excellency the marquis, I have only this to say, that the state of Mrs. Washburn's health is such that it is quite out of the question for her to think of making the proposed journey by land. Besides this, I consider that the Marquis de Caxias has no right whatever to prevent the passage of the Wasp above the squadron. I had supposed that all questions of that sort were settled by the case of the Shamokin. It is true that the Brazilian government on that occasion said it would protest, but when our government was informed of this, the Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, wrote to our minister at Rio, Mr. Webb, that he "would not even consent to argue the question." Since the passage of the Shamokin, the French, English, and Italian gunboats have all been allowed to pass above the squadron, and, so far as I know, without any protest or other objection being made. By what authority of law or justice do they deny to the United States rights and immunities that are freely granted to other nations?

The proposition of the marquis, that if we are so disposed we may go by land, is similar to that which was made to me by the Paraguayan government, in the case of the Brazilian minister, Senhor Vianna de Lima, after the taking of the Marquis de Olinda and the suspension of his diplomatic relations. When I interfered in his behalf, I was told he could go by land. But I rejected the proposition as absurd, and my conduct in that matter was highly approved by the Brazilian government and press, while that of Paraguay was universally condemned by both. Does the Marquis de Caxias expect me to accept terms for myself and family that I would not accept for a Brazilian minister? Will you please call his attention to this, if you have the opportunity?

You inform me that the admiral is in Rio, and that he has sent you no orders. Probably he did not anticipate that the allies would renew their discourtesy and unlawful proceedings towards the United States after the lesson they received at the time of my coming to Paraguay. He could not suppose that after the question of right had been established, and the allies had repeatedly conceded it by allowing the war vessels of other nations to pass unquestioned, that the Marquis de Caxias would have the assurance to deny to the Wasp the same right. In my opinion, your legal rights to pass were so clear and well established, that you were under no obligations to ask his permission, but only, as a matter of courtesy, to notify him of your arrival, and that in fulfillment of your instructions you would find it necessary to pass above his squadron. Of course, not knowing what your instructions were from the admiral, I therefore am not competent to give a definite opinion. But if they were similar to those of Captain Crosby when he came up with the Shamokin, you would have been justified in taking that course. And if you had no instructions at all, it would have been the same, as since the passage of the Shamokin the Brazilians have repeatedly recognized the right of neutral gunboats to pass the blockade. Under all the circumstances, therefore, unless you have positive orders to the contrary, my opinion is that on receipt of this you should advise the Marquis de Caxias that, for the reasons I have given, his proposition that we should go by land from Pilar or Tagy to Curupaity cannot be accepted, and that therefore you will be under the necessity to pass through the squadron. Should he reply that he will not permit it, but will stop you by force, I should nevertheless start, and if he fires across your bows, then I should come to and fall back below the squadron and wait further orders. But do not on any account leave the river, or go below Corrientes, till so ordered. After having vindicated our rights a year and a half ago so effectively, let us not abandon them and have the whole work to do over again. It is a national question, and your position is one of great responsibility; and the government, I am satisfied, will sustain you in a firm and determined course. So far as I may and can do it, I take all responsibility of the course which I have recommended. If, after all, you should fail to pass the blockade, will you please advise the admiral of our situation here: that the family of the United States minister resident in Asuncion are, by the act of the Marquis de Caxias, virtually detained as prisoners in Paraguay. I say the family, for, of course, were I alone, I could go through the Chaco, or by any route through which there is military communication, and my departure would depend on emergencies or on instructions received from the State Department, as it must finally in any case.

You inform me that my correspondence referred to in my letter of the 14th ultimo has been returned to Consul Hollister. That is certainly a very strange proceeding, and looks like a trick so that I should not get it. You might, however, I would suppose, have sent us a few newspapers, or clippings from newspapers, to inform us of what is transpiring in a world from which we have heard nothing for the last seven months. If, however, you do not come up, you will probably write me again very soon. In that case do try and send us some news. Very likely the dispatches returned to Mr. Hollister will have come back by that time, with others additional. Also try and learn something of the provisions, and bring or send all and everything of mine that you can. Our necessities are very great.

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

Lieut. Com. WILLIAM A. KIRKLAND,
Commanding United States Steamer Wasp.

Commander Kirkland to the Marquis de Caxias.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP,
Off Curupaiti, Paraguay River, June 8, 1868.

SIR: I yesterday received a communication from his excellency Charles A. Washburn, minister resident of the United States at Asuncion, Paraguay, extracts from which I herewith submit for your excellency's consideration.

His excellency Mr. Washburn writes as follows, viz:

"In answer to the proposition of his excellency the Marquis de Caxias, to furnish all necessary transportation by land from Pilar or Tagy to Curupaiti, I have only to say that the state of Mrs. Washburn's health is such that it is quite out of the question for her to think of making the proposed journey by land. Besides this, I consider that the Marquis de Caxias has no right whatever to prevent the passage of the Wasp above the squadron. Since the passage of the Shamokin, the French, English, and Italian gunboats have all been allowed to pass above the fleet. By what authority of law or justice do they deny to the United States rights and immunities that are granted to other nations? In the case of the Brazilian minister to Paraguay, Senhor Vianna de Lima, after the taking of the Marquis de Olinda, when I interfered in his behalf, I was told he could go by land, but I rejected the proposition as absurd. Does the Marquis de Caxias expect me to accept terms for myself and family that I would not accept for a Brazilian minister? Since the passage of the Shamokin the Brazilians have repeatedly recognized the rights of neutral gunboats to pass the blockade, and if you should not be allowed to pass through the allied fleet, you will please advise the admiral of our situation here, that the family of the United States minister resident are, by the act of the Marquis de Caxias, virtually detained as prisoners in Paraguay."

Having thus brought to your excellency's notice the situation as set forth in Mr. Washburn's letter, I shall await for twenty-four hours, or longer if necessary, any communication which you may wish to direct to me in reply.

And assuring your excellency of the continuance of my high esteem, I remain your obedient servant,

W. A. KIRKLAND,
Lieut. Com'r U. S. Navy, Com'g U. S. Steamer Wasp.

His Excellency the MARQUIS DE CAXIAS,
Marshal and Commander-in-chief of all the Brazilian forces, and in the interim of the allied armies in operation against the government of Paraguay.

The Marquis de Caxias to Commander Kirkland.

[Translation.]

[Office of the Commander-in-chief of all the Brazilian forces, and for the time being of all the allied armies in operation against the government of Paraguay.]

HEADQUARTERS PERA-CUÉ,
Before Humaita, June 8, 1868.

I have the honor to submit the following reply to the note of this date, addressed to me by Mr. William A. Kirkland, commanding the American gunboat Wasp.

I have read with due attention the letter of his excellency Mr. Washburn to Lieutenant Commander Kirkland, a copy of which was transmitted in the note to which this is a reply, and it gives me pain to perceive that Mr. Washburn declines to accept the plan which I had the honor to propose to him for conveying from Paraguay his family, his servants, and his effects, with every convenience and perfect security.

Lieutenant Commander Kirkland will oblige me if he will have the goodness to communicate to Mr. Washburn my regret that among the reasons assigned for his rejection of my proposition is the ill health of Mrs. Washburn, for whose recovery I sincerely pray.

With regard to the conclusions drawn by Mr. Washburn from the passage of the United States steamer Shamokin, and of the French, English, and Italian gunboats, it appears to me that they furnish no grounds for the opinion expressed by Mr. Washburn, that it is the intention of the allied powers to deny to the United States that which they have conceded to other neutral nations.

In order that Mr. Washburn may agree with me, it will be sufficient for his excellency to recall the prevailing circumstances at the period to which he refers, of the actual state of the operations of war, and also the point to which these vessels were allowed to ascend, which was Curusir, beyond which they did not pass, and where they were always in sight of Brazilian men-of-war. Moreover, I did not then direct the operations of war.

The generous conduct of Mr. Washburn in behalf of the Brazilian minister, Vianna de Lima, in Paraguay, and his kind interposition, based upon the clearest and most definite provisions of the laws of nations, cannot be adduced by his excellency as a motive by which I am to regulate my conduct at the present juncture, and in the distinguished position which I occupy as commander-in-chief of the allied armies and director of the war. His excellency must remember that the existing circumstances at that time were very different from the present.

The capture of the steamer Marquis de Olinda, and of her passengers and cargo, and the violence attempted against the Brazilian minister in Asuncion, without any previous declaration of war, show the unscrupulousness of the Paraguayan government in violating, in order to injure Brazil, all the laws and principles unanimously accepted by refined and civilized nations.

Mr. Washburn himself must admit, in his own mind, that the act of reciprocity on my part, which, in recalling the past, he appears to expect, would lose this character and assume the proportions of the most flagrant dereliction of the duties imposed upon me by my position.

Happily, the ground of my action in the proposition which I made to his excellency, through Lieutenant Kirkland, is independent of the judgment or will of any individual, and recommends itself to the impartial discrimination of all who examine it.

His excellency Mr. Washburn must be aware that the allied forces on shore and afloat occupy at present, and operate in, all the territory which extends from Paso da Patria to Tebicuari, conflicts actually occurring in all the intermediate space, and showing that the operations of war are in the greatest activity. It is but a few days since some of the iron-clad steamers of the advance division ascended the river, and they ought to be now at Tebicuari, or past it, while at the same time a column of the army marched in the same direction. This proves undeniably all that I have before said, for it is a fact that they are in the territory of the belligerents, and not in that where Mr. Washburn is, who resides in the capital of one of the belligerents.

Were it not for the painful information which Mr. Washburn furnishes us of the unsatisfactory state of his wife's health, malevolence might attribute to his excellency intentions, which I take pleasure in being the first to deny the possibility of his excellency entertaining.

My desire to fulfill the wish of Mr. Washburn to leave Paraguay with his family is so great and so sincere, and so far am I from concurring in the slightest degree in his excellency's remaining with his family and his servants in this situation, which his excellency calls that of prisoners in Paraguay, that I am going to offer him the only means which occurs to me which is in my power, and which, with my best judgment, I place at his disposal.

I will give orders that one of the Brazilian vessels of war above Humaita shall go up the river with a flag of truce to receive his excellency, his family, his servants and effects, at the point on the river previously indicated by his excellency, and this steamer on its return shall disembark his excellency at the nearest possible point to Humaita, or pass that fortification with the consent of the government of Paraguay, so that his excellency may be able to move immediately from her to the United States gunboat Wasp.

Lieutenant Kirkland, to whom I renew the assurances of my esteem and consideration, will transmit this answer of mine to his excellency Mr. Washburn, with the well-founded hope on my part that his excellency will accept the arrangement I propose to him.

M. DE CAXIAS.

Lieut. Com. W. A. KIRKLAND,
Commanding United States Steamer Wasp.

Commander Kirkland to the Marquis de Caxias.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP,
Curupaiti, June 9, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of June 8, in which you say that you still offer to Mr. Washburn the only means that are within your attributes, and which you place at his disposal with the greatest cordiality. The means are, as I understand it, these: That your excellency will send one of the Brazilian war steamers which have passed Humaita, with a flag of truce, to receive his excellency Mr. Washburn, and family, at that point of the Paraguay river which Mr. Washburn shall previously indicate to you, and that this steamer shall land Mr. Washburn either at the nearest point possible to Humaita, or that it may pass that fortification, with the necessary concurrence of the government of Paraguay, and that his excellency Mr. Washburn can then pass on board the United States gunboat Wasp.

Your excellency undoubtedly gives me credit for a knowledge which I do not possess, of that usage of warfare which permits one of the belligerents, by the use of a flag of truce, to pass by the fortifications and into the heart of the enemy's country without molestation. I know that the Paraguayan government would be guided by a very false sense of courtesy did it permit such an act by a Brazilian vessel of war.

His excellency Mr. Washburn, the United States minister, could not embark in a Brazilian vessel in the enemy's lines without being fired into, and perhaps attacked in other ways, which event would at once create a difficulty between his own government and that of Paraguay, and I must therefore decline any such proposition as the one which your excellency now wishes me to forward to the representative of the United States.

Your excellency makes an allusion to intentions which you say malevolence might well attribute to the United States minister at Paraguay, but your excellency does not explain those intentions. A conversation, however, sought by one of the members of your staff, leads me to believe that your excellency thinks that the family of President Lopez might seek protection under the American flag, and that to prevent such an occurrence you will not allow the United States steamer Wasp to pass through your fleet. The fact of virtually detaining as prisoners the United States minister and family in Paraguay, in order to prevent the suspected escape of the feminine and infantine portion of President Lopez's family, is so unreasonable that it savors strongly of extending the dangers and difficulties of war to women and children.

I have already pointed out to your excellency the reasons why I decline your proposition of the 8th instant, and I have only to add that my vessel was sent here to remove the United States minister and his family with the least delay. I am now no nearer the accomplishment of that end than on my arrival, owing to the unsatisfactory and temporizing nature of the correspondence which I have had to carry on. I shall, therefore, unless your excellency grants permission for the Wasp to pass the allied fleet, proceed to-morrow, the 10th instant, at 3 p. m., to lay before my government the actual state of affairs, in order that prompt and active measures may be taken for the removal of his excellency, the American minister, from Paraguay.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. A. KIRKLAND,
Lieut. Com'r U. S. Navy, Com'g U. S. Steamer Wasp.

His Excellency the MARQUIS DE CAXIAS,
Marshal and Commander-in-chief of all the Brazilian forces, and in the interim, of allied armies in operation against government of Paraguay.

Commander Kirkland to the Marquis de Caxias.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP,
Curupaiti, June 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication for his excellency the United States minister to Paraguay, in which I have stated to him your excellency's proposition of the 8th instant, and also my reasons for declining such proposition.

I also forward to your excellency a box and a package for Mr. Washburn, from the United States, which I have not hitherto sent to him because I expected to receive him on board. As your excellency's action has thwarted such expectation, I have the honor to request that you will cause to be forwarded to his excellency Mr. Washburn, at Asuncion, the accompanying letter, box, and package.

And assuring your excellency of the continuance of my high esteem, I am, your obedient servant,

W. A. KIRKLAND,
Lieut. Com'r U. S. Navy, Com'g U. S. Steamer Wasp.

His Excellency the MARQUIS DE CAXIAS;

Marshal and Commander-in-chief of all the Brazilian forces, and, in the interim, of allied armies in operation against government of Paraguay.

Lieutenant Commander Kirkland to Mr. Washburn.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP,
Curupaiti, Paraguay River, June 10, 1868.

SIR: Your note of June 3 was received on the 7th instant. On the 8th I wrote to the Marquis de Caxias, giving him all your opinion, and calling his attention to the delicate state of Mrs. Washburn's health. On the 9th I received an answer, in which he says:

"The report of the delicate health of Mr. Washburn's worthy spouse might arise from malevolent intentions, which I will not venture to attribute to his excellency.

"As Mr. Washburn expresses the desire to quit Paraguay with his family, and complains that he is kept a prisoner there, I freely offer him the only means in my power to escape from his unpleasant situation.

"I will order one of the Brazilian war vessels to pass Humaita with a flag of truce, and go up to receive Mr. Washburn, his servants and baggage and family, at any point he will indicate in Paraguay, and then return with them, passing Humaita, with the consent of the government of Paraguay, and place them on board the United States steamer Wasp."

To which I replied:

"Your excellency undoubtedly gives me credit for a knowledge which I do not possess, of that usage of warfare which permits one of the belligerents, by the use of a flag of truce, to pass by the fortifications and into the heart of the enemy's country without molestation. I know that the Paraguayan government would be guided by a very false sense of courtesy did it permit such an act by a Brazilian vessel of war. His excellency Mr. Washburn, the United States minister, could not embark in a Brazilian vessel in the enemy's lines without being fired into, and perhaps attacked in other ways, which event would at once create a difficulty between his own government and that of Paraguay; and I must therefore decline any such proposition as the one which your excellency now wishes me to forward to the representative of the United States.

"Your excellency makes an allusion to intentions, which you say malevolence might well attribute to the United States minister to Paraguay, but your excellency does not explain those intentions. A conversation, however, sought by one of the members of your staff, leads me to believe that your excellency thinks that the family of President Lopez might seek protection under the American flag, and that to prevent such an occurrence you will not allow the United States steamer Wasp to pass through your fleet. The fact of virtually detaining as prisoners the American minister and his family in Paraguay, in order to prevent the suspected escape of the feminine and infantine portions of President Lopez's family, is so unreasonable that it savors strongly of extending the dangers and difficulties of war to women and children."

The Marquis de Caxias wishes to temporize and gain time. Your suggestions about what I am to do cannot of course be attended to; I shall therefore leave this at 3 p. m. to-day, provided nothing happens to prevent; and if Caxias does not say "yes" to the passing up, I shall proceed as rapidly as possible to Buenos Ayres, where I hope to catch a steamer bound to Rio. It will give more force to the affair than if I remain quietly here, and the admiral can at once act up to the emergencies of the case.

I imagine Caxias cannot take Humaita, and therefore wishes to be removed from command for some other cause; and if our government takes up the matter as it should, the allies will have to "eat dirt" very soon.

I know nothing of your correspondence, or of your provisions. I send to Caxias to forward to you a box of papers and books, and one package from Washington.

I should recommend adherence to your plan not to embark in a Brazilian vessel within Paraguayan lines, as I think this vessel will be sent back immediately, with orders to pass the allied fleet; and besides, they have no right to hoist a white flag inside of Lopez's lines for the purpose of traversing almost the half of his territory.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. A. KIRKLAND.

Lieut. Comdr. U. S. Navy, Commanding U. S. S. Wasp.

His Excellency C. A. WASHBURN,

Minister Resident of the United States at Asuncion, Paraguay.

Mr. Webb to Mr. Seward.

No. 70.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Rio de Janeiro, July 22, 1868.

SIR: By the steamer to Marseilles on the 15th I wrote to the legation in London to telegraph to you that immediately after the sailing of the English steamer to Southampton I received a response to my demand of the 1st, which you have. * * * * I inclose it with the translation used, tied together, and marked No. 1.

After the receipt of this dispatch, I was waited upon by one of the under-secretaries of foreign affairs to talk over matters. Our interview, however, had no result, except that I told him plainly that the ministry had no alternative but to recede from their position and let the Wasp go up, quarrel with the United States, or resign.

* * * * *

SATURDAY, July 25, 1868.

I had another interview with Mr. Souza yesterday, in the hope that I might make sufficient impression upon this government to induce it to recede, but it is all in vain.

* * * * *

You will probably receive this on the 22d or 23d of August. The French mail steamer sails from Bordeaux on the 25th, and from Lisbon on the 28th of August, and of course a telegram, with information, instruction, &c., &c., put on board by our minister or consul, would reach me on the 16th of September. In like manner a telegram to our minister in London or Lisbon, to leave Southampton on the 19th or Lisbon on the 12th September, would reach me on the 2d October; while I could not receive a reply to this by our steamer until the 20th October, unless indeed it should arrive in time to send a response by the steamer of 22d August. * * *

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Senhor de Souza to Mr. Webb.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, CENTRAL SECTION, No. 4.

Rio de Janeiro, July 9, 1868.

The undersigned counselor to his Majesty the Emperor, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, has the honor of acknowledging the receipt of the note which, under date of the 1st instant, was addressed to him by General James Watson Webb, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary for the United States.

In that note, General Webb communicates the following:

That he received, on the date above, an official dispatch from Rear-Admiral Davis, commanding the United States squadron in the Southern Atlantic Ocean, informing him that the American steamer Wasp, sent by him to Asuncion for the purpose of bringing away from there the Hon. Mr. Washburn, United States minister, and his family, had been prevented from ascending to that city, as her commander was ordered to by the said rear-admiral, in compliance with instructions received from the Secretary of the Navy, at the request of the Hon. Mr. Seward, Secretary of State for the United States; that, in consequence of such a grave disregard of the rights of the United States, the commander of the steamer referred to, after repeated requests for permission to pass the war lines of the allies, returned to Montevideo, declaring to the commander of the American squadron that he had not been enabled to fulfill his mission, as the refusal he had received from the general commander-in-chief of the allied forces was peremptory; that such extraordinary and unjustifiable proceeding on the part of the general commander-in-chief of those forces, the Marquis of Caxias, is in direct opposition to the rights of the United States; and, in view of what was agreed upon in August, 1866, between General Webb and the Brazilian government, is an outrage upon the honor and sovereignty of those States, which demands the prompt and severe censuring of the offender; that when, in 1861, the foreign minister for Brazil justified the conduct of the President of Maranhao in relation to the Sumter, the Secretary of State for the United States declared that that conduct and the approbation of it was intolerable. General Webb, in consequence, received orders to request that steps should be taken in reference to that occurrence by which the President of Maranhao should be made aware of his Majesty's displeasure; that the act of the Marquis of Caxias is very much more offensive to the honor and sovereignty of the United States than that of the President had been, because he knew perfectly well that in August, 1866, Brazil was formally advised that the United States would not allow such a violation of its sovereign rights, and that Brazil reconsidered and revoked the offensive act; therefore, that the Marquis of Caxias was fully conscious that he was gravely offending the honor and sovereignty of the United States by refusing.

General Webb, therefore, to conclude, requests that the Marquis of Caxias be promptly and peremptorily censured for his unfriendly and extraordinary proceedings; and as his unwarrantable interference in the matter has already occasioned a delay of at least four months in freeing the United States minister and his family from their embarrassing and probably dangerous position, he strenuously urges upon the Brazilian government that, without any unnecessary delay, orders may be issued for the removing of all hindrance to the passage of the United States vessel Wasp through the allied posts, and that General Webb be informed without delay also that those obstacles have ceased to exist, so that he may be enabled to communicate to the commander of the American Southern Atlantic squadron that he will not encounter, in the discharge of his duties to his country and to humanity, any further impediment from any of the Brazilian authorities.

In reply to General Webb's note, the undersigned has the honor of calling his special attention to the following: The Marquis of Caxias could not recognize Lieutenant Kirkland, a subaltern of the United States navy, in command of the Wasp, as a competent person to make a direct request for permission for that vessel to pass the war lines of their very legal and effective blockade of the Paraguay river, which he only did towards the end of May, and not four months ago, as by so doing the blockade would have been broken.

In refusing that permission, the Marquis of Caxias did not ignore any right whatever of the United States, nor did he in any way wish to offend, as he did not, its honor or its sovereignty. On the contrary, he thereby maintained an unquestionable right of sovereignty on the part of the allies in the occupation of the waters and territories of that river, where they are at present.

To have broken through that blockade in the manner which was and is requested—that is, that the Wasp should pass through the war lines of the allies and their military positions into the heart of the enemy's territory which is blockaded, serious disarrangement in the operations of the war, at the very moment, too, when important and perhaps decisive movements were impending—would have been the disregarding of a right of the belligerents which has never been questioned—would have diminished and weakened the sovereignty of a friendly power without the least justification, besides subjecting it and its allies to difficulties in the speedy termination of a war in which their honor is compromised.

It is further added that the refusal of the Marquis of Caxias was not peremptory, as General Webb supposes. The Marquis de Caxias's objections to the way in which Lieutenant Kirkland proposed to aid Minister Washburn to withdraw from Paraguay, were accompanied by an exposition of the very weighty reasons he had for so doing, and at the same time offered him, with the greatest cordiality and deference, the choice of either of two means of arriving at the same result without producing any of the evil consequences which would result to the allies from the admission of the proposal made by him in the name of that minister.

Those reasonable means, which would have reconciled, in a most dignified and effective manner, the rights of the allies with the wishes of both Messrs. Washburn and Kirkland, were rejected by those gentlemen, who continue to insist in exacting a permission offensive to the sovereign rights of the said allies.

One of the least of the inconveniences which would happen through satisfying the request of Lieutenant Kirkland and Mr. Washburn would evidently be the nullification of the whole of the blockade established in Paraguay by the allies, who would be laying themselves open to the reception of similar exactions from any other nation which might, under any pretext, demand a like privilege for its ships.

So true is this, and so worthy of consideration in view of the consequences, on the part of friendly powers, that Admiral Godon himself, in 1866, when the passage of Mr. Washburn to Paraguay was in treaty, was the first to admit, merely begging in his request for the permitting of the passage up the river to Asuncion of the said Minister Washburn, that it should be done in any way which would harmonize with the dignity of the United States and have been most convenient to Brazil and its allies, further desiring that Mr. Washburn might be helped forward to his destination either by land or by water, without placing any obstacle in his way.

This is just what the Marquis de Caxias desired to effect in the present instance, had he not been denied the option.

General Webb alludes in his note to orders received by Rear-Admiral Davis from the Secretary of the Navy, at the request of the Hon. Mr. Seward, Secretary of State for the United States, for the purpose of assisting Mr. Washburn to withdraw from Paraguay.

The undersigned begs leave, however, to impress upon General Webb that the text of those orders cannot but be subject to an intelligent analysis.

If a nation cannot, in equity or justice, issue orders contrary to the rights or sovereignty of another, those to which General Webb refers were without doubt accompanied by some clause which would cause the execution of them to be carried out in a way not to offend those rights or that sovereignty, and having that in view, to enter into some arrangement both expedient and honorable with the nations interested in the matter. Otherwise it would be an outrage, and in the present instance an unwarranted one, since Brazil and its allies proposed and offered to realize a reasonable manner of enabling Mr. Washburn to retire from Paraguay, to which the undersigned has already alluded.

General Webb argues that the decision of the Marquis de Caxias is in direct contradiction to the agreement entered into in August, 1866, between himself and the imperial government, and that the said marquis seriously offended the honor and sovereignty of the United States, being perfectly aware at the time that he was doing so.

This view of the matter on the part of General Webb is unfounded. Not only are the benevolent and friendly intentions of Brazil towards the United States evident in this case, but also that the refusal of the marquis had nothing in it which was, or could be, offensive to the honor or sovereignty of those States, but on the contrary was the vindication of the legitimate right of the allies so to act.

Putting aside these no doubt convincing considerations to General Webb, it remains for the undersigned to demonstrate to the general that the agreement of 1866, which he invokes, cannot properly be applied to this case.

In the first place, the imperial government never consented, except under protest, to the passing of the Shamokin through the war lines of the allied powers for the purpose of carrying Mr. Washburn beyond them, and that protest, really made against his passage by the Brazilian admiral when that steamer was on its way to Curupaiti, proves that Brazil did not admit the fact as a right.

In the second place, even had Brazil and its allies, for reasons worthy of attention at that time and at that place, judged it expedient to waive some of their rights as belligerents in favor of a friendly power, now, perhaps, they may be influenced by different motives; and indeed they have other and weightier ones, which prevent them from conceding now what they did then; further, the present request is not of the same nature of the one then advanced, since at that time the terms of that petition were more acceptable.

Finally, the very circumstances of the war are very different now from what they were then; the military movements and operations were not then so active as they are now, being about to terminate.

General Webb mentions the case of 1861, to ask that the conduct of the Marquis de Caxias in the present shall be censured and peremptorily disapproved of, as he requested that that of the president of Maranhao should be in relation to the Sumter case; but as that affair does not bear an exact relation to this one, the undersigned declines entering into any discussion whatever upon the subject.

To conclude, the imperial government does not consider that the proceedings of the Marquis de Caxias in this transaction are at all open to censure, but that, on the contrary, they merit its approbation; firstly, from the fact that his refusal was in perfect conformity to the rights and sovereignty of the allies; and, secondly, from the circumstance that though it was not in his power to concede the permission as requested by Messieurs Kirkland and Washburn, he did offer and place at their command, with the heartiest good will, the proper means for the safe and convenient conveyance of the American minister from Paraguay.

The undersigned hopes that General Webb, conscious of the justice of the reasons given and of the serious inconveniences that would have happened to the cause of the allies from the upward passage along the river to Tibicuari (center of the enemy's operations) of the Wasp, under present circumstances, and from her remaining there in communication with that enemy, without restriction as to the time or manner, will, without hesitation, conform his wishes to that decision, and accept either of the ways proposed for the departure from Paraguay of Mr. Washburn, and, in pursuance of such acceptance, transmit to Rear-Admiral Davis the necessary directions for the effecting of it. Meanwhile the imperial government will have no objection to accept any other alternative which may be suggested as equally effective and honorable by General Webb, provided that it be not the one already discussed, or a similar one, but that its conditions be such as to place no difficulties in the way of its acceptance by its allies at the river Plata, nor interfere with any plan they have or may conceive for the consummation of the desired end.

By these steps the imperial government endeavors to prove how great is its desire to, without injury or offense to its rights and sovereignty, or those of its allies, arrive at an early, and, to the United States, satisfactory termination of the question.

The undersigned repeats, &c., &c., &c.

JOÃO SILVEIRA DE SOUZA.

Senhor General JAMES WATSON WEBB,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

Mr. Webb to Senhor de Souza.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Rio de Janeiro, July 13, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt, on the 9th instant, of a note, bearing that date, from his excellency João Silveira de Souza, councillor to his Majesty the Emperor, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, in reply to his note of the 1st July instant.

The note of his excellency, after reciting the contents of the undersigned's note of the 1st, says:

"The Marquis de Caxias could not recognize Lieutenant Kirkland, a subaltern in the United States navy, in command of the Wasp, as a competent person to make a direct request for permission for that vessel to pass the war lines of their very legal and effective blockade, which he only did towards the end of May, and not four months ago."

In the first place, the marquis did recognize Lieutenant Commander Kirkland as a proper person to make the request he did, as appears from his prompt response to his application.

Secondly, Lieutenant Commander Kirkland was not sent to Curupaity to make a "direct request for permission to pass the allied lines." His destination was Asuncion; and presuming that Brazil would not again wound the sensibilities of the people of the United States, or outrage their sovereignty and honor, it was not deemed necessary for him to do more than courteously notify the Brazilian commander-in-chief of his presence, destination, and purpose, accompanied by the assurance that nothing would be done or permitted militating against the rights of either of the belligerents or of the national character of his ship and flag.

Thirdly, His excellency has misapprehended the remarks of the undersigned in regard to the delay of four months, already produced by the action of the Marquis de Caxias. If the Wasp had not been obstructed in her passage to Asuncion on the 25th April last, Mr. Washburn and family would probably have reached Montevideo early in May; whereas it is not possible for him to do so now until September; and it may be still later, if the modus operandi of getting him and family from their "embarrassing and possibly dangerous situation" is to be determined at Washington.

His excellency the minister of foreign affairs next denies that in refusing to let the Wasp pass, the Marquis de Caxias offended the sovereignty and honor of the United States, as is alleged by the Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, and insists that by so doing he only maintained an unquestionable right of sovereignty on the part of the allies. And it is insisted also that, in stopping the Wasp, the marquis in no way violated the arrangement made between the undersigned and Brazil in August, 1866, because the Shamokin, with Minister Washburn on board, was only allowed to pass the allied lines under protest.

On the subject of this protest the honorable Secretary of State wrote to the undersigned as follows:

"The President, however, marks the incident that the opposition to the passage of Mr. Washburn was withdrawn under a protest. So far from considering the question of the right of Mr. Washburn to proceed to his destination as a debatable one, the United States cannot consent to argue that question."

His excellency the minister of foreign affairs will perceive, therefore, that the undersigned has no authority to discuss the right of the United States to communicate with its minister in Paraguay. The obstruction offered in 1866 was declared by Mr. Seward "disrespectful in itself, and entirely inconsistent with the laws of nations."

And yet his excellency, the minister of foreign affairs, informs the undersigned that "the imperial government does not consider that the proceedings of the Marquis de Caxias, in this transaction, are at all open to censure; but that, on the contrary, they merit its approbation."

It is a well known fact that Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, can only be reached by the river of that name; and also, that long before the empire of Brazil, and Uruguay, and the Argentine Confederation, bound themselves, by treaty, to carry on war, not against the people of Paraguay, but against its government until overthrown, the United States had established diplomatic relations with that republic. In fact, but for the presence of the United States minister, Mr. Washburn, in Asuncion in 1864, and his threat of closing his mission if the minister of Brazil was not permitted to leave the country by water instead of by land, as the Marquis de Caxias proposed that Mr. Washburn should do, that gentleman would, most probably, have shared the captivity of Governor Campos. How it is possible, then, for any intelligent Brazilian to claim that by virtue of Brazil's blockade of the Paraguay, the United States shall not communicate with her minister by the only channel he can be reached, is more than the undersigned can conceive. But, as Mr. Seward says, from a sense of self-respect, the United States cannot consent to argue that question. Thus precluded from any discussion on this question of right, the undersigned notes the declaration that in this proceeding by the Marquis de Caxias there is no disrespect intended, and no unfriendly feeling towards the United States.

And this is said to be made manifest by the declaration that he did offer and place at the command of Mr. Washburn and Lieutenant Kirkland, with the heartiest good will, the proper means for the safe and most convenient conveyance of the American minister from Paraguay. That is to say, Brazil, or the commander of her land and naval forces on the Paraguay, is to determine what is the "proper means" of getting our minister out of Paraguay, and not the United States. And what were those "proper means" thus proposed?

First, the Marquis de Caxias proposed that the minister, his feeble wife and child, his servants, with their luggage, &c., should traverse some fifty or one hundred miles of wilderness, more or less, and then embark on board a Brazilian vessel bearing a flag of truce, and descend the Paraguay to Curupaiti; President Lopez, of course, to give sanction to this espionage of his territory by an enemy avowedly engaged in a personal warfare against him and for his overthrow, and not against the people of Paraguay.

To this his excellency Charles A. Washburn, the minister of the United States accredited to the government of Paraguay, which it is the avowed purpose of the allies to overthrow, replied as follows, after very properly and peremptorily refusing to leave his post of duty, except in the manner indicated by his government:

"The proposition of the Marquis de Caxias that, if we are so disposed, we may go by land, is similar to that which was made to me by the Paraguayan government in the case of the Brazilian minister, Senhor Viana de Lima, after the taking of the Marquis de Olinda and the suspension of his diplomatic relations. When I interfered on his behalf, I was told he could go by land. But I rejected the proposition as absurd, and my conduct in that matter was highly approved by the Brazilian government and press, while that of Paraguay was universally condemned by both. Does the Marquis de Caxias expect me to accept terms for myself and family that I would not accept for a Brazilian minister?"

Secondly. The first proposition of the Marquis de Caxias having been very properly and indignantly rejected, he deliberately substituted the following:

"I will give orders that one of the Brazilian vessels of war above Humaita shall go up the river with a flag of truce to receive his excellency, his servants, and effects, at the point of the river previously indicated by his excellency; and this steamer, on its return, shall disembark his excellency at the nearest possible point to Humaita, or pass that fortification with the consent of the government of Paraguay, so that his excellency may be able to move immediately from here to the United States gunboat Wasp."

It would be improper on the part of the undersigned to speak of this proposition in the terms it deserves, after it has been gravely indorsed by the Brazilian government; and therefore he leaves it to the just indignation of that public opinion which must ultimately pass upon this correspondence, and which will treat this unheard-of proposition with the severe condemnation it so richly merits. Your excellency pronounces it friendly and magnanimous, while the undersigned deems it unfriendly and offensive, and, he might add, on the part of the marquis, trifling with the dignity of his position.

That the commander of the Wasp so considered it is manifest from his reply, which, written in doubt whether it was a serious proposition or one intended to cast ridicule upon the whole affair, is worthy of all praise. He says:

"Your excellency undoubtedly gives me credit for a knowledge, which I do not possess, of that usage of warfare which permits one of the belligerents, by a resort of a flag of truce, to pass by the fortifications and into the heart of the enemy's country without molestation. I know that the Paraguayan government would be guided by a false sense of courtesy did it permit such an act by a Brazilian vessel of war."

"A conversation, sought by one of the members of your excellency's staff, leads me to believe that your excellency thinks that the family of the President Lopez might seek protection under the American flag, and that to prevent such an occurrence you will not allow the United States steamer Wasp to pass through your fleet. The fact of virtually detaining as prisoners the United States minister and family in Paraguay in order to prevent the suspected escape of the feminine and infantine portion of President Lopez's family, is so unreasonable that it savors strongly of extending the dangers and difficulties of war to women and children."

Whether this proposition was ever intended by the Marquis de Caxias to be seriously received, or whether it was designed to treat Lieutenant Commander Kirkland's application with ridicule and contempt, it is equally unfriendly and offensive. Unfriendly, because it denies on the most frivolous and indefensible grounds an act of courtesy to a friendly and neutral power, which could not be withheld without offence, even if the law international conferred the right of such denial on Brazil, which it assuredly does not. And grossly offensive, because it assumes that the commander, officers, and crew of the United States steamer Wasp would act dishonorably and give information in regard to the Brazilian fleet to the Paraguayans, while no such suspicion of dishonorable conduct could possibly attach to the officers and crew of a Brazilian vessel of war, which it is gravely proposed to send hundreds of miles into the enemy's country.

Now it is patent to the world that the number and character of the Brazilian fleet, above and below Humaita, are as well known to President Lopez as to the Marquis de Caxias, the press, and the public. And if we are to believe official reports, it is equally certain that the state of things on the Paraguay, above the allied forces, is absolutely unknown to the Marquis de Caxias or any other person. If, then, every person on board the Wasp were of the disreputable character implied, the most they could possibly communicate to the injury of the allies would be to report the number of vessels they saw; information which President Lopez has already. How utterly idle, then, and how exceedingly offensive the pretence that the passage of the United States steamer Wasp, under the United States flag, and commanded and officered by gentlemen who recognize all the obligations which a high sense of honor imposes upon them as neutrals—how exceedingly offensive to a friendly nation to allege that such passage would be injurious to the interests of Brazil, "because of the operations and movements of war shortly to be carried into effect near the place indicated as the destination of the North American steamer." That is to say, "the steamer of a friendly neutral power, rapidly running through our lines, and communicating with no one but the commander-in-chief and his staff, will become possessed, supernaturally, no doubt, of all our purposes; and those on board not being men of honor, will disclose to our enemy, the President, and not the people of Paraguay, the knowledge thus supernaturally acquired."

But while the Marquis de Caxias thus guards against American officers not revealing what everybody knows, and nobody better than President Lopez, and while he cannot listen to the idea of a friendly neutral passing his lines, he perceives the benefit to be derived from availing himself of the occasion presented, to send one of the Brazilian vessels of war above Humaita, with a flag of truce, into the very heart of the enemy's country, to bring away the United States minister, and at the same time explore the terra incognita where he would willingly extend his operations. Nay, he would go even still further, and permit the iron-clad thus employed, now above Humaita, to repass that fortification with the consent of the government of Paraguay, and thus escape from what is deemed a perilous position until the fall of Humaita, if fall it should. What President Lopez would have said to this proposition the good sense of the commander of the Wasp promptly determined; what the Brazilian government thinks of it is to be found in its formal approval, conveyed to the undersigned by the dispatch of your excellency; but what the governments, statesmen, and military men of Europe and America may say of it, remains to be seen.

President Lopez, "the government of Paraguay," was the only party who could possibly suffer injury from the presence of a friendly neutral in his waters and amidst his defenses. And yet President Lopez, recognizing his duty to that friendly neutral, and to the comity that should be practiced between nations, and entertaining none of the doubts in regard to the honor of American naval officers, which so disturbed the mind of the Marquis de Caxias and made him desirous of sending a Brazilian vessel of war into his enemy's country under a flag of truce, to be guaranteed by the flag of the United States minister, no doubt, promptly consented that the United States steamer Wasp should ascend the Paraguay to any place she might desire to visit.

The undersigned is of opinion that the facts of the case will abundantly demonstrate whether the act of the Marquis de Caxias, indorsed by Brazil, was not as unfriendly and offensive as it clearly was in violation of international law and the sovereignty and honor of the United States.

But, says your excellency, if the Wasp had been permitted to pass the blockading lines of the allies, other nations would have been entitled to claim a similar right for all their ships. Most assuredly so, if those other nations had diplomatic representatives at Asuncion whom it was desirable to get away. But Mr. Washburn is the only diplomatic representative resident in Asuncion, and consequently the position is untenable.

Your excellency next quotes Rear-Admiral Godon, then commanding the United States South Atlantic squadron, as fully justifying the action of the allies in 1868. So correct is this, says your excellency, "that Admiral Godon himself, in 1866, when the passage of Mr. Washburn to Paraguay was in treaty, was the first to admit it, merely begging in his request the passage of Mr. Washburn, and that he might be helped forward to his destination either by land or by water, without placing any obstacle in his way. This is just what the Marquis de Caxias desired to effect in the present instance, had he not been denied the option."

It is no news to the undersigned that in 1866 Admiral Godon, having quarreled with the three United States ministers in the river Plata—General Asboth, Mr. Washburn, and Governor Kirk—and with the consuls of the United States at Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, instead of simply obeying orders, and furnishing the United States vessel, which Mr. Washburn was authorized to demand, to take him to Asuncion, did all in his power to prevent Mr. Washburn's having such conveyance, and on one occasion actually went north from this port instead of south, apparently to avoid receiving the contemplated application. But it is news to him that the then commanding officer of the United States squadron on this station should have permitted his feelings of hostility to Mr. Washburn to render him so forgetful of his duty to his country as to indorse and justify and advise the Brazilian government in its assumption that it might safely, and with great propriety, refuse to permit one of our national vessels to pass its lines with our minister on board, provided the minister "was helped forward to his destination, either by land or by water, without placing any obstacles in his way."

But the Brazilian government and its representatives in the river Plata well knew that Rear-Admiral Godon was not vested with any diplomatic powers whatever, and that he was as proverbially ignorant of the law of blockade as of international law. He was the last man in the navy to be safely intrusted with the discussion of such questions; and his expressing any opinion upon Mr. Washburn's case, or making any admissions in regard to it, was simply meddling with what did not concern him. That he should have done so in the gratification of a vindictive feeling toward a gentleman in every respect his superior, does not surprise the undersigned; but it does surprise him greatly that your excellency should refer to the unpatriotic acts of that personage, who was the representative of himself and his vindictive feelings only, as justifying a proceeding which every department of our government, and its four diplomatic representatives in this region, as well as every intelligent foreigner here, united in condemning. The undersigned does not doubt that Rear-Admiral Godon did make the admissions described, and did, in the gratification of his vindictiveness, seek to produce a result so diametrically opposite to what justice and honor, and national sovereignty, as well as the convenience of our minister and family, demanded; but as he was not vested with any diplomatic powers in the premises, and as it appears that if he had been he would not have exercised them in the interest of his country, his opinions and admissions cannot, with propriety, be introduced into this correspondence.

The undersigned makes no apology for the length of this note. The existing diplomatic relations between the United States and Brazil, and the present and future intercourse between their people—whose interests, political and commercial, are inseparable—able—depend, to a very great extent, upon the amicable adjustment of the pending difficulty; a difficulty which should not and could not have arisen, and in the progress of which the sovereignty and international rights of neither party could have become involved, if Brazil had promptly extended to the United States that comity which is usual among all friendly nations.

Being prohibited from arguing the question of right in this very important matter, the undersigned, frankly and in the interests of good neighborhood, will now proceed to extract from his various instructions on this subject the well-settled convictions of his government in relation thereto, all or most of which may be found in part two of the published diplomatic correspondence of 1866:

"Mr. Seward to General Webb.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"Washington, April 21, 1866.

"We have learned, with much surprise, that Charles A. Washburn, esq., minister resident of the United States to the republic of Paraguay, has been hindered and detained at or near Corrientes, on the Parana River, by the allied armies engaged in the war against Paraguay, on his return, after a leave of absence, to Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay. I give you for your information a copy of instructions which have been sent to him in this emergency. We sincerely hope to learn that the Emperor of Brazil has neither ordered nor approved of this hinderance to the passage of the diplomatic representative of the United States, so disrespectful in itself and so entirely inconsistent with the law of nations.

"You will bring the subject to the notice of the government and the Emperor, and ask an explanation.

"Mr. Seward to General Webb.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"Washington, June 27, 1866.

"I am obliged to write, therefore, in ignorance of the present condition of affairs in South America. Nevertheless, the sovereignty and honor of the United States will admit of no hesitation or delay in the matter. Mr. Washburn is therefore now instructed to return at once to the United States if the hinderance before alluded to shall not have ceased, through some proceedings of the governments concerned.

"In the case that you shall have put into execution the before-mentioned instruction which was given you by this department on the 21st day of April last, and shall not have received the satisfactory explanations which you were instructed to ask from the government of Brazil, you will now demand such explanations peremptorily. If they shall not be given you within six or eight days, you will ask for your passports to return to the United States.

"The Secretary of the United States, the Hon. William H. Seward, to General Asboth.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"Washington, September 24, 1866.

"I have now before me a copy of a definitive correspondence which has taken place between this department and the Brazilian government, which leads me to hope that long before this reaches you the difficulty will entirely have ceased. But among the papers which the record presents is a letter written by President Mitre to Mr. Washburn on the 24th of July last, which distinctly asserts and maintains the right of the allies to make that detention endure according to the pleasure of the allies. The President of the United States cannot consent to hold relations of peace and friendship even with friendly nations, when they make their own interests the rule of exposition instead of the law of nations.

"The Secretary of State of the United States to General Webb.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"Washington, September 23, 1866.

"The paper treats of the final disposition and settlement of the annoying question which arose by the detention of Mr. Washburn, &c., &c., &c.

"The President, however, marks the incident that the opposition to the passage of Mr. Washburn was withdrawn under a protest. So far from considering the question of the right of Mr. Washburn to proceed to his destination as a debatable one, the United States cannot consent to argue that question.

"In the second place, you are authorized to state that the sensibilities of the American people have been wounded by the transaction.

"I am not prepared to say that, in the absence of an explanation by the allies, the settlement of the question which has been made will be held to be satisfactory.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM H. SEWARD."

Your excellency will perceive from the foregoing extracts from instructions from the Secretary of State of the United States why the undersigned has not entered into any discussion of the rights of his government in the question pending between it and the allies, prosecuting a war against the government and not the people of Paraguay. He has but one course left him to pursue, and that is, to urge upon "the government and Emperor of Brazil" a reconsideration of their decision as conveyed to him in your excellency's note of the 9th instant. And again, in the words of his note of the 1st instant, "he earnestly entreats that the government of Brazil will, without any unnecessary delay, issue instructions that all hindrance to the United States steamer Wasp's passing through the lines of the allies on the Paraguay be withdrawn, and promptly advise the undersigned that such hindrance has altogether ceased."

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

J. WATSON WEBB.

His Excellency JOAO SILVEIRA DE SOUZA,
*Councillor to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor,
 Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.*

Mr. Webb to Mr. Seward.

[Extract.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Boa Viagem, opposite Rio, August 7, 1868—5 p. m.

SIR: In my last I stated that the minister of foreign affairs desired me to ask for a conference, which I had declined doing, at the same time expressing my readiness to wait upon him at the Foreign Office whenever desired to do so. I was in consequence invited to a conference on the 1st of August.

We accordingly were in conference two and one-half hours on the 1st, three hours on the 4th, and nearly three hours to-day, I having just returned from the Foreign Office.

The result was that I left with the minister my dispatch herein inclosed and marked No. 4, he having previously explained that in no event should the Wasp be impeded in her course to Asuncion. It is understood that Paranhos's note, "subject only to such trifling delay as may arise from the active execution of any military operation which may transpire at the time," means simply that if, when the Wasp arrives at the front, the Brazilians are actually firing at the enemy, they shall not be required to cease firing; but in such an event, the Wasp shall wait until the firing cease. To this I assented, stipulating, however, that if the Wasp thought proper to pass between and under the fire of the belligerents, she should have a right to do so, and in like manner the belligerents would be at liberty to sink her if they can, and she is sufficiently foolhardy to invite destruction.

I shall send a brief dispatch by telegraph from London, announcing the result of the Wasp affair.

I have reported to Admiral Davis that a United States vessel of war may go up the Paraguay for Mr. Washburn; and have requested him to send the Wasp, with the same commander. This he will do.

* * * * *

Humaita was attacked on the 16th by the allied forces, and the assailants beaten off with fearful loss. On the 18th the allies were again badly beaten in the Chaco.

On the 25th the allies discovered that Humaita had been evacuated by Lopez's forces, and they quietly took possession of it. The city of Rio has, in consequence, been illuminated for three nights in succession. There is no end to the rejoicing, and the press assures the people that there is no such triumph on record in ancient or modern warfare.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. WATSON WEBB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Senhor Paranhos to Mr. Webb.

[Translation.]

CENTRAL SECTION, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Rio de Janeiro, August 5, 1864.

The undersigned, councillor to his Imperial Majesty, and his minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, has the honor of addressing himself to General James Watson Webb, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary for the United States.

The object of the present note is to reply to that of the 13th ultimo, which was received by the predecessor of the undersigned, relative to the passing of the steamer Wasp through the lines of the rigorous blockade of the allies, in the waters of the Paraguay River, for the purpose of bringing away from the enemy's territory Mr. Charles A. Washburn, minister resident for the United States near the republic of Paraguay.

The undersigned, having had the honor of conferring with General Webb on the 1st and 4th instant, will defer the considering of each of the propositions of the note referred to.

The undersigned holds himself excused from that duty, as he feels assured that they do not contain the slightest idea of a rupture of the friendship and customary deference with which the government of the Union has ever responded to that of his Majesty the Emperor; and also because he at the same time acknowledged that it is of urgent importance that the understanding should be arrived at which is desired by both parties, with regard to the passing of Mr. Washburn through the territory occupied by the allied forces.

The imperial government is grieved at perceiving that, either because the propositions submitted by the Marquis de Caxias were not understood as they were meant to be, or that owing to the illness of Mr. Washburn's wife, the egress of that gentleman and his family should have been delayed until the present time. The undersigned is confident, however, that General Webb is also profoundly convinced that on the part of Brazil there does and always has existed a most sincere desire to maintain and tighten the most friendly relations with the government at Washington; and therefore that it never has been wanting either in courtesy or consideration towards its representatives.

General Webb knows that the passing of the diplomatic agent of the United States through the territory which the allies occupy in the waters and on the banks of the river Paraguay was not denied to him, they having, nevertheless, the full and undeniable right of jurisdiction therein, according to the right of nations. The question has rested upon the way or manner of passing between the war lines of the allies without weakening their moral force, or injuring the activity of their operations, or giving rise to questions with other neutral powers.

Now, as in 1866, when the passing up the river of Mr. Washburn was under consideration, the allied governments and their representatives at the seat of war had not, nor have they, anything in view other than the conciliating of the interests and necessities of the belligerents with the duties of courtesy and friendship which they are only too happy to observe towards so neutral and friendly a power as that of the United States.

The Marquis de Caxias, in his character of general commander-in-chief of the allied forces, did not hesitate, on the reception of the dispatch from the commander of the Wasp, to point out and help to execute two sure methods for the speedy return of the United States minister who is in the enemy's country. Unfortunately, however, those methods it seems were not deemed admissible, for it was declared to us that both were impossible; notwithstanding, the undersigned begs leave to explain en passant, perceiving that they evidently were not duly appreciated.

The distance by land from Tayi to Curupaiti is little more than five leagues, which would have been gone over by Mr. Washburn in a carriage and other conveniences which the Brazilian general would have had much pleasure in placing at the disposition of the United States minister, his family, and suite. Only through ignorance of the conditions or circumstances of that journey could it have been compared, as it was, to the offensive offer made by President Lopez in 1864, after his declaration of war, to the Brazilian minister at Asuncion, Mr. Viana de Lima.

The government of Paraguay, during profound peace, commenced hostilities by surprising and capturing the Marquis de Olinda and the imprisonment of all her passengers, among whom was the president of the province of Matto Grosso. It was under such circumstances that he wished the Brazilian minister to retire by land to the Passo da Patria—that is, that Mr. Viana de Lima and his family should travel over fifty leagues, through the middle of an enemy's territory, without any guarantee as to the means of conveyance or indispensable help during so long a route, besides not having the slightest protection for their personal security.

The journey of Mr. Washburn from Tayi to Curupaiti would have been effected under far different circumstances, and in another way, much more speedy, honorable, commodious, and safe. Mr. Washburn would have passed through as a neutral friend, whereas in the case of the Brazilian minister at Asuncion he would have been unavoidably detained or delayed on his passage through the interior of a country whose government had most unexpectedly declared war against the empire, initiating it by those acts of most unjustifiable surprise and violence.

The second method suggested by the general commander-in-chief of the allied forces—that is, the passage of Mr. Washburn in a Brazilian vessel to Curupaiti—evinces deference towards the diplomatic agent of the United States, and cannot be otherwise considered without gravely impugning the intentions of the Marquis de Caxias, and manifesting ignorance of the true position of the belligerents.

The Brazilian division of six iron-clads, which forced the passage of Humaita in February of this year, has already been at Asuncion, and has cruised beyond Tebicuari more than once, round about Humaita, and on the opposite side called the Chaco, or right bank of the Paraguay.

General Webb declares that he cannot, in view of the instructions from his government, enter into an examination of the question of right involved in the passing of Mr. Washburn through the allies' lines of blockade, attack, and defence; and the undersigned admits also, on his side, that he should abstain from discussing the matter, since it was not the denying of a passage through to that diplomatic agent which is being treated of, but the reconciling of it with the inevitable necessities of the war to which the allies were provoked, and which they are using every effort to terminate in the speediest, most just and honorable manner.

The imperial government cannot, nor would it wish to proceed in an affair which, like this, is of grave importance to the alliance, without previously consulting with its allies; and the undersigned would therefore insist that the present emergency be definitely decided upon at the river Plata, or here, after communications shall have been received from both the Argentine and Oriental governments, if there were not on the one side the consideration that there is no one there to represent the United States, and, on the other, that the Senhor Juan E. Torrent, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary for the Argentine Republic near this court, manifests the same friendly and deferential disposition towards the United States that he does.

In pursuance to an agreement with Mr. Torrent, and in the hope that that agreement will be approved of and duly appreciated by the allied governments at the river Plata, the undersigned proceeds to propose to General Webb a solution of the question, which cannot fail to be considered as satisfactory, as well by the government of the United States as by its representative accredited near his Majesty the Emperor.

Mr. Washburn thought it impossible that President Lopez would consent to the passing of a Brazilian steamer under a flag of truce, for the inoffensive purpose of aiding him to retire, as mentioned before. Well, then, the government of his Majesty, in its own name and in those of its allies, will most willingly accede to the descent from Asuncion of the United States minister, on board of a Paraguayan vessel, under a flag of truce, to Curupaiti, or to the most advanced post of the allies, the Wasp to go up to that point, wherever it may be, and there to receive on board the diplomatic agent of his country.

Apparently the material difficulty pointed out by Mr. Washburn will be thus removed; there will be complete reciprocity of the just and friendly propositions which are advanced on both sides; in a word, the rights and supreme necessities of the belligerents will be in harmony with the passing and returning of the representative of the United States.

But the imperial government and its allies will carry their deference to the United States beyond that. If its representatives near this court and at the republic of Paraguay hold that they should not accept either of these methods, or that the return of Mr. Washburn can be only effected safely and conveniently by the Wasp's going to receive him at his place of embarkation, then the allies will agree that a United States vessel of war shall proceed to that point for that purpose, that vessel being subject only to such trifling delay as may arise from the active execution of any military operation which may transpire at the time; the allies being well assured that the assertions of General Webb (which they never have doubted) with regard to the observance of the duties of a strict neutrality on the part of the vessel and of the representative of the Union shall most rigorously be carried out.

The undersigned hopes that this resolution taken by the imperial government, in combination with the representative of the Argentine Republic near this court, will be benevolently admitted by its allies at the river Plata, and that it will be apparent to General Webb and Mr. Washburn, and to their government, that this is a further proof of the cordiality with which the said allies profess the most friendly sentiments toward the United States government.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to General Webb the assurances of his high consideration.

JOSE MARIA DA SILVA PARANHOS.

Mr. Webb to Senhor Paranhos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Boa Viagem, August 5, 1868.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a note from his excellency José Maria de Silva Paranhos, counselor to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, dated yesterday, August 5, and which is in reply to a note from the undersigned addressed to the predecessor of his excellency, dated July the 13th, remonstrating against the decision of the late government, approving of the conduct of the Marquis de Caxias in refusing to permit the United States Wasp to pass his military lines on her way to Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, for the purpose of bringing from that capital his excellency Charles A. Washburn, the duly accredited minister of the United States to Paraguay, and thus relieve him and his family from what the government of the United States declared to be a "disagreeable and probably dangerous situation."

The undersigned is greatly impressed with the friendly tone of this note from his excellency the minister of foreign affairs, and tenders to him his sincere acknowledgments for the cordial and frank manner in which he has complied with the wishes of the government of the United States.

His excellency, in reconsidering the too hasty action of his predecessor, and in recognizing the propriety and necessity of a movement by the government of the United States for the relief of its diplomatic agent in Paraguay, and the mode adopted for that relief, has given another and most acceptable proof, on the part of the government and Emperor of Brazil, of their determination to reciprocate the friendly feelings which have always controlled the action of the United States in its intercourse with all the governments on the continent of America. An "American policy," based upon the advanced civilization of the world, the progress of the age, the interests and wants of new peoples, in contradistinction to a policy which is of necessity the offspring of the past, and fettered by the thought and action of the period in which it originated, is recognized by all American statesmen, whether of the north or the south. And to secure to the government of America the benefits of such an "American policy," it is of primary importance that Brazil and the United States, and all the governments on this continent, all of them being constitutional governments, should cultivate among each other the most friendly intercourse and the closest political alliance compatible with their constitutional forms of government. To accomplish this great work, and to draw closer together the United States and Brazil, has been the one great object of the undersigned during his long residence at this court; and he is happy to recognize in the dispatch of his excellency the evidence of a similar feeling and purpose.

Orders have been forwarded by Rear-Admiral Davis, commanding the United States South Atlantic squadron on this station, to Lieutenant Commander Kirkland, commanding the United States steamer Wasp, to proceed at once to Asuncion for Mr. Washburn and his family; and it would be idle for the undersigned to assure your excellency that under no circumstances and in no conceivable event will the progress of that vessel to or from Asuncion impede or in any way be injurious to the interests of the allies waging war against the government of Paraguay.

The undersigned is happy to avail himself of the occasion presented to renew to your excellency the expression of his cordial respect and great consideration.

J. WATSON WEBB.

JOSÉ MARIA DA SILVA PARANHOS,

Councilor to His Imperial Majesty the Emperor,

Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Webb.

No. 233.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, August 17, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 7th day of July, No. 68, has been received.

I learn from it that Rear-Admiral Davis, who commands the United States South Atlantic squadron, has sent the United States ship of war Wasp up the Parana, with a view to bring the United States minister, Charles A. Washburn, and his family, from Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, and thereby remove them from their embarrassing and possibly dangerous situation; and that the Marquis de Caxias, the commander of the allied forces, refused to permit the Wasp to pass through his blockade up to Asuncion, in consequence of which refusal the Wasp returned to Montevideo, after a delay of forty-seven days, without having accomplished the object of her voyage. Your dispatch is accompanied by a copy of a note which, on the first of July last, you addressed to his excellency João Silveira de Souza, the secretary of state for foreign affairs of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, in which note you made complaint of this proceeding of the Marquis de Caxias, and requested that the same might be disapproved, and that the Wasp might, without delay, be allowed to proceed to Asuncion for the purpose of removing Mr. Washburn and his family. I find in an appendix to these papers a correspondence concerning the events which were the basis of your note to the Brazilian secretary, in which correspondence are contained letters from Rear-Admiral Davis, Commander Kirkland, of the Wasp, Charles A. Washburn, esq., United States minister in Paraguay, and the Marquis de Caxias. I have also received from Mr. Moran, late United States chargé de affaires in London, a cable telegram, from which it would appear that you have intimated a purpose to ask for a passport in case the Brazilian government should refuse to allow the request contained in your note before mentioned. I further find a reference to this latter point in your dispatch of the 8th of July, No. 69, which has been previously acknowledged. From this last paper I learn that at the time it was written no answer to your note had been received from the Brazilian secretary of state for foreign affairs, and that, in the event of an unfavorable reply, you contemplated making a request for a passport, and an immediate withdrawal from Brazil.

The grave and critical issue which it thus appears was pending at the date of your dispatch has probably before this time reached a solution, although many days may elapse before that conclusion shall become officially known to this government. It would be impossible, under these circumstances, to give you definite instructions upon the course to be pursued in the possible event of a sanction of the proceeding of the Marquis de Caxias by the Brazilian government; nor am I now authorized, nor is it deemed necessary, with such unauthentic information as we have, to pronounce the sense of the government concerning your contemplated demand for a passport and the consequent close of your mission at Rio.

It is thought, however, to be neither improper nor premature to consider the several matters in regard to the Wasp which are expressly brought in review by your dispatch.

The proceedings of Rear-Admiral Davis in directing the Wasp to go up the Parana to Asuncion for the purpose mentioned is approved.

This government holds that it has a lawful right to send a ship of war up the Parana to Asuncion, for the purpose of receiving the United States minister and his family, and conveying them from the scene of siege and war to neutral territory or waters; that the refusal of Marquis de Caxias to permit the Wasp to pass up to Asuncion violates becoming comity on the part of Brazil and the allies towards the United States, and is in contravention of the law of nations; that Mr. Washburn and Commander Kirkland justifiably and properly declined the alternatives offered by the Marquis de Caxias. The requests upon the Brazilian government, expressed in your note to the secretary of foreign affairs, are approved and adopted.

Should this dispatch find you in the performance of your official duties, you will read it to the Brazilian secretary for foreign affairs, and deliver him a copy if he shall desire it.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

September 15, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 7th of August, which is without number, and which is accompanied by a copy of the final correspondence which has taken place between yourself and Mr. Paranhos, the Brazilian secretary of foreign affairs, relating to the opposition which was offered by the Marquis de Caxias to the voyage of the Wasp up the Parana River, with the view of relieving Mr. Washburn and his family at Asuncion.

Your proceedings in the settlement of that vexatious case, as they are represented in your dispatch and the accompanying correspondence, are approved and commended.

You will assure the Marquis de Paranhos that this government highly appreciates the just and friendly manner in which the transaction has been brought to a satisfactory end on the part of the government of Brazil.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Boa Viagem, October 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of a letter addressed to Admiral C. H. Davis, in relation to what I consider a measure of policy on the part of our squadron. From what Mr. Washburn writes, I have but little doubt that the persons he left behind him as constituting a part of his legation have been already murdered; and yet I think the honor of the country appears to demand some such demonstration as I ask. England, France, Italy, and Spain, all have sent gunboats up to Asuncion; and considering the outrage perpetrated on our legation, we are called upon, if for appearances only, to send all our disposable force up the river. I do not know, nor do I believe, that they could do any good, as probably our two citizens are no longer living. But, nevertheless, sound policy requires that we do something more than those who have no such outrage to punish as that perpetrated against our legation.

Neither Admiral Davis nor I have anything to do with the approval or censure of Mr. Washburn's conduct in the press. It is sufficient to know that the sanctity of our legation has been violated to justify and to demand such interposition as I have asked. And it is satisfactory to know that the cost of a demonstration which would be invaluable to us would be precisely the expense of the fuel consumed; no more and no less. And if, as is said, an expedition up the Paraguay would prevent the Guerriere's contemplated visit to the Cape of Good Hope and coast of Africa, whence the Quinnebaug has just returned, the value of the coal thereby saved would be double the cost of that consumed by our small steamers in an expedition up the Paraguay, where, at present, we are the only naval power not represented.

Admiral Davis is one of the most accomplished and intelligent gentlemen in our navy, and nobody can know him without entertaining for him both respect and affection. He is, withal, a gentleman of science, and so courteous and just to all under his command that he is justly popular on shipboard as well as on shore. Most assuredly, I know no gentleman in service who possesses more of my regard; and yet we differ as widely as the poles in regard to what is required of him in this emergency. He thinks the whole affair not worth a second thought, and, like most naval officers, perceives no peculiar sanctity about the diplomatic representatives of a country. Of course my views are directly the opposite of his. We have no right to consider what should be, but must look at what is; and so long as we recognize the existing mode of international intercourse, we have no option but to vindicate our own honor, and in so doing punish, or attempt to punish, what is equally an outrage against every civilized nation.

What Admiral Davis will do I cannot pretend to say. He was to have sailed with his entire squadron for the river Plata at the end of this week. Recent events, most certainly, will not delay his departure.

Beyond all question you will receive full details of all that has transpired from Mr. Washburn. * * * * *

Doubtless Mr. Washburn will sail from here for New York on the 26th. We expect him on the 20th.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Webb to Rear-Admiral Davis.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Boa Viagem, opposite Rio, October 6, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: I yesterday received from his excellency Charles A. Washburn, United States minister resident to Paraguay, a communication, dated Buenos Ayres, September 26, 1868, apprising me of his safe arrival at that city in the Wasp, in which he says: "We have barely escaped alive. You probably little thought, when you were battling with the Brazilians so strongly for a gunboat to come to my relief, that I was at that time in danger of my life." And he also informs me that Lopez "took away Bliss and Masterman," his secretary and interpreter, "by force, at the moment of leaving the legation to go on board the steamer."

I felt, of course, that while we had rescued the minister and his family our work was only half completed, and that the honor of our country had been directly insulted by Lopez thus trampling upon the rights of our legation, and by the gross outrage perpetrated upon two of its members, by their forcible seizure when under the immediate protection of our minister. And consequently I immediately inclosed to you Mr. Washburn's letter, with a brief note, saying: "I write thus that you may turn this matter over in your mind before I join you;" and I begged you to send a boat for me at 2 p. m. This you did, and I am indebted to you for the prompt and kind manner in which you have always complied with similar requests, as well as for your cordial co-operation at all times in the discharge of my public duties.

I reached the Guerriere at 2½ o'clock p. m. I am sorry to say that for the first time in our official intercourse there appeared to exist a wide difference of opinion upon a question of duty, and especially in regard to the gravity of the existing emergency: I believing that this is precisely one of those cases to meet which our country keeps up, at great expense, a large squadron on this station, the protection of our citizens and the prompt vindication of our national honor; while you, unfortunately, look upon it as an event of no special significance, and which calls for no assumption of any unusual responsibility on your part, because you have no instructions or direct orders in contemplation of such a contingency—a contingency which, of course, could not be foreseen and anticipated.

'You inquired what would I have you do; and I answered then, and I answer now, I would have you send up to Asuncion every available vessel of your squadron and demand the immediate release of Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman, two members of the United States legation in Paraguay, forcibly seized by Lopez in violation of their diplomatic rights, and now held in prison by the tyrant, if, as Mr. Washburn suggests, they have not already been put to death. And even if the chances were ninety-nine out of a hundred that they are no longer in existence, such in my judgment is the importance of this action, in view of its influence upon the opinion of the civilized world in regard to the character and the energy of our government, and the efficacy of our navy, that I would have you transfer your flag to one of the smaller vessels of your squadron and go up the Paraguay and make such a demonstration at least as will prove that England is not the only nation that protects the lives and persons of its citizens and the diplomatic rights of its representatives, without stopping to count the cost. True, we are not called upon to raise an army of 10,000 veterans, at a cost of $30,000,000, for a second Abyssinian expedition into the wilds of Paraguay, but we may safely incur the expense of the fuel necessary for what I propose, and this is all it can cost us. Our squadron is here for just such work—to protect the commerce, the lives, and the persons of our people; and you have already informed me that the entire squadron will sail for the river Plata during the present or early next week, with the exception of the Shamokin, which is to go home, probably to be broken up. But why send her home, if an emergency is presented in which she can render as good service as any other vessel of the squadron?

Be assured, my dear admiral, that this is no ordinary occurrence. The eyes of the civilized world are upon us, and precisely as you may act in this emergency will our country come out of the affair with credit and honor or lose prestige as a nation. You and I have done our duty in sending up the Wasp, but we have not yet discharged our whole duty; and, in my opinion, to complete our work, we must make such a demonstration as I am urging upon you. We are both servants of one government, and each independent of the other, to be controlled only by our common superior, the President of the United States, speaking through his Secretaries of State and of the Navy. I do not claim the remotest right to control your action, and feel the full responsibility of attempting to influence it. But it is my imperative duty to call upon you officially to act energetically in this emergency, stating, at the time, my reasons for making such call, and assuming all the responsibility of so doing. That duty I have attempted, hastily, to discharge, and now your responsibility begins. That you will meet that responsibility fearlessly and do what you think is right, I know.

You remarked to me yesterday that you had no facts to warrant the action I recommended and solicit; and that although you had received Commander Kirkland's report of his visit to Asuncion and return to Montevideo, it contained nothing which demanded the proceeding I desire.

One word in regard to Commander Kirkland, and the manner in which he has discharged the delicate duty upon which he was detached, in both of his visits up the Paraguay. No officer of any rank in the navy could have done better; and his reply to the Marquis de Caxias, when that personage proposed to send a Brazilian iron-clad up the Paraguay for Mr. Washburn, was so apposite and so appropriate to the occasion, that I quoted the most of it to the Brazilian minister of foreign affairs when reiterating my demand that the Wasp should not be obstructed in her passage of the allied lines on her "errand of mercy." And Mr. Washburn, in his letter to me, attributes his escape with life to Commander Kirkland's manly defiance of Lopez, and his indignant threat of consequences if he dared to carry out his avowed intention of detaining a United States minister in Paraguay.

What Mr. Kirkland could or should have reported in regard to Lopez's conduct towards our legation in Paraguay is not for me to determine; but Mr. Washburn, the duly accredited minister of the United States to the government of Paraguay, has made his report, which I have placed in your possession, and every word of which I indorse. And in addition I send herewith a supplement to the Buenos Ayrean Standard, of the 26th of September, in which you will find a letter from Mr. Washburn to the British minister accredited to the Argentine government, giving a full history of events in Paraguay for the past six months. That document was sent to me by Mr. Washburn, and I desire to have it received as a part of this official communication.

You do not know Mr. Washburn, but I do; and I know, too, that both at Buenos Ayres and here in Rio de Janeiro the public press, in the interest of Brazil and the allies, is doing all in its power to blacken his character. On the other hand, the Standard, representing the feelings and opinions of the foreign diplomatic corps, and of the British minister and British residents in Buenos Ayres, does Mr. Washburn full justice and commends his conduct throughout. I know him to be a man of honor and truth; but even if he were personally unknown to me as he is to you, both you and I know him to be the duly accredited minister of the United States, and his testimony, which we have, it is our bounden duty to respect. He tells us that two members of his legation were forcibly detained as prisoners by Lopez, and that their lives are in danger if, as is quite probable, they have not already been murdered, and we have nothing to do with what others may say or do in regard to the affair. Our government is far distant; appeal to it is impossible; and therefore it becomes my duty officially to make a requisition upon you to interpose for the vindication of our national honor and the protection of our citizens. I am responsible to our government for the grounds upon which that requisition is based, and it is your right to respond to or reject my application, and for so doing you and you only are responsible.

In conclusion, permit me to add that, in my judgment, an emergency of such rare occurrence, and so certain to redound to the honor of our country and the credit of all concerned, if judiciously managed, should be deemed a great boon. For weeks past the press in this region has teemed with rumors of insult to the United States legation in Paraguay, and a violation of its sanctity; and, beyond all peradventure, the rumor is ere this widely circulated through Europe, and statesmen and diplomatists, our enemies and our friends, while uniting in lauding England for her recent exploits in Abyssinia, and her noble sacrifices in giving protection to her official agents and humble citizens, in a far off and barbarous land, are anxiously watching to learn what will be the conduct of the great American nation under almost identical circumstances. I pray that the response may be the immediate departure of every vessel of our squadron, of light draught of water, to the capital of Paraguay.

Such demonstration, made without one day's unnecessary delay, whether successful or not, would, in my judgment, be invaluable to our country and to its navy. And if this be not precisely such a duty as our squadron is kept on this station to discharge when the emergency occurs, then, most assuredly, I am ignorant of any necessity for United States squadrons in every quarter of the world in time of peace.

Pardon me for having written so much. I could not write less. And, whatever may be your decision in the premises, I do not entertain a doubt but it will be based upon patriotism, as it will unquestionably be the result of wisdom and a conscientious discharge of duty.

Believe me, my dear admiral, most devotedly your friend and obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB,

United States Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary.

Rear-Admiral CHARLES H. DAVIS,

Commanding United States South Atlantic Squadron.

Mr. Webb to Mr. Seward.

No. 75.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Rio de Janeiro, October 24, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith the continuance of my correspondence with Rear-Admiral Davis, numbered 3, 4, 5, and 6; No. 2 having already been forwarded with my dispatch No. 74, via England.

In my second letter to the admiral I give only an extract from my hasty private note, written at the consulate, and asking a boat to be sent me. To show that my only object in suppressing any part of that note was to save time and labor, I now place the entire note before you. It was as follows:

CONSULATE, 12½.

MY DEAR ADMIRAL: I inclose for your perusal a letter from Washburn. I think we should talk this matter over, and see if anything can be done to relieve the two members of the United States legation, so outrageously seized by Lopez. It is one of those cases in which to do nothing is to do wrong; and it appears to me that the mere fact of sending up a force to look after our people would, at least, avert much reproach that will otherwise fall upon us.

As to sending Washburn from the La Plata in a United States gunboat, that is quite unnecessary. Our government has brought him down from Asuncion, and that is demonstration sufficient. Now our duty is to look after the other members of the legation. No matter who appointed them our obligation is equally binding. But I will come to you at two, or a little sooner. I have an appointment at the foreign office at 1 o'clock, and write this that you may turn the matter over in your mind before I join you. If your boat is at the landing at a quarter of two, I shall doubtless be there.

Your friend,

WEBB.

This accounts for my reception by the admiral, as detailed in my second note to him, marked 4, and dated October 9, when he declined doing anything; and especially to hurry his departure, fixed for the 10th, and get off on Thursday, the 8th. I told him he left me no alternative but to address to him an official note, recapitulating all I had said, and urging him to take up the Paraguay every vessel of his squadron of light draught of water, five in number. He said he hoped I would do nothing of the kind. I replied that it was my duty so to do, and make a requisition upon him for the employment of the squadron in the present emergency, and having done that, the responsibility of refusing to act would rest upon him. He answered, "I will write in reply, I do not choose to respond to your call. No, I will not say I do not choose to; I will reply, that on my arrival at the river I will investigate the matter." I rejoined, "there is nothing to investigate. I have placed in your hands Mr. Washburn's report to me; and that, and his letter to the British minister at Buenos Ayres, cover the whole ground." In answer to this he said that Washburn's letter was not worthy of credit, as his fears for his life had disqualified him as a witness; he was a frightened man, and his letter to me showed that he had not yet recovered from his fears. I insisted that I knew Washburn, and indorsed all he had written, and that he, the admiral, had no right to listen to, or put faith in, what others said. We then agreed that our official differences of opinion in regard to a question of duty need not and should not cause any change in our personal relations.

Judge then of my surprise at the receipt of his letter of the 8th. He is an exceedingly weak man, notwithstanding his accomplishments, and has those about him who have led him astray. One thing is certain; we cannot both be right, and one of us should be severely censured, if not recalled.

I will not attempt to describe the general feeling of indignation among Americans at the inaction of our squadron and the contemptuous terms in which intelligent men of all nationalities speak of us. To show that neither our government nor its minister are to blame in this, I inserted in a card defending Mr. Washburn, which I published yesterday, a paragraph to which I call your personal attention. You will find that card inclosed.

General McMahon arrived in the steamer Mississippi on the 21st and called on the 22d, after having been on board the flag-ship both on the 21st and 22d. Before showing me his instructions from you, he inquired if there would be any obstructions to his going up the Paraguay to Asuncion. I asked if he had any such purpose in view. He said that he had; that Admiral Davis intended to take him to the river next week, when he would change his flag to one of the smaller vessels (the Pawnee) and take him up to Asuncion, in order that he might present his credentials to Lopez and liberate Bliss and Masterman. * *

He said there were so many versions of what had occurred that he could not decide what to do until he reached the river. I replied, "That is an error; there is but one version of the facts of the case to which you or I or the admiral can refer, or which we can receive, and that version is contained in the official report of your predecessor, the duly accredited minister of the United States to Paraguay, and indorsed by me from my knowledge of the man and his official character."

I then placed in his hands for perusal, my correspondence with Admiral Davis. What subsequently passed between us may be gathered from the following * letter, which I addressed to him yesterday; but which was not sent until to-day.

I should have stated sooner that when the Brazilian Times announced, on the 8th, that the United States squadron was under orders for the river, Admiral Davis, who had that day written me the exceedingly offensive note which called forth my second letter, addressed the editor of that paper as follows:

FLAG-SHIP GUERRIERE, October 9, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: I am very much obliged to you for the two papers which you very kindly sent me, and I shall have the pleasure of saying this in person on my return from Petropolis.

I see in these papers that you take an interest in the movements of my squadron, but that the source of your information is incorrect. Not only is the squadron not under orders for the La Plata, but no single vessel of the squadron is under sailing orders at this moment for any place.

Very truly yours,

C. H. DAVIS, Rear-Admiral.

WILLIAM SCULLEY,

Editor and Proprietor of the Anglo-Brazilian Times.

I learn that the English have two gunboats up the Paraguay, and they are hourly expecting a third to arrive, which will be immediately sent up to join the Linnet and Beacon. France, Italy, and Portugal have one each. Lopez refused to give up his English prisoners to the English secretary of legation, Mr. Gould, who was on board the Linnet, and that gentleman immediately left to report to his minister at Buenos Ayres. Lopez then sent word to the French gunboat Decidée, that he was willing to release the Englishmen.

Mr. Washburn writes me under date of the 14th October, confirming the previous report that Lopez had shot both his brothers and his sister, the widow of General Barrios, who committed suicide some months ago to escape torture. And Mr. Matthew, the English envoy at this court, writes me as follows. Although his note is marked "private," I have his permission to send it to you:

* For this letter see inclosure A to dispatch from United States minister to Paraguay, No. 7, October 27, 1868.

Private.]

OCTOBER 15, 1868.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Will you allow me to ask what steps you are taking in consequence of the treatment of your legation in Paraguay? If the last letter published as from Mr. Bliss was genuine, its tone, I am sorry to say, confirms the belief that it was written under torture.

Rumors of all kinds are, of course, rife, and I frankly confess that I expected ere this to have heard of some decided course of action, and I should be very sorry to see the prestige of the United States in this land affected by any unsuitable delay or hesitation in a case that seems worse than ours in Abyssinia.

Indeed, I almost question whether all nations should not unite in bringing this monster to his senses. The latest accounts I see assert that Lopez had ordered his sister and his brothers to execution.

With best regards to Mrs. Webb, believe me, my dear general, most truly yours,
G. BUCKLEY MATTHEW.

My only reply was a statement of the fact that Rear-Admiral Davis ignored my right to have any opinion on the subject, while his admiral, Ramsay, promptly responded to his calls, and sent every vessel he had up the Paraguay, and will send up the gunboat to arrive.

* * * * *

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Rear-Admiral Davis to Mr. Webb.

UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP GUERRIERE, (1st rate),
Rio de Janeiro, October 8, 1868.

SIR: I owe you, perhaps, an apology for not having acknowledged sooner the reception of your letter of the 6th instant, in which you give me the unsolicited benefit of your opinion on the subject of my official duties.

Since your opinion is formed without a knowledge of all the circumstances of the case, I may not, possibly, attach so much value to it as you seem to expect.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. H. DAVIS,

Rear-Admiral Commanding South Atlantic Squadron.

His Excellency J. WATSON WEBB,
United States Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Brazil.

Mr. Webb to Rear-Admiral Davis.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Boa Viagem, October 9, 1868.

SIR: On returning from the United States consulate to the ferry, yesterday afternoon, when passing a Portuguese corner grocery, known as "Portuguese Joe's," the proprietor stopped my carriage and placed in my hands your official letter dated yesterday, October 8, in answer to my official letter of the 6th, delivered on board the Guerriere on the same day, by my secretary in person. Your letter is as follows:

"SIR: I owe you, perhaps, an apology for not having acknowledged sooner the reception of your letter of the 6th instant, in which you give me the unsolicited benefit of your opinion on the subject of my official duties.

"Since your opinion is formed without a knowledge of all the circumstances of the case, I may not, possibly, attach as much value to it as you seem to expect."

There is no mistaking the purport of this language; although it does appear incredible to me that it should have been penned by you.

The first paragraph of your response to my letter of the 6th is, as subsequent reflection must have satisfied you, equally inaccurate and unjust. To demonstrate this declaration, I am compelled to go back to the origin of a difference of opinion which the tenor of your note aims to convert into a personally offensive correspondence.

Immediately on receiving and reading Mr. Washburn's letter, which I did at the consulate on the 5th, I handed it to Fleet Surgeon Duvall to read and deliver to you; and while he was reading it, I addressed to you the following hasty note and handed it to the doctor, which you subsequently returned to me:

"CONSULATE, 11½.

"MY DEAR ADMIRAL: I inclose for your perusal a letter from Washburn. I think we should talk over this matter and see if anything can be done to relieve the two members of the United States legation, so outrageously seized by Lopez. It is one of the cases in which to do nothing is to do wrong; and it appears to me that the mere fact of sending up a force to look after our people would at least avert much reproach that will otherwise fall upon us.

"Your friend,

"J. WATSON WEBB."

On my arrival on board you promptly indicated your unwillingness to act in the affair, and put to me the question, "What would you have me do?" I certainly did not consider that you thereby intended to ask my advice in the premises, because you took prompt measures to intimate that my advice was not desirable. But I understood then, as I do now, that, I having invited a friendly consultation on the subject, you were really desirous of knowing what it was I would have you do. To that question I replied at length in my letter of the 6th, and in that reply as I did not only stated my wishes as the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States accredited to Brazil, but, as it was my imperative duty to do, I gave you my reasons for desiring prompt and energetic action on your part in vindication of the honor of our country, as well as to afford protection to our much-abused citizens.

To what you allude as "official duties" I am quite unable to determine. Most assuredly I have not attempted to interfere with the administration of the affairs of your squadron, and I do not pretend even to have any knowledge of its internal condition. I have contented myself with the discharge of my duty in pointing out to you what in my judgment the honor and dignity of our country demand, and wherein our people require that protection which it is made the duty of our navy to afford; and to secure which is the sole object of your presence here, at the cost of many millions annually to the public treasury. In doing this I have not gone beyond the strict line of my duty, as better information in regard to what a minister's duty is, in an emergency like the present, cannot fail to convince you. But I might have gone still further than I did, and not only have pointed out your duty and advised you what to do, but finding you tardy in recognizing your duty in the premises, and ignoring the testimony of United States officials and adopting the charges and rumors of the Brazilian press and of Americans in Brazilian employ, I might with great propriety have formally remonstrated against your supineness and your rejection of official testimony, while you indorsed the slanders put forth against Mr. Washburn by those whose interest it is to traduce him.

When I addressed you my letter of the 6th, I regretted the necessity of so doing, and dreaded an official collision between friends. Your letter of yesterday has completely eradicated all those regrets. Its deliberate ignoring of a minister's having any opinion whatever in regard to matters relative to which he should be far better posted than under any circumstances you can be, and your arrogantly assuming to yourself, and consequently to the junior lieutenant in the navy, an absolute superiority over the envoys extraordinary of our country, be they who they may, brings at once to an amicable issue a question which it is the interest of our country should be settled by legislation, and not be left longer to the whims and caprices of officers of the navy, to the very serious injury and possible dishonor and discredit of our country. According to your theory, it is positive offense against your dignity, meriting rebuke such as is conveyed to me in your note of yesterday, for the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States to Brazil to entertain any opinion whatever upon a great outrage such as has been perpetrated by Paraguay against the honor and dignity of the United States; and if he should happen to entertain such an opinion and, in the discharge of what he considers a duty, should venture to express it, no matter how courteously, and point out what in his judgment should be done, he is guilty of a crime for which any ensign in the navy who happens to be in command of a gunboat may rebuke and insult him!

Permit me to illustrate my meaning. For more than three years past we have had on this coast a South Atlantic squadron, consisting of from six to eight steamers in number, and sustained certainly at a cost of not less than $5,000,000; and yet, during that period the only national services required of it have been the firing of a salute to the Brazilian flag in Bahia as an amende honorable, promised by me, the United States envoy extraordinary, in consequence of our having violated Brazilian neutrality in cutting out and capturing in Brazilian waters the pirate Florida. That salute should have been fired by the flag-ship, because, when a great nation resolves to make an amende honorable, self-respect demands that such amende shall be made in a magnanimous and manly manner. But your predecessor, having denounced any such concession to the wounded honor of Brazil, and actuated by anything but a commendable feeling towards the civil service of our country, and incapable of appreciating the chivalry of the act, sent one of the smallest gunboats in our navy to perform this duty, while he in the flag-ship remained in this harbor; and when the duty had been discharged in a manner so disreputable to us and so offensive to Brazil, he immediately sailed for Bahia to demonstrate, as it were, the contemptuous manner in which the matter had been disposed of. One high in authority here very justly remarked: "It was an act of grace performed most ungraciously;" and it became my duty to explain that no slight was intended by our government, and that it was our misfortune to have had in command a naval officer who could not understand, much less appreciate, the delicate duty with the performance of which he was intrusted, and who did not perceive that it was his own country and not Brazil that was slighted by his proceeding.

The salute referred to was fired by the Nipsic, commanded at that time by one of the junior lieutenant commanders in service.

The next national service rendered by the squadron was by the gunboat Shamokin, which was permitted to take Mr. Washburn, our minister to Paraguay, through the enemy's lines, because I gave notice to this government that if they refused such permission I should demand my passport.

And the third occasion upon which our squadron has rendered a national service was when you sent the Wasp to Asuncion for Mr. Washburn, and after a detention of seven weeks at the allied headquarters, permission to pass was peremptorily refused by the Marquis de Caxias. You, at my request, reported the facts to me, and I, contrary to your judgment, insisted upon our right to send her to Asuncion, and demanded that all hinderance to her passing up should cease. Twice, in formal notes from the Foreign Office, was the demand rejected, and the conduct of the Marquis de Caxias approved. I then again, in opposition to the advice of cautious friends, assumed the responsibility of informing this government that on a certain day either my passports or an order for the Wasp's going up to Asuncion must be sent me.

Thereupon all opposition to the Wasp's passing the blockading lines of the allies was withdrawn. I communicated the facts to you, and requested that the same vessel, commanded by the same intelligent gentleman, might be sent up to Paraguay. You promptly complied with my request, and, thank God, she not only arrived safely at her destination, but most providentially just in time to save the lives of our minister and family.

Now you know that the Nipsic could have rendered all the national services performed for our squadron by the Shamokin and Wasp; and at the same time have made an annual visit to the coast of Africa. Let us suppose, then, that the Nipsic, commanded by a lieutenant commander, had been the only United States vessel of war on the station, and that upon receiving Mr. Washburn's report of the gross outrage perpetrated in Paraguay against the honor of our country and the rights and liberties of our people, I had addressed him the identical letter I addressed to you; are you prepared to say that such lieutenant in command would have been justified in sending me in response such an exceedingly offensive note as that to which I am replying? You will not pretend that any immunity in the premises attaches to you which would not equally apply to him. The rights and immunities, whatever they may be, attach to the position, to the officer in command, and have no relation to his rank.

I now pass to the second paragraph of your note, in which you say:

"Since your opinion is formed without a knowledge of the circumstances of the case, I may not, possibly, attach so much value to it as you seem to expect."

This is a most extraordinary, gratuitous, and, I must add, a most reckless assertion. And upon what is it based? If upon testimony of a higher character than that of our duly accredited minister, received by you since our interview, then, most assuredly it was your duty to have apprised me of such testimony being in your possession. But such a supposition is simply impossible; because, there can be no reliable testimony—nay, there cannot, in the nature of things, be any testimony whatever in the case which can for one moment weigh against Mr. Washburn's history of what has occurred in Paraguay, as reported to me and as has been set forth by him in his official letter to the British minister accredited to the Argentine Republic. Besides, you distinctly informed me on Monday, that although you had received Commander Kirkland's official report of his having performed the duties assigned him, he had made no report upon the events which had transpired in Paraguay. Of course not. Commander Kirkland is too wise to pretend to make a report upon events of which he necessarily could know nothing except what he learned from Mr. Washburn.

It follows, then, that your unwarranted assumption that my "opinion was formed without a knowledge of all the circumstances of the case," has no other foundation whatever than the abuse heaped upon Mr. Washburn in the allied press, because he has told, imprudently perhaps, disagreeable truths about the Marquis de Caxias, and upon the slanderous stories concocted by the allies, and retailed and circulated by Americans in the pay of Brazil, who consider it a condition of their employment that they shall be more Brazilian than Brazilians themselves. And upon such data you venture to set aside the elaborate and carefully prepared testimony of the American minister, who has just escaped from Paraguay with his life; and as an apology for so doing affect to discover in his own report of events the evidence of a man writing under such excitement (the result of bodily fear) as discredits his testimony. This is, indeed, an extraordinary state of things; and whatever may be "your official duties," and however disagreeable it may be to receive "unsolicited" opinions in regard to them, I venture the assertion, that thus to repudiate the direct testimony of a duly accredited United States minister upon the unfounded slanders of his enemies cannot and does not constitute any part of such "duties." And I assert, moreover, that your repudiation of Mr. Washburn's testimony, officially indorsed by me, has no more warrant than your uncalled for assumption and unqualified declaration that my "opinion is formed without a knowledge of all the circumstances of the case."

I will only add, in conclusion, that the question of the relative duties and respective rights of United States ministers and naval officers in command, which for some purpose that I cannot fathom you have thought proper to raise, should, and I trust will, be speedily settled by Congress. Whether in your favor or mine, does not matter. We are simply the instruments whose differences in a far-off land, in regard to what action is demanded by our naval forces on this station in vindication of the nation's honor, the rights of its officials, and the lives of our citizens, must and will call forth congressional legislation too long delayed. To secure such a result I shall cause this correspondence to be called for at the next session of Congress; and to convince you that, in the performance of my whole duty in this emergency, I do not intend to permit an official difference of opinion to degenerate into a personal controversy, I inclose herewith a copy of my dispatch to the Department of State written yesterday, when you were penning your extraordinary note to me, and which went forward by the steamer to Southampton this morning. Its spirit will be found somewhat different from that which guided your pen, and invited a personal controversy. To that spirit I shall adhere; and now feel it my duty to reiterate my requisition upon you, promptly and properly, to employ the large naval force under your command in the vindication of our national honor, the protection of the diplomatic rights of our country, and to attempt at least to save the lives of our outraged officials.

You may not know—and probably, if you did, would ignore it if reported to you by any one in the civil service of our country, but it is nevertheless my duty to inform you—that among the diplomatic representatives of foreign governments at this court, so far as I can learn, there is no difference of opinion in regard to what is expected from our minister and naval force on this station. They do not know that you and I are at variance on the question of duty; and, judging me by the past, they assume most naturally that we will not be unmindful of what is due to our country, and in her vindication, to the civilized world. As evidence of this sentiment, I copy from a note of his excellency George Buckley Matthew, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Great Britain at this court, his opinion upon this emergency, and which undoubtedly is the opinion of all his colleagues. You will perceive by its date that it was written on Tuesday, although it only reached me last evening:

"OCTOBER 6.

"MY DEAR GENERAL: 'Tis not pleasant to add to bad news, but a line to the eleventh hour tells me that your unfortunate countryman, Bliss, had been cruelly tortured, and that his companion was said to have been shot.

"If U. S. (Uncle Sam) stands that he can't hold up his head again.

"Yours, always."

I am in the receipt, too, of another letter from Mr. Washburn, dated the 29th September, (doubtful authority, the Brazilians, native and adopted, will tell you,) by which it appears that, in ignorance of your estimate of his character and the character of his testimony, he has addressed you a letter on the subject of his affairs. He says, among other things:

"Come what may, I fear that I am embargoed here for several weeks. The reaction that has come upon Mrs. Washburn renders it out of the question that she should venture to sea at present. While the danger lasted, and we did not know but I should be arrested, tortured to death or shot, and she sent on foot to the Cordilleras, she held up bravely. But the danger is past, and she has completely broken down. Visions of imprisonment, fetters and stripes for your humble servant, disturb and haunt her, and her doctor tells me to-day she must keep entirely quiet, and not go out for weeks. This excitement and prolonged strain on the nerves has brought on * * * * * ; so that there is no remedy but to wait here till she is sufficiently restored to start for home. What she most needs is quiet, together with sleep, undisturbed by horrid visions of Lopez and torture."

A horrible picture this; but horrible as it is, be assured, no matter what others will tell you to the contrary, and no matter how great your unfounded prejudices against Mr. Washburn, it is strictly true. Mr. Washburn is incapable of falsehood. His report of events in Paraguay is as worthy of credit as if signed by you or by me, and we may judge from Mrs. Washburn's present state what she and her husband have passed through.

May I not indulge the hope that this picture of the present consequences of past events may induce you to accept the truth as officially presented to you instead of your being biased in your judgment, and permitting your official action to be controlled by the representations of interested individuals? General Quitman, a northern man and classmate of mine, brought me a challenge from Brooks after his brutal assault upon Sumner, and my account of that infamous affair; and in justification of his bringing the challenge he informed me that no northern man could live quietly in the south unless he proclaimed himself more ultra upon the question of slavery than the slave-holders themselves. May not this be the condition of our countrymen in the employ of Brazil? Be this as it may, the only purpose for which the United States squadron is stationed on this coast, at enormous cost to our treasury, is to give protection to American commerce and American citizens, and to defend and vindicate the national honor, no matter by whom assailed. This cannot be accomplished by its lying idly in the harbor of Rio. The squadron you command is not here either for your pleasure or your convenience; and patriotism requires that it should be in the waters of the La Plata. And therefore it becomes my imperative duty, earnestly but respectfully, to urge upon you an immediate departure for the south.

SATURDAY, October 10.

While writing, I have had placed in my hands the following from the British minister, written yesterday. I have not seen Governor Matthew for a week, but I know he speaks the sentiments of the entire diplomatic corps as well as the wishes of every disinterested and patriotic American in this region:

"OCTOBER 9.

"MY DEAR GENERAL: Is your fleet going down to the river and up? I hope so. I declare to you I think we should have a general raid upon that wretch, who, with such a foe as Caxias, will go on for months.

"Yours, always,

"G. BUCKLEY MATTHEW."

Does it not occur to you, admiral, that it is alike strange and unaccountable that you alone, of all intelligent men in Brazil, and without the sympathy of a solitary disinterested countryman, should look unconcernedly upon the outrage perpetrated against our national honor, and should persistently refuse to employ our squadron for the purposes for which alone it was intrusted to your care? Does it not become you to scan close the influences which guide and mislead you, and, irrespective of self, to try and discover what the honor of our country requires at your hands?

Should this correspondence be continued, I request that you will send your official notes to me in the same manner that you have heretofore forwarded your private correspondence, that is, by a boat from the Guerriere direct to the legation. Or if that should be inconvenient, please send your letters to our consulate, which is in close proximity to the fleet landing. It is not seemly that an official correspondence between the United States minister and the naval officer in command of a station, no matter how exalted or humble his rank, should be left at a corner grocery, to be forwarded when the proprietor of such grocery finds it convenient to send lard and groceries to the minister's kitchen. One proceeding of that nature is quite sufficient to indicate your contempt for the subject discussed, even if not intended to be personally offensive to your minister.

This note, like my previous one, will be delivered to you in person on board the Guerriere, by my secretary.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

Rear-Admiral CHARLES H. DAVIS,
Commanding South Atlantic Squadron.

Rear-Admiral Davis to Mr. Webb.

UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP GUERRIERE,
Rio de Janeiro, October 13, 1868.

SIR: I received your letter dated the 9th instant on the evening of Saturday, the 10th instant.

Its style and language, and the character of its imputations, forbid the continuance, on my part, of this correspondence.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. H. DAVIS,

Rear-Admiral, Commanding South Atlantic Squadron.

His Excellency J. WATSON WEBB,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, Boa Viagem.

Mr. Webb to Rear-Admiral Davis.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Boa Viagem, October 14, 1868

SIR: I am in the receipt of your letter, in which you say:

"SIR: I received your letter dated the 9th instant on the evening of Saturday, the 10th instant.

"Its style and language, and the character of its imputations, forbid the continuance, on my part, of this correspondence."

I immediately read with great care the notes which have passed between us, with an avowed determination that if I discovered in aught I have written any imputation whatever upon your character or conduct, promptly to withdraw and apologize for it. The result of such careful examination of our correspondence is a conviction that the only imputations contained in it are to be found in your unwarranted and uncalled-for note of the 6th instant. A statement of facts, however disagreeable, cannot be considered "imputations."

I am sorry my "style" does not please you. Looking only to the discharge of a public duty, I did not consider it incumbent upon me to aim at any peculiarity of "style" in order to render grave official truths acceptable to a fastidious taste, and I employed the simple language of earnest conviction as eminently suited to the occasion.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

Rear-Admiral CHARLES H. DAVIS,

Commanding South Atlantic Squadron.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Webb.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 17, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 8th ultimo, without number, has been received. The recent events in Paraguay to which it refers may be regarded as painfully important. The letter* of this department to the Secretary of the Navy, a copy of which is inclosed, has been approved by the President, and may be accepted as our present impression in regard to affairs in that quarter. Any further measures which may be considered or adopted will depend upon future developments.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Mr. Kilpatrick to Mr. Seward.

No. 86.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago de Chili, October 31, 1867.

SIR : I have the honor to report that nothing of political importance has transpired at this capital since the date of my dispatch No. 82.

It is universally believed in Chili that Spain has no intention of resuming hostilities in the Pacific, and, with the exception of the work on the fortifications of Valparaiso, all warlike preparations have been suspended.

Public attention is wholly occupied with the proceedings of the national Congress respecting domestic affairs, and with the progress of the revolution in Peru.

I transmit herewith a copy of the Ferrocarril, newspaper of Santiago, containing the reports of an interesting discussion in Congress, relative to the negotiations by Chili for the purchase of vessels of war in the United States.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. KILPATRICK.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[Translation.]

Reply of Mr. Errazuriz, Minister of War, to Mr. Alemparte, Deputy from Chillan.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES,
Chili, October 24, 1867.

In this war with Spain, the cabinet is accused of double dealing : I will answer for it. They say we have deceived the country and our allies, by pretending zeal and activity in the purchase of vessels and munitions of war, while we refused to buy powerful vessels that were offered to us, ordering our agents privately not to purchase, but rescind his contracts, to the loss of vast sums of money to the country.

This is confirmed, they say, by the rescission of the contracts for the purchase of the Dunderberg and Idaho from the United States, which rescissions were ordered by our government secretly. To confirm and strengthen these accusations, there is published an official note from the Peruvian minister to his government, in which the Chilean cabinet is grossly calumniated. An explanation satisfied both governments, and the sole blame was attached to the Peruvian diplomat. (Called to order.)

I will not detail the efforts made by the government to purchase ships when the war began ; this is well known. You all remember that Mr. Lastarria declared positively, in a speech here, not long ago, that the government had made every effort to purchase vessels for our defense. We did get two vessels, now in our ports, and if they were not as strong as we wanted, they were the best we could get for our money. And now the government is blamed for buying those vessels ! If we had purchased the famous Dunderberg, these cavaliers would have blamed us for it, as they do now. What could we have done with the enormous vessel, of complicated machinery, estimated at three millions of dollars ? Immense sums would have been required to keep it in order, and then we would have had to build a special dock to keep it in repair.

Now I will let official documents speak for me. The eloquent language of facts will be sufficient to show what interest the government took in preparing for the crisis, and how anxious its agents were to purchase the kind of vessels required.

On the 1st of May, 1866, the minister of marine addressed this note to Mr. Carvallo, our minister in London :

“ SIR : The government wishes to acquire the means of putting an end to this war with Spain as soon as possible. We have positive information that there are two light vessels in good condition for sale in England, the N—, and another of equal or superior power. The government charges you to buy these two vessels, as well as the iron-clad Denmark, and send them to the Pacific immediately.

"You know, as the war increases, the difficulties of obtaining means to carry it on will increase, and we must, if possible, have forces stronger than any Spain can bring against us.

"Convinced of this, the government desires you to secure these elements, as soon as possible; for without them, we cannot avenge the wrongs that Spain has already inflicted upon the republic.

"The government confides in your patriotism, and places the destiny of the country in your hands. You are restricted to no limits in the execution of this charge.

"Though it is scarcely necessary to suggest to you the best way to effect this, yet it may be well to recommend you to avoid all officers of the navy, and others known to the spies of our enemies. You will know how to get these vessels out; and be sure not to let any of our naval officers return in them, even as passengers.

"Send the guns for our sloops in the vessels mentioned, or in any vessels that will be sure to land them in any of the ports of the republic. Be sure the guns are concealed in a dry place, where rust will not attack them.

"I repeat that the government must have the three vessels mentioned, or our honor will go unavenged. Our duty demands this, and the world expects it of us.

"Yours, &c.,

"JOSÉ MANUEL PINTO."

On the 9th of May, the order was repeated in these terms:

"I gave you positive orders by the last steamer, in the name of the government, to purchase the iron-clad Denmark, and the N—, and another of the same size, for sale in England.

"I now repeat the order to buy the three vessels, as they are needed for the prompt termination of this war. It is scarcely necessary to tell you that the country depends upon you for its safety; act with energy and judgment and you will gratify the country and the government. We also need muskets: buy those you mentioned and send them to any port in Chili.

"Yours, &c.,

"JOSÉ MANUEL PINTO."

Here is another letter of the same date, to the same address:

"A screw steamer in Glasgow, called the N—, built for a privateer, has been offered to the government. Instruct Commander Salcedo to examine it, before Mr. Edwards's agents make an offer for it.

"If found suitable, tell the agents to buy it and send it to one of the southern ports in the republic.

"Your duty, then, in this case, is to have the vessel examined by a proper person, and then inform Edwards of the decision rendered by the inspectors.

"If you have not already shipped the guns for the sloops, you may forward them in the vessel if you think it safe to do so.

"Yours, &c.,

"JOSÉ MANUEL PINTO."

Thanks to our intelligent agents, the vessels we had contracted for began to arrive in Chili about that time, and the government soon saw that they were not large enough to contend with the Spanish squadron, though they might prove very useful as transports and dispatch-boats, and might render some service in harassing the enemy. Needing no more vessels of that kind, the government instructed its agents not to get any more so small, but to purchase some strong and powerful ones.

On the 2d of June, the government, through the minister of foreign relations, wrote thus to Mr. Vicuña Mackenna:

"SANTIAGO, June 2, 1866.

"I must inform you that we do not want any more iron steamers like the Isabella, and we regret the contract you have already made. I send you these instructions, in case you have not left the country, as I desired you to do.

"Yours, &c.,

"ALVARO COVARRUBIAS.

"To Mr. BENJAMIN V. MACKENNA,

"Confidential Agent of the Government of Chili in the United States of North America."

On the same day Mr. Astaburuaga was addressed as follows:

"SANTIAGO, June 2, 1866.

"What our navy needs is light vessels, strongly built, with good guns, as I have often said to you. The Isabella, a side-wheel iron steamer, will not suit us. You will therefore refrain from purchasing any more iron steamers, not even propellers, that are not suitable for war purposes.

"ALVARO COVARRUBIAS.

"Don FRANCISCO S. ASTABURUAGA,
"Chilian Chargé d'Affaires in the United States of North America."

This dispatch was sent the same day to Mr. Rodriguez:

"SANTIAGO, June 2, 1866.

"The disappointment in not getting the iron-clad from Denmark is annoying. We hope you will use all your skill and energy in removing the difficulties in the way.

"I renew my former instructions to Mr. Carvallo about the steamers, N. and N., and hope you will use your best endeavors to effect their purchase. We need strong vessels, and must spare no sacrifice to obtain them.

"Yours, &c.,

"ALVARO COVARRUBIAS.

"To Mr. A. RODRIGUEZ,
"Secret Agent of the Chilian Government in Great Britain."

The next is a communication of the same date, addressed to Mr. Carvallo:

"SANTIAGO, June 2, 1866.

"Your dispatches 77 and 78, dated the 14th and 15th of April last, have been received. I regret that you have not yet purchased the Denmark iron-clad. The chief, if not the only difficulty, is the want of funds, as the £450,000 loan comes in too late. You applied to Baring Brothers to remedy this; it is a great pity it was not done sooner. We leave the selection of the officer who is to command the vessel to you. I repeat my instructions for the purchase of the steamers — and —, which you mentioned to the minister of marine. Hurry in this, I beg you. We hope the Henrietta will arrive safely. We have not yet heard of the arrival of the Peruvian iron-clads Huascar and Independencia.

"Yours, &c.,

"ALVARO COVARRUBIAS.

"To Mr. MANUEL CARVALLO,
"Minister Plenipotentiary of Chili in Great Britain."

On the 16th of June this letter was sent to the same minister:

"SANTIAGO, June 16, 1866.

"We are glad to hear, from your last, that you will succeed in purchasing the Denmark. The purchase money, £60,000, was furnished by the Barings, you say.

"Yours, &c.,

"ALVARO COVARRUBIAS.

"To MANUEL CARVALLO,
"Minister Plenipotentiary of Chili in Great Britain."

Here is a similar letter, of the same date, to Mr. Rodriguez:

"SANTIAGO, June 16, 1866.

"We are grieved that you have not yet secured the Denmark. Perhaps you may yet succeed, by adopting the plan proposed by the agent employed for that business. That is what Mr. Carvallo proposes.

"Yours, &c.,

"ALVARO COVARRUBIAS.

"To Mr. A. RODRIGUEZ,
"Secret Agent of the Government of Chili in Great Britain."

The minister of marine wrote thus to Mr. Astaburuaga:

"No. 1409.]

SANTIAGO, July 2, 1866.

"Although you have succeeded in purchasing the magnificent $850,000 vessel, I wish you to try for others of the same class, either of iron or wood. You need not get any more small vessels, we have enough; but we need strong vessels, ships of the line or iron-clads. Choose the largest kind, and try to purchase them, no matter at what cost; I do not limit you to number or price. The republic must have a strong naval force to repel the enemy, and it must be got regardless of expense. Similar instructions are sent to our agents, and to Mr. —.

"Yours, &c.,

"JOSÉ MANUEL PINTO.

"To Mr. FRANCISCO SOLANO ASTABURUAGA,
"Chargé d'Affaires of Chili in the United States."

Here is a letter to Mr. Rodriguez from the same source, and of the same date:

"SANTIAGO, July 2, 1866.

"The government has determined to purchase only first-class vessels. You will therefore confine your attention to the acquisition of frigates and iron-clads. Small vessels will be of no use to us. I must also inform you that the artillery needed for our vessels and fortifications must be English, and of first-class, and of these dimensions: Fifteen of 150, fifteen of 100, and thirty of 70. I send the order for the purchase of this artillery to-day, to our minister in England, in case you are not there.

"The government implicitly trusts in you for the faithful execution of this order, for the fortunate conclusion of this war will depend much on our agents in Europe.

"JOSÉ MANUEL PINTO.

"Mr. A. RODRIGUEZ,

"The Confidential Agent of Chili in England."

The minister of foreign affairs wrote to Mr. Carvallo as follows:

"SANTIAGO, July 9, 1866.

"The government has bought four vessels in the United States, two of which ought to be here now, and the other two must have started by this time. As we have enough small vessels, you are instructed to negotiate only for the ———, if you have not contracted for the two you mentioned. The government regrets the failure of the Denmark purchase, but hopes you will succeed in getting strong vessels suitable for war purposes. We wish to be avenged for the bombardment of Valparaiso. Use all your efforts to procure proper vessels, and send them on directly. Send us the cannons you got for the Valparaiso forts, and all others you may get for the other forts and vessels. In addition to those ordered, we want ten Armstrong or Blakely guns for ship use, which you will send without delay. All the artillery you get must load by the muzzle.

"Yours, &c.,

"JOSÉ M. PINTO."

On the same day this letter was addressed to Mr. Rodriguez:

"SANTIAGO, July 9, 1866.

"The fact that only small vessels have been purchased up to this time compels the government to instruct you to get large ones. Give your entire attention to this business. I know you will have much trouble in securing such vessels, as they are scarce, but the government trusts in your ability in being able to obtain them. We want to put an end to this war, in which our honor is concerned. I must also inform you that the artillery must be of the best kind, and you will be sure to send it out as soon as you possibly can.

"Yours, &c.,

"JOSÉ MANUEL PINTO.

"Mr. A. RODRIGUEZ,

"Confidential Agent of Chili in England."

On the 20th June, the following note from Mr. Carvallo was received by the minister of marine:

"LEGATION OF CHILI IN GREAT BRITAIN,

"London, June 30, 1866.

"Mr. MINISTER: In reply to yours of the 16th May, I have the honor to say: An offer was made to us yesterday of a new Turkish iron frigate of four thousand tons, armed with fourteen cannons of 150 and one of 300, because the Sultan could not pay for it. The cost price, £370,000, with interest, is all that is asked for it. At last dates our balance with Barings was £182,196 17 06, out of which I have already drawn £16,000, and will soon have to draw £20,000 more, besides £11,000 yet due for the sloop O'Higgins, which will reduce the account to £141,000. I have instructed Marino Benavente to offer £300,000 for the sloop, if it is such as it is represented. Needing a sum to rig and furnish it, we depend upon the £77,000 of the last loan for the first payment, and the balance in Peruvian bonds, such as were offered for the Denmark.

"Yours, &c.,

"MANUEL CARVALLO.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches Nos. 84, 85, and 86, of the 31st of October last, with their inclosures. In the latter you report that it is universally believed in Chili that Spain has no intention of resuming hostilities in the Pacific. It is ardently hoped by this government that the anticipation may prove to be well founded.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 15, 1868.

SIR: On the 11th day of June last I had the honor to make known to you, for the information of the government of Chili, that the modifications which that government proposed of the proposition of the United States, for mediation by them in the war opened between Spain and the allied republics of the Pacific, would be communicated to the government of the Queen of Spain for its consideration, and that whatever reply should be made by the Spanish government would be without delay announced to Chili and her allies. It happened, through a deficiency of attention in this department, that no such communication to the Spanish government, as I had promised, was immediately made, although the modifications suggested by the republics of the Pacific were informally mentioned to the minister from Spain here, and by him communicated to his government.

When the omission had been discovered I presented the matter to the Spanish government in due form. In consequence of the delay that thus occurred, it is only just now that I have received the formal reply of the Spanish government. This answer is, that Spain cannot concur in the modifications which the allied republics propose, and that those modifications are regarded as antagonistical to the project which was initiated by this government for the settlement of peace. The Spanish government, however, leaves it for the United States to determine when the good offices which they have been conducting between the belligerents shall cease. I am thus rendered able to submit for the consideration of the allied republics the question whether they desire to make any further communication to the United States in promoting a concurrence of views. Should those republics answer in the negative, the President, on receiving information to that effect, will announce to the several belligerents his conviction that the good offices of the United States, by way of mediation, may be regarded as no longer promising a favorable conclusion, and that those good offices may on both sides be regarded as coming to an end.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago de Chili, February 1, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the unhappy events in Peru which recently culminated in the overthrow of the constitutional government, have produced a profound impression in Chili, and threaten to involve the States of this coast in very embarrassing complications. You are aware of the remarkable decree of the Peruvian revolutionary chief, Canseco, dated in October last, in which all acts of the dictatorship of Colonel Prado are declared null and void. That decree has been reaffirmed by the revolutionists since their seizure of the government, and to all intents and purposes is now the law of Peru, as it was the corner-stone of the insurrection. Among the evils already suffered, and rapidly accumulating from such a complete repudiation of Peru's obligations to governments and individuals, are the violent disruption of the alliance with Chili, Bolivia, and Ecuador; and the disinclination approximating to a refusal of the new government to settle the pecuniary claims held by Chili against Peru, and whose payment was being urged previous to the overthrow of President Prado.

Chili's claims amount to several millions of dollars, of which her expenditures in maintaining the Peruvian squadron during the Spanish difficulties, and her interest in the loan recently contracted by Peru in the United States, form a considerable part. These items are in the category of the acts of the dictatorship repudiated by the new government. It is not apprehended that the other claims will be altogether repudiated, but there is little hope of their receiving favorable attention immediately, as the bitterness against Chili, which Castilla and his associate leaders of the revolution bore with them from their late exile in this country, has extended to all classes of the new party; and the friendly relations of Peru with Chili are regarded by the revolutionists with a chilling indifference that would require but little addition to precipitate the States recently in alliance into hostilities. So alive is Chili to the possibilities above referred to, that when the intelligence was received here of the success of the revolution, this government seriously considered the propriety of detaining the Peruvian iron-clad frigate Independencia and monitor Huascar, then in the bay of Valparaiso, as security for the payment of her just dues, and as a precautionary measure in view of the hostile attitude of the revolutionary government. Wiser counsels prevailed, however, and the vessels were permitted to depart for Callao.

From my experience and observation in these South American states I am of the opinion that a collision between Chili and Peru is not very imminent, although the aspect of the political horizon is ominous enough. Intestine disturbances are as common to most of these countries as are the periodical outbreaks on our western frontier; but while the Spanish Americans are ever plunging their own States into anarchy, they are slow to execute hostile threats against other governments. The total absence of sympathy between Chili and Peru at present, in connection with the claims above mentioned, may eventually bring on hostilities, but some time must elapse before such an unfortunate event can take place. In the mean time the new government of Peru may correct the mistake of the decree of repudiation, and afford an opportunity for harmonizing the discordant elements now widely separating the two countries.

I shall carefully observe the progress of the new relations about to be assumed, and shall keep you fully advised. If at any time it should become evident that the good offices of the United States government might be quietly interposed between these States for the prevention of war, I shall devote myself with all the prudence that I am capable of to the accomplishment of so desirable an end.

Ex-President Prado, accompanied by Colonel La Torre, chief of the "Column of Honor," Colonel Ugarteche, father-in-law of the ex-President, and Captain Delboy, commander of the Peruvian war steamer Meteoro, arrived in Valparaiso in the United States steamer Nyack, commander Pendergrast, on the 20th ultimo. The Nyack touched at Caldera in her voyage from Callao, and the telegram received here on the 18th, announcing the approach of the deposed President, created much excitement, particularly in Valparaiso. The ex-President was received with acclamations of welcome by an immense concourse in Valparaiso, and has been the object of the most courteous attentions since his arrival. He proposes to engage in agricultural pursuits here; but this will probably be for a short time, as a revulsion is certain to take place in Peru within a year or eighteen months, and Colonel Prado will undoubtedly be placed at the head of the movement.

Should the present unfriendly feeling between Chili and the revolutionary government continue, Colonel Prado would, I am assured, receive material aid from this government as well as from the Chilean people at large, for regaining his position at the head of affairs in Peru. I have no doubt that within two years the ex-President will be re-established, and by his late experience enabled to avert, during his legitimate term of office, the calamities which his recent mild administration suffered to accumulate upon himself and the country. As an evidence of his innocence of corruption, a quality so rare in Peruvian officials, he arrives here quite poor, and is compelled to receive from Chili the pay of a general of her army, which rank was conferred upon him by this government soon after the battle of the 2d of May, 1866, at Callao.

The relations of Chili with Spain remain unchanged. The events in Peru have entirely overshadowed the Spanish-American question for the present, and it is difficult to foresee what new phase the subject may now assume.

Domestic affairs in Chili are perfectly quiet, and the country is prospering in the most encouraging manner.

The President of Chili being about to absent himself from Santiago for a month, by a visit to the Araucanian Territory in the south of the republic, and as all the ministers are preparing to spend the hot season, now just commencing, at the watering places and other fashionable resorts, I avail myself of the interim to visit the Andes. I propose spending about two weeks along the Cordillera, and on my return will endeavor to make to the department an interesting report of my observations.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. KILPATRICK.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago de Chili, March 16, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to report that since my dispatch No. 99, dated February 1st, relative to the relations between Chili and Peru, as affected by the success of the revolution in the latter country, nothing of political importance has transpired here. The apprehensions of difficulties between this government and Peru, which existed at that time, have been materially dissipated by the manifestation of a disposition on the part of the revolutionary authorities of Peru to preserve friendly intercourse with Chili, and to maintain the alliance against Spain, but the unsettled state of affairs in Peru continues to be a subject of much solicitude.

The minister and consuls of Peru in Chili have tendered their resignations, which have been accepted, and Señor Yenteno, who visited Chili in the capacity of a commissioner on the part of the new authorities of Peru, to arrange the accounts of the allied squadron, having returned unsuccessfully to Lima, Peru at present has no official representative in this republic. The Chilean minister appointed near the government of Peru during the presidency of Colonel Prado reached his post after the success of the revolution, and has presented his credentials and been received by the present chiefs at Lima; but this government preserves a formal attitude, awaiting the re-establishment of legitimate authority, and will not enter into the discussion of any of the questions between the two countries until order is restored in Peru.

The hope is now entertained that the approaching election in the latter republic will speedily relieve the members of the alliance of the embarrassments which Peru has brought upon them, and that with the re-establishment of government and diplomatic relations Chili may peaceably adjust with her neighbors the important questions had under consideration with the government of Colonel Prado.

The domestic politics of Chili, and her relations with Spain, remain unchanged.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. KILPATRICK.

No. 103.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago de Chili, March 20, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches Nos. 52, 53, and 54, dated respectively December 7 and 27, 1867, and January 9, 1868.

In my dispatch No. 99, dated February 1, I informed you that I was about to make a short trip to the Andes, and that on my return I would make a report of my observations. I left Santiago on the third of that month, and was absent a little over three weeks, in which time I crossed the Cordilleras and visited the towns of San Carlos, Mendoza, and San Rafael, in the Argentine Confederation.

With baggage and provisions packed on mules I reached the pass of San José in one day's march from Santiago, and on the night of the second day bivouacked far up in the Cordilleras on the verge of vegetation. From this point is one day's hard traveling up perfectly barren mountains to a small valley at the foot of the first principal ridge. Another day's journey along this valley, a great portion of which has been inundated by some terrific volcanic eruption, leaving great heaps of sulphuric rock, lava, and ashes, brought us to the Cumbre or zigzag path by which the higher chain is crossed. The ascent here was extremely difficult the rarified atmosphere affecting man and beast very sensibly. There was considerable snow to cross, but the temperature was not so low as to necessitate the use of an overcoat. Crossing the heights, the path descends into a wide, desolate valley, many thousand feet above the sea. A day was occupied in crossing this waste, and another day in passing over the great Postillo pass, 14,300 feet high. This pass is one of the most difficult of the Andes. There is always more or less snow, the road consists of only a rocky path sufficiently wide for one to pass at a time, and a freezing wind blows with great violence. On reaching the summit the animals manifested much uneasiness. There is barely standing room for two or three persons on the ridge, from which a misstep would hurl mule and rider to destruction; and we found it necessary to lie down to avoid being swept off by the wind. The view was indescribably grand. The volcanoes of Aconcagua and Tupungati, respectively 23,000 and 26,000 feet high, rear their snow-white peaks above vast and seemingly boundless chains of black mountains utterly destitute of vegetation or animal life, with the exception of the condor, that solitary, on some lofty rock, watches the passing traveler, or slowly circles about the bristling pinnacles. A day was occupied in descending this ridge to the pampas, making in all a journey of seven days, although by forced marching it may be made in four.

Being unprovided with instruments I was unable to make any scientific observations; but this route having been visited by explorers, its phenomena is already known to science.

On reaching the pampas, which stretch in a sterile waste from the eastern base of the Andes many hundred miles to the fertile regions of Buenos Ayres, I stopped at one of the haciendas which, like small vases, dot the sandy plains, and spent a few days collecting specimens of birds and animals, of which there are many beautiful and rare varieties. After a day's visit to San Carlos, a small village on the highway to the southern frontier, I went to Mendoza, making a trip of ninety miles in a coach in ten hours. The ruins of the city, destroyed by the earthquake in 1862, when nine thousand lives were lost, still lie as they fell, with many families yet buried in the debris, and vines and weeds growing in wild confusion above them. Nothing has been done on the site of the destroyed city except to extricate the remains of a few persons from the ruins and reopen some of the principal streets leading to the country. On the border of the ruins a new town of about eight thousand inhabitants has already sprung up. The buildings are good, the streets wide, well paved, and adorned with shade trees, and the place promises to become an important city.

As I was traveling simply for relaxation, I declined the honors which the civil and military authorities offered, and at the expiration of two days left for San Rafael, the military outpost on the southern frontier between civilization and the hostile Indians. Here I remained a day, which was celebrated by the officers and citizens by a grand ostrich hunt, in which thirty ostriches and a number of curious animals were taken; and escorted by a troop of cavalry, furnished by the military commander, I set out across the pampas, fifty leagues to the Planchon pass in the south, en route for Chili. These plains are infested with hostile Indians, but none molested the party, and after several days' rough traveling over the Andes, and hunting guanacos, a species of deer, I reached Curico, the terminus of the southern railroad from Santiago.

The inhabitants on the other side of the Andes are brave, intelligent, and prosperous, and are deeply interested in the affairs of the United States. On every hand I was warmly welcomed as the representative of a people whose history forms an example to all republics, and I am sure that there is no heartier admiration manifested for our government by any class than that evinced by the communities among which I visited in the heart of South America.

The customs of that section differ very little from those of Chili and Peru. Traffic in cattle and horses is the principal business, in which vast fortunes might be suddenly made were it not for the losses sustained from the predatory revolutionary parties and the levies of the government. Immense herds of cattle and sheep are annually driven over the Andes to Chili, and when the military road now in process of construction by Chili is completed, trade between the two countries will become very important.

The subject of constructing a railroad by way of the Planchon pass has long been under consideration, and surveys have been made demonstrating the practicability of the undertaking. Were this to be accomplished, and the vast plains on the other side to be redeemed by irrigation by a large canal, as is also contemplated, an area of many thousand square miles now uninhabitable would become a garden in fertility, and afford to the enterprising a field of wealth surpassing any region of the world. The Cordilleras abound in mineral riches, the plains are as fertile as the prairies of the west; the climate is genial and of a regular temperature, and health and prosperity are sure to attend all who engage in the development of these regions.

From Curico I came to Santiago by rail, through a beautiful country full of valuable haciendas. I cannot, in the limits of an ordinary dispatch, give an adequate idea of the countless objects of interest presented in a trip of this kind, a journey of over twelve hundred miles, one thousand of which were made in the saddle. It will remain for the intelligent traveler, whose leisure may enable him to do justice to the subject, to elaborate a description of the wonderful phenomena of the Andes and the beauty and undeveloped wealth of these regions. I regard my experience on the journey as belonging to the most valuable of my life, and I shall ever be zealous to aid any undertaking that has for its object the diffusion of knowledge of these countries, and the opening of their treasures to the world.

Although my visit to the Argentine Confederation was unauthorized and unofficial, yet, in view of the friendly relationship between that government and the United States, I would respectfully request that our minister at Buenos Ayres be requested to express our appreciation of the courtesy extended to a representative of the United States by Colonel Segovia, commanding first regiment cavalry of the line, at San Rafael, who furnished me with an escort for several days during my journey on the borders of the Indian country.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. KILPATRICK.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 55, dated June 15, informing me of the reply of the Spanish government to the modifications proposed by the allied republics of Chili, Peru, Bolivia, and Ecuador, to the bases of arrangement suggested by the President of the United States for the adjustment of the difficulties between these republics and Spain, and asking if the republic of Chili had anything further to communicate towards promoting a concurrence of views.

The substance of your dispatch was communicated to the government of Chili, which replies (in a communication, a copy and translation of which, marked A and B, I inclose) that it would be impossible for Chili to consider alone this question and to give a definite answer, but that the subject will be immediately laid before the members of the alliance, and as soon as their unanimous decision can be made, the result will be transmitted to the United States.

SANTIAGO, March 24, 1868.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the note of the 18th instant which your excellency has been pleased to address me, informing me of the answer given to the government of the United States by that of Spain, in relation to the modifications proposed by the allied republics to the bases of the arrangement presented by the government of your excellency.

In this connection your excellency inquires if my government desires to communicate anything more to that of the United States upon the subject, to the end of promoting a concurrence of views, and announce that in case of a negative the government of your excellency will consider as terminated the good offices which it has been employing to attain peace by way of mediation.

In acknowledging the receipt of the note referred to, I should advise you that Chili, being bound to the other republics by means of a compact of alliance, it would be impossible for my government to deliberate by itself alone upon a matter of so much gravity, and to give to your excellency a definite answer.

For the present, it will doubtless comply with the duty incumbent upon it, to transmit, as in brief it proceeds to do, your excellency's note to the consideration of the allies, and to promote among all the confederated republics a concurrence upon the point which your excellency submits to its consideration; and as soon as the common views of all of them may be known, I shall make it my duty to satisfy the inquiry which your excellency addresses to me.

In the meantime it gratifies me to manifest to your excellency the gratitude of my government for the constant efforts of the United States to attain by means of its friendly offices the re-establishment of peace.

I avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be your excellency's attentive and faithful servant,

F. VARGA FONTECILLA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 27, 1868.

SIR: The technical continuance of the state of war between Spain on the one part, and Peru, Chili, Ecuador, and Bolivia on the other, occasions inconveniences to all neutral states, and especially to this country, which it is desirable should be terminated by a formal armistice. You will consequently suggest in the proper quarter that a measure of this character should be adopted by the government to which you are accredited. If your suggestion should be favorably received, you may follow it by another to the effect that all the parties to the war referred to should appoint plenipotentiaries to meet here for the purpose of bringing about a definitive peace. If the advice of this government should be asked, there shall be no want of proper and impartial effort on its part to see that the claims of all shall receive due consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Santiago de Chili, June 30, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to report that I have had two interviews with the minister of foreign relations, Mr. Fontecilla, in relation to the proposition for peace, which I had the honor to receive from you some time since. In my first interview, which took place a few days after the reception of your communication, I learned that Chili was most anxious to make peace by means of an armistice, but that the great obstacle in the way was a mutual agreement to that effect on the part of the allies, and although the insults and injuries inflicted by Spain were not so fresh as in months past, still there was an evident desire to secure peace on such conditions as would allow the allies to resume hostilities whenever it would be profitable for them to do so.

The interview was not so satisfactory as I could have wished, yet it opened the way for your proposition, which I forwarded on the 9th instant. The minister of state gives in his reply the substance of his ideas expressed to me in our conversation. General Hovey, our minister near the government of Peru, being at my legation, I thought it well to have an interview with the minister and General Hovey on the subject. I accordingly invited him to the legation. He came on the 21st instant, and freely entered into a discussion of the subject. He stated that Chili fully recognized the importance of peace, and earnestly desired that some means might be adopted to secure that end; but that there were many influences in Chili controlling the question that only those most intimately connected with the government could fully understand, and that these influences would prevent for the present a definite and absolute peace. I requested him to please to give us some idea what those influences were, and to explain what kind of peace Chili desired and would accept. He replied that he had no objection to do so; that he considered both of us and our government to be the true friends of Chili and her allies. The influences he stated were the natural results of Spain's cruel and unprovoked insults; that his people had not forgotten them, and looked forward to the time when they might secure a just satisfaction; that his government now encountered a strong opposition which would not fail to hold it accountable if it should celebrate an absolute peace that would forever close the door against Chili's just revenge; that whatever course his government might take, strong opposition would be encountered; yet they were willing to accept an indefinite armistice which would effectually settle the question, give security to trade, and satisfaction to the neutrals, and yet allow either of the belligerents to resume hostilities after timely notice. I asked him if he thought that either party would again resume the offensive? He answered, no, that Spain could not, and that Chili would not, and yet they did not wish to enter into an agreement to that effect. An armistice, he said, would close the war, and at the same time take from the opponents of his government the same power to injure that a definite peace would give them. This was the substance of our conversation, and most fully explains the reply of Mr. Fontecilla to my note of the 9th of June.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. KILPATRICK.

SANTIAGO, June 16, 1868.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the note of your excellency of the 9th instant in which you are pleased to manifest to me respecting the conversation I had the honor to have with you that you understood that Chili would consent to terminate the war with Spain by means of an armistice without conditions or explanations save that it should be indefinite in its duration. With this understanding you are pleased to recommend in the name of your government that all the powers that are parties in the war should meet in Washington with the object to arrive at a definite peace, in which case the government of your excellency would employ its efforts to see that the claims of all should receive due consideration. In reply to your esteemed note I desire to express to you by means of this the thought that I had the honor to give you verbally. For some time back the opinion of these countries has been vividly manifest: that the indecisive and precarious situation of the war should be terminated in a manner to give to the work of peace guarantees more solid than the simple suspension of hostilities offers. To satisfy this legitimate desire my government will not be backward in accepting a truce definite in its character, which, while preserving to the belligerents their respective pretensions, offers, nevertheless, to the neutrals all the guarantees and securities which they claim. My government thinks that, for the present, this is the most obvious way to arrive at a mutual agreement, and to correspond to those noble efforts made to secure peace by several governments friendly to us, among which principally figures that of your excellency. With this view the governments allied are actually engaged to procure a mutual agreement, taking into consideration the proposition of truce made by the governments of France and England. The arbitration suggested by your excellency for the belligerents to send plenipotentiaries to Washington to arrange their reciprocal pretensions, and celebrate a definite peace, would not do more than retard the accomplishment of the proposition before indicated. It is to be presumed that the recent events, and the irreconcilable character of the pretensions of the belligerents, make impossible, at present, a mutual agreement to arrive at a definite peace. In any case my government desires, as in all honor it should, to thank the government of your excellency for its constant efforts in favor of peace, and to assure it that in our deliberations with our allies the new offer which your government has been pleased to present through the respectable organ of your excellency shall be presented with all attention.

I embrace this opportunity, &c., your attentive, &c.,

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 30th of June, No. 120, which is accompanied by a copy of a note which was addressed to you on the 16th of that month by Mr. Fontecilla, concerning the proposal of the United States to mediate between the republics of the Pacific and Spain. LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Valparaiso, November 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate to you that his excellency Antonio Flores, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Ecuador to Peru and Chili, called at this legation this afternoon to confer with me on the subject of the differences existing between the allied republics of South America and Spain. He has been zealously and successfully engaged in his mission, and has obtained the assent of all the republics unconditionally to the armistice except Chili, and he assures me that Chili is ready to accept the mediation of the United States provided that government celebrates the armistice between the belligerents, and much better if it wishes to give its guarantee to the armistice or truce. This England and France have already proposed, but Chili would much prefer the mediation of the United States.

It should be a condition of the armistice or truce that if there is no settlement of the question by the plenipotentiaries who should meet in Washington, then the truce shall continue until one of the parties give notice to the other, one or two years before the expiration of it. On these terms the mediation will be immediately accepted by Chili, as it has already by the other republics—Ecuador, through Mr. Flores, being the first to do so.

Mr. Keyes, the Chilian minister of foreign relations, who has made this proposition to Mr. Flores, writes to-day in the above terms to the Chilian representative in Lima, Peru.

Mr. Flores has obtained full success in one of the principal points of his mission—the reopening of the Pacific to the Spanish merchant vessels. It has been agreed in Santiago, by the Chilian government, that Chili shall not commit hostilities against the merchant vessels of Spain provided with Ecuadorian passports. The said vessels shall not come to Chilian ports except in distress (arribada forgosa.) No obstacle shall be put to the trade between Ecuador and Spain.

Hoping an early reply, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. W. CLARK.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San José, Costa Rica, May 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies and translations of the correspondence relative to the visit of the Prussian steam sloop of war Augusta to the bay of Limon, and its object. The documents consist of the letter of Captain Kinderling to the Prussian consul residing here, with translation, marked respectively No. 1 and No. 2; the letter of the consul to the Costa Rica government, with translation, marked respectively No. 3 and No. 4; the reply of Secretary Volio, with translation, marked respectively No. 5 and No. 6; and my letter to the secretary, soliciting the copies, with translation of his reply, marked No. 7. These documents fully explain themselves.

I submit this correspondence without remark, merely observing that the refusal to accede to the solicitation so flatteringly presented may be accounted for by the pointed allusion to the Monroe doctrine, the principles of which are declared to be "acknowledged by all America," which is sufficiently significant.

SAN JOSÉ, April 20, 1868.

HON SIR: I have the honor to make the following communication:

Among other instructions given me by his Majesty's admiralty, all of which contemplate the protection of North German commerce of his Majesty the King of Prussia's North German subjects, is also that of examining the port of Limon, on the coast of the republic of Costa Rica, in order to ascertain whether it possesses all those requisites that his Majesty's government may deem desirable to establish there a depot for their West India naval station. This has been the motive of my visit to Limon, which port I surveyed minutely, reconnoitering likewise its environs; nor did I hesitate to go up to the interior and across the whole country, so as to obtain all necessary information, since a port is useless without the possibility of communicating with the interior. The result of my investigation is, on the whole, favorable to the object in view. It is true, the bay of Limon at present is nothing more than a roadstead, partially sheltered by a point of land, a coral reef, and a small island; however, its condition is altogether such that, with a comparatively small outlay it can be turned into a good port, far better, for instance, than Colon, (Aspinwall,) the present intermedium of the whole transit between the two oceans. Neither is there, for the time being, a road between Limon and the interior; a dense forest, lofty mountains, and many small rivers, still divide the Atlantic coast from the cultivated part of the country. Still, as I crossed this region, I became satisfied that it is an easy task to open a road from the higher table lands to the coast, inasmuch as the greatest difficulty, the crossing the mountains, is already overcome. All the part of the road already made is graded nearly on an equal level, winding gradually down the slopes of the hills; almost the only part wanting in that which crosses the forest, where the only labor will be to clear away the wood by felling and burning the trees.

Taking all these circumstances into consideration, I cannot but recommend to his Majesty's government the bay of Limon as a proper place for erecting a depot.

But an immediate consequence of my instructions and mission, and a duty to be necessarily derived from them, is that of securing, if possible, to his Majesty's government the means of subsequent negotiation; for otherwise, my reports, however favorable, would be illusive and useless. My motive for expressing this opinion is, that I am perfectly aware that at this very moment an effort is being made to secure to other parties the use of the port of Limon, under one pretense or another.

Therefore I claim your good offices, as the representative of Prussia, in order to present to this supreme government a request that they will agree to consider themselves as bound, with regard to the port of Limon, for a term of six months from the 1st of June next; in this sense, that they will consent not to make any contract with any foreign government or private company before the expiration of the term I have specified, namely, before the 1st of December next.

I need not dwell on the advantages Costa Rica must derive from a more intimate connection with Prussia, these being perfectly understood by this supreme government. I shall, also, strictly abstain from taking any political view of the question; for a formal treaty can only be agreed to with some diplomatic representative of the North German Confederacy, invested with full powers for the purpose.

It is hardly probable that any formal objection will be raised against my request, since I present it through your medium, Mr. Consul; and, as I have stated before, it must be considered as agreeing with my instructions and a necessary consequence of the same.

I would respectfully beg you to communicate this note to Don Julian Volio, minister of foreign affairs, and remain, Mr. Consul, your most obedient servant,

KINDERLING,

Captain, Commanding his Majesty's sloop of war Augusta.

J. FREDR. LAHMANN, Esq.,

His Majesty the King of Prussia's consul.

Mr. Lahmann to Señor Volio.

CONSULATE OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF PRUSSIA,

San José, Costa Rica, May 1, 1868.

HONORABLE SIR: His Majesty the King of Prussia's steam sloop of war Augusta cast anchor in the bay of Limon on the 10th of April last. Her commander, Captain Kinderling, R. N., has received various instructions from the admiralty of the North German Confederacy, and, among others, that of visiting the coasts of the Caribbean Sea in search of some port whose situation and conditions might be turned to account as a depot and station for the North German navy, it being the intention of his government to establish several naval depots and stations in different parts of the world, and one of these in the sea of the Antilles. This government having kindly invited Captain Kinderling, he is now in this capital, as you are aware. He has found the bay and port of Limon very well adapted to the object in view; and, taking into consideration the geographical situation of Costa Rica, the peaceable character and industry of her inhabitants, the circumstance of a road having been planned and even begun, leading from the interior to said bay, and finally, the prosperous future such advantages must secure to the country, he considers himself justified in recommending to his government the port above mentioned, and also the expediency of negotiating with the supreme government of Costa Rica for a grant in said port.

Captain Kinderling considers that all his surveys, and all the trouble he has taken, would be thrown away did he not succeed in obtaining from the supreme government of Costa Rica an assurance that they will not bind themselves to any other government, company, or private party for the use of said port, with the object above specified, until his report reaches Berlin, where his government will weigh and consider the reasons he adduces, and will, in all probability, be prompted by them to open negotiations with Costa Rica for a grant of said port for the purpose of establishing there a naval depot and station.

I have the honor to inclose the original communication directed to me by Captain Kinderling, who commissions me to ask your kind mediation in obtaining from the supreme government of Costa Rica a term of six months from the 1st of June next, to insure sufficient time for dispatching and receiving a reply to his reports to his government about Port Limon and Costa Rica generally; it being understood that, during the term mentioned, the government of Costa Rica shall bind itself not to enter into any engagement respecting Port Limon, as far as concerns the use it is intended to make of it as a depot and station for the navy of the North German Confederacy.

I hardly need expatiate upon the advantages Costa Rica would derive from a treaty such as the one in view, for you, Mr. Minister, are better able than myself to appreciate them fully. For the present I shall, therefore, remain satisfied with requesting your best interest in obtaining from the supreme government the term required, and improve this opportunity to subscribe myself, Mr. Minister, your humble servant,

J. FREDR. LAHMANN, Consul.

Hon. DON JULIAN VOLIO,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, San José.

Señor Volio to Mr. Lahmann.

[Translation.]

NATIONAL PALACE, San José, May 6, 1868.

SIR: I have given due consideration to your esteemed dispatch of 1st instant, in which you are pleased to communicate the result of the surveys made by Captain Kinderling, commanding his Prussian Majesty's sloop-of-war Augusta, in the bay of Limon, on the Atlantic coast of this republic, in order to ascertain whether said port unites all those conditions which may appear desirable to his Majesty's government for establishing there the depot of their West India naval station. You, at the same time, express the request that this government should consent to enter into no arrangements, either with any foreign government or any private company, with respect to the bay of Limon, for six months dated from 1st June, 1868, in order to insure time sufficient for a commission of the North German Confederacy, invested with full powers to come here and negotiate for a concession in said port. I am instructed by the President of the republic to answer, that, although Costa Rica would most assuredly derive great material advantages from the establishment of a naval station in any of her ports, principally on her north coast, still her traditional policy, agreeing with those principles acknowledged by all America, and, above all, with the peculiar circumstances of her situation, forbids her to make special concessions to any government whatever, however great her sympathy for the same, and however completely secured her independence and political autonomy may be.

In our present condition any deviation from the inflexible rule we have bound ourselves to follow, namely, to grant equally to all nations that honor us with their friendship, without distinction or privilege of any kind, such advantages as they justly demand, both for their commerce and countrymen, would create complications that we must avoid, even at the expense of delaying that progress we so anxiously covet.

Such being the case, there is no danger of this government granting any exclusive privilege to any other government, neither during the six months you demand, nor within a longer period, whatever the advantages tendered in return.

But as the spirit of private enterprise in Prussia might need for its development either the use of the bay of Limon, or of part of the public lands, or of some navigable river in this country, nothing prevents that, during the term of six months asked by Captain Kinderling, some private company should be formed, with the object of improving the port, or building a road to the interior, or some other work useful to this republic, with the assurance that, if the conditions set forth are acceptable, all lawful privileges required shall be granted; and, in the meanwhile, this government shall consider itself bound to negotiate with no other company during said term of six months.

Trusting that my answer will prove satisfactory to you, I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant,

J. VOLIO.

J. FREDR. LAHMANN, Esq., Prussian Consul, San José.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San José, May 6, 1868.

SIR: I would respectfully solicit copies of the correspondence between the Prussian consul and this government in relation to the proposed establishment of a naval station by the North German Confederation in the bay of Limon, for the purpose of transmitting the same to the State Department of the United States.

Please accept, Mr. Secretary, the assurance of my high consideration.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. MORRELL,
Acting Consul in charge of the Legation.

Hon. JULIAN VOLIO,
Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, San José.

Señor Volio to Mr. Morrell.

NATIONAL PALACE, San José, May 8, 1868.

SIR: In reply to your esteemed communication of the 6th instant, I do myself the honor to inclose copies of the correspondence exchanged between this department of state and the Prussian consul, in reference to a special concession solicited for establishing a naval station in the bay of Limon.

As no private character attaches to this affair, I think you are free to make of this correspondence such use as you may deem proper.

Accept the assurance of the particular regard of your obedient servant,

J. VOLIO.

No. 10.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San José, Costa Rica, May 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a brief outline of the message of the President of Costa Rica, addressed to congress on the opening of the session, May 1st. I also send you by this mail a printed copy of the message in full.

This government, in view of the urgent necessity for adopting some adequate measures for diminishing the excessive cost of transportation of the coffee crop to a port of shipment, propose to open a new port at a place called Tivives, in the gulf of Nicoya, situated some twenty miles less distant from the coffee-producing districts than Punta Arenas, and accessible by a much easier route, to which a road can be made that will avoid all the high mountains and deep ravines now traversed with great difficulty, and with such easy gradients as to admit of double the present quantity being hauled by a given number of cattle, and in much less time, provided the harbor, after a careful survey by competent hydrographers, shall prove to be suitable.

But, owing to the entire absence in this country of persons capable of making the necessary surveys, and considering the little reliance to be placed on the reports of hired engineers from abroad, it is proposed to solicit the execution of the work from some one of the nations, viz., the United States, England, and France, having squadrons in the Pacific;

it being presumed, perhaps with reason, that it would be an employment not only appropriate but likewise agreeable to them.

Much interest is felt in this subject, not only by the government, but by the leading capitalists, and indeed by all who are interested in the exports and imports of the country, which includes both producers and merchants; and I am aware that the government by last mail instructed their minister at Washington to suggest the matter to our government, the first to which it addresses itself; but, failing to receive there the assistance desired, they will then address themselves to one of the other nations named.

Such being the case, and showing as it does that this government regards ours as its first and most reliable friend, I trust it will be found practicable and convenient to comply with the desire indicated, and to detail a vessel of war for the purpose. Independent of other and weightier considerations, the reception which would be given to the commander of such a vessel here could not fail to enhance the cordial relations already existing between this country and our own.

As you are already aware, this administration is very desirous of celebrating a treaty of reciprocity with the United States, and I think it a matter which deserves serious consideration. We ought to supply a greater part of the wants of these countries, but under present circumstances our manufacturers cannot compete with those of Europe. Under a reciprocity treaty with this country, (and the other Central American states would soon follow,) not only an extensive market would be opened for our manufactures, but a great amount of surplus capital would find employment here. The new port of Limon would at once be utilized; a road from there to the interior would immediately be constructed; adequate inducements would offer themselves to immigrants, who would augment the number of consumers of and traffickers in our products. In short, these countries would soon be "Americanized."

The matter has been several times mentioned by the secretary, whose ideas, however, I have not considered sufficiently liberal to be entertained; and I have at last thrown out a hint that a treaty on the following basis might, perhaps, be accepted by our government, viz: All products of Costa Rica arriving in vessels of Costa Rica or of the United States, to be free of duty in the United States, and all products and manufactures of the United States, except rum, tobacco, and gunpowder, (which are government monopolies,) arriving in vessels of either nation, to be free of duty in Costa Rica.

I would thank you to inform me whether it would be agreeable to our government to receive a proposal from this, for a treaty on such or some similar basis; and if so, I have no doubt it would be made without hesitation.

It is true, such a treaty would diminish our custom-house receipts somewhat, but only to a limited extent, and means could easily be found to make up the deficiency; and even if they could not, the advantage gained by the nation from such an extension of our commerce would more than balance the loss, independent of the important political considerations involved. The time would soon come when we might well say "America for Americans."

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. MORRELL.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Brief outline of the message of the President of Costa Rica to Congress, at the opening of the session, May 1, 1868.

Liberty and security for individuals, tranquillity, peace, and prosperity for the republic, have marked the second as they did the first year of this administration; Costa Rica is at peace with all the nations of the globe. A minister has just been received from Nicaragua, whose mission is to celebrate a treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation. The national income for the past year has been greater than ever before. The country is in want of new roads and new ports, needs a suitable penitentiary, colleges, and new cuarteles (barracks) in several places, some of which are already in course of construction, and appropriations are made for others. The national bank has been established and is in successful operation. The railroad contract has lapsed in consequence of the failure on the part of the company to comply with its obligations, but there are hopes of a new contract being celebrated with better results. Facilities for the more economical transportation and shipment of coffee are greatly needed, and a road to the river San Carlos is recommended, as also a road to the port about to be opened on the Pacific, Tivives. Recommends that the export duty on coffee (now half a cent per pound) be reduced one-half, and the deficiency made up by slightly augmenting the import duties. The executive has not been able to accomplish any thing in regard to public instruction for want of the requisite authorization. Recommends the appointment of a commission to revise the code.

Mr. Morrell to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San José, Costa Rica, May 25, 1868.

SIR: Respectfully referring to my dispatch No. 9, dated 8th instant, accompanying copies of correspondence between the Prussian consul and this government in reference to a proposed naval station for the North German Union in the bay of Limon, I have now the honor to inform you that the Prussian consul here, I believe, will strenuously urge upon his government the expediency of promoting the formation of such a company as is suggested in the latter portion of Mr. Volio's letter.

In my opinion, it would be a good thing for this country if such a project could be carried out, as it needs settlers above all else for the development of its many resources; and it need be no cause of dissatisfaction to the United States, for the clause in Mr. Volio's letter, "if the conditions set forth are acceptable," covers a wide ground; and such a company, unless its members should become naturalized citizens of this country, would be on no other footing than all other foreigners. Should they become naturalized, so much the better on all accounts.

I remarked in the dispatch above referred to that I would "advise our representatives in the other Central American States of this affair, and send them copies of the correspondence by the next mail." On reflection afterwards, I considered that there was no great necessity for sending copies, especially after the comprehensive extracts contained in my letters to them. Still, inasmuch as I promised the copies in those letters, I resolved to send them, only, however, with the special consent of Mr. Secretary Volio, as I had asked them of him in the first place with a view to their transmission to the Department of State. He not only consented readily, but seemed pleased to have them sent.

I mention this circumstance for the purpose of asking, as there are sometimes occasions requiring the communication from one legation to another of advices, documents, &c., though rarely so in time of peace, perhaps, whether I have erred in deeming this to be such an occasion. My sole motive for the proceeding was, that there might be a similar application made in some of the other States, either on the Atlantic or Pacific, especially on the latter, as Nicaragua, Honduras, and Salvador, all have some very eligible ports; and in such a case it would be well to have the decided negative answer of Costa Rica known.

In default of instructions for my guidance in conducting the affairs of the legation, I am obliged to rely almost exclusively on my own judgment; and if I sometimes err I hope it will be on the right side. My aim is to make all my intercourse, written or otherwise, characterized by truth, justice, and comity, regulated by such common sense as I happen to possess, which last, if fortunately combined with tact and judgment, may for most practical purposes answer in place of the wisdom which I am sorry to say I lack.

I have the honor to subscribe myself, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. MORRELL.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

No. 2.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San José, Costa Rica, October 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform the department that on the 2d day of last month (September) I left my place of residence in Parkersburg, West Virginia, for my post of duty. It being necessary that I should visit the city of Washington before leaving the country, in order to receive further instructions, I did so, and then proceeded to New York, from which place, I embarked on the 16th of the same month for Aspinwall, on board of the steamer Ocean Queen, arriving at Aspinwall on the 24th. I continued on my journey, and after some unavoidable delay I arrived at my post of duty on the 2d of this present month, (October.)

Soon after my arrival I expressed my desire to the secretary of foreign affairs that a day might be fixed, in order that I might present to the President my letter of credence. Accordingly it was the pleasure of the President to fix on Tuesday, the 6th of this present month (October) for that purpose. At the time named above I obtained an audience, and was received by the President with great cordiality. On handing my letter of credence to the President, I made a few remarks—marked inclosure No. 1. A copy of the reply of the President marked inclosure No. 2.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MR. PRESIDENT: It has been the pleasure of the President of the United States to appoint me minister resident to the Republic of Costa Rica, and I have the honor to place in your possession my credentials as such.

In performing this agreeable duty, I am directed by the President of the United States to assure your excellency that it is the earnest desire of the government of the United States that the friendly feeling now so happily subsisting between the two governments shall not only remain undisturbed, but, if possible, be placed on a more permanent basis. I beg to assure your excellency that it will be my constant aim, as it will be my duty, to give effect to the desire of my government in that behalf, and thereby contribute to the interests and happiness of the two countries.

Mr. MINISTER: I feel the most lively satisfaction in receiving you in the character conferred upon you by the credentials you (now) deliver into my hands. I congratulate myself on seeing in this little republic another worthy representative of the wise, great, and mighty power that made way for the independence of the other states of this continent. I am aware how important it is for the prosperity and aggrandizement of my country that the friendly feeling happily existing between it and the United States of America should be not only maintained, but consolidated and strengthened as much as possible. If such is the wish of the noble President of the North American Union, for my part I long for it, and will do to realize it all that lies within the bounds of the power vested in me by the constitution.

I am highly gratified, Mr. Minister, by your assurance that you will contribute to so commendable an object, and I promise you beforehand that the people and government of Costa Rica will be grateful, as sincerely as I bid you welcome, and express my best wishes for the welfare of your country and its worthy President.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 2, of the 10th ultimo.

Your proceedings as described since your arrival in the republic are approved. Your cordial reception by its government, and the very friendly remarks made on that occasion by the President, are extremely gratifying.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San José, Costa Rica, November 10, 1868.

SIR: I avail myself of the first opportunity offered, to lay before the department the facts in regard to the revolutions which has recently taken place in this republic.

Immediately on my arrival here, I endeavored to obtain accurate and reliable information as to the political condition of this republic, particularly whether there were any wrongs or serious grievances complained of, which were likely or might lead to a change of government. Of course I labored under great disadvantages, from the fact that I was an entire stranger to every one. I had to proceed with great caution, lest I might be led into error by unreliable information. I, however, soon became satisfied that there was a jealousy or rivalry existing between two leading houses or families, as to which should give direction to public matters, or govern the country.

According to the constitution of the republic, a new President had to be elected in April next. One of the parties above mentioned charged the acting President with not only being in sympathy with the candidate of the other party, but that he was using his official position to secure his election; still, there was but little excitement about the matter, as the election was some six months off. I was convinced, by the most prominent men I came in contact with, that there was such a universal desire with all parties to observe the law and abide by the constitution, that nothing of a serious character would grow out of it. Such seemed to be the condition of things up to the 1st instant.

On the first Sunday of every month it is the custom for all the militia of this province to assemble here, at the plaza, to drill and have their fire-arms examined. Accordingly on the 1st instant—being Sunday—they were here as usual. I, in company with the vice-consul of the United States at this place, walked up to the plaza, where they were being drilled. They were formed into a hollow square, and then reviewed by President Castro, in company with the two leading generals of the army, after which the President retired to his mansion, about a square distant from the plaza.

Immediately after the President left, one of the generals above mentioned announced to the militia "that it became necessary, for the good of the country, that the President, Dr. Don José Maria Castro, should be removed from office, and that Señor Lic. Don Jesus Jimenez should be declared President." Orders were issued at once to take possession of the quartelles and other public property belonging to the government, which was done accordingly. The President was immediately notified, by two officers sent for that purpose, of what had been done, coupled with the request that he would remain at home. The revolution was then at an end. It was as effectual as it was sudden. Not a shot was fired or particle of resistance offered. People went to church as if nothing unusual had taken place. Notwithstanding nearly everybody seemed surprised, there appeared to be a general acquiescence in what was done. Since then all the provinces have acquiesced in the action taken at the capital, and the people are pursuing, as usual, their daily avocations.

I inclose herewith the Boletín Oficial, dated the 3d instant, which I have marked inclosure No. 1, in which you will find the address of the general of the army, his excellency the President's proclamation, the addresses of the army, and citizens of the capital; also the action taken by the municipalities of San José and Cartago. On the 3d instant, I had the honor to receive from his excellency A. Esquivel, the secretary of state, a note, informing me officially of what had taken place, and expressing an earnest desire on the part of the President that the friendly relations existing between the government of Costa Rica and the United States should remain uninterrupted. I have had the same translated, and inclose a copy, marked inclosure No. 2.

On the following day I had the honor to address a reply to the note of the honorable secretary, a copy of which is marked inclosure No. 3. I felt that I could not in my reply do less than express my regret, at least, of the manner in which the late President was removed from office. But inasmuch as the new government seemed to be almost universally acquiesced in by the people, I did not feel that I would be justified in refusing to recognize it officially.

I am assured by those who profess to have the confidence of the existing administration, that the President will, in a day or two, issue a proclamation, directing that delegates be elected to convene at an early day, to form a new constitution, and that when made, it will be more liberal and republican in its provisions than the last one.

In looking over the whole ground, from my standpoint, I have been led to the following conclusions:

First. That the destinies of the republic of Costa Rica are principally in the hands of the two leading generals of the army; that they have the confidence of the soldiers and the militia of the republic, and that the latter will follow the former wheresoever they may choose to lead them. Second. That like the two leading families I have mentioned, there is a jealousy—and a growing one—between these two generals; that so soon as either one or the other thinks he has the ability to strike effectively for power, he will do it. Third. That the great mass of the people are very civil and well disposed, and, further, that they earnestly desire a republican form of government, and one that would be permanent; but that they are impotent to give effect to that desire, for the reasons above mentioned. I hope, however, that the future will prove I am wrong in my convictions, and that the convention, which will soon assemble to form a constitution, will act from the most patriotic motives, and give the people not only a republican constitution, but so distribute the powers of the government, as one will act as a check on the other. I will inform the department from time to time of all events which may take place, or matters which may seem to me important to communicate.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JACOB B. BLAIR.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Señor Esquivel to Mr. Blair.

[Translation.]

NATIONAL PALACE, SAN JOSÉ,
November 3, 1868.

SIR: On the 1st instant, the army of the republic, the municipality of the province, and a considerable majority of the principal citizens of this capital, considered themselves justified in divesting Dr. Don José Maria Castro of his office of President of this republic, and in calling to fulfill the high duty Licentiate Don Jesus Jimenez, who had been appointed first substitute to exercise executive power.

The other provinces have countenanced the action taken by the capital, and fully approve all the measures adopted here.

Licentiate Don Jesus Jimenez has assumed the supreme power, and the undersigned still retains the office of secretary of state in the department of foreign relations.

For the reasons above mentioned, I have been instructed by the President to assure your excellency that the events which have taken place do not alter in any way those frank and friendly relations that happily exist between Costa Rica and the great republic which your excellency so well represents, and that he will consider it one of his most agreeable duties to endeavor to strengthen more and more the bonds which unite the two republics.

I repeat to your excellency the assurance of the most cordial and deepest consideration, with which I subscribe myself your most humble servant,

A. ESQUIVEL.

Hon. JACOB B. BLAIR,
United States Minister Resident in Costa Rica.

Mr. Blair to Señor Esquivel.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES AT SAN JOSÉ,
Costa Rica, November 4, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, by which I am informed that Señor Dr. Don José Maria Castro was divested of the office of President of the republic of Costa Rica, and that Señor Licenciado Don Jesus Jimenez has been called to that high position; and, further, that you have been instructed by the President to assure me that the events that have taken place do not alter in any way the friendly relation that exists between Costa Rica and the United States. I hope I shall be pardoned for expressing my deep regret that, in the judgment of those you have named, it became necessary to remove the late President from office in the manner detailed in your note. I am, however, happy to learn from you that the action taken at the capital has been fully approved by all the provinces of the republic. I shall lay before my government, at the earliest possible period, the contents of your note, and, unless I shall receive instructions to the contrary, will regard my relations to the government of Costa Rica as heretofore.

I beg you to assure his excellency the President that the government of the United States earnestly and sincerely desires that the most friendly relations shall exist between the two governments, and, as in the past, so in the future, it will strive, by all means consistent with the national honor, to preserve that feeling of amity and good will which has heretofore existed between the two countries.

I cannot close this note, Mr. Secretary, without expressing to you the great gratification I feel on being informed that, notwithstanding the events which have taken place, you will still retain the office of secretary of state in the department of foreign relations, which you have heretofore filled with so much honor to yourself and benefit to your government.

Be pleased to accept, Mr. Secretary, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

Your obedient servant,

JACOB B. BLAIR.

Secretary of State, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Blair.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 1, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatches of the 10th of November, Nos. 5 and 6, have been received. In your No. 5 you announce that a revolution has taken place in Costa Rica, which was effected by the mere display of military force, unresisted, and without the effusion of blood. You further announce that in that movement the President, Señor Castro, was deposed, and the first provisional substitute, Señor Jimenez, had assumed the executive power. The further transactions mentioned are an acquiescence of the several provinces, the suspension of the constitution, and the call of a national convention to adopt a new constitution. As a consequence of these events, you have recognized the new President, subject to directions on the occasion from the President of the United States.

It does not belong to the government or people of the United States to examine the causes which have led to this revolution, or to pronounce upon the exigency which they created. Nevertheless, great as that exigency may have been, the subversion of a free republican constitution, only nine years old, by military force, in a sister American republic, cannot but be an occasion of regret and apprehension to the friends of the system of republican government, not only here, but throughout the world.

It only remains to say that the course which you have pursued is approved, inasmuch as it appears that there is not only no civil war, but no government contending with the one which has been established.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of November 29, (No. 17.)

I send you with this a translation of a communication received this morning from the minister of foreign affairs in relation to the published reports of an impending war with Mexico. I am very certain that there is no tangible foundation for the rumor, beyond a desire to embellish the telegraphic column by a sensation paragraph. Beyond this slight ripple of excitement, there is nothing to disturb the tranquillity of the people.

The coffee crop promises a very large increase from the last year's yield, say, by estimate, one hundred thousand quintals against forty thousand for the previous year. There are now at the roadstead of San José eight vessels, a number never before known, and which indicates a healthy increase of commercial intercourse. With a return to a specie basis of currency, the trade of this country will tend largely to our country, on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. Now it is mainly with California, where the currency assimilates to that of this country.

The chamber of deputies is still in session, but with great quietude of debate, and but little progress in absolute business.

I remain, Mr. Secretary, with high respect, your obedient servant,
FITZ HENRY WARREN.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Guatemala, January 9, 1868.

SIR: Several daily papers of the United States which have been received by the steamer from Panama, give notice that there was to be a war between Mexico and Guatemala, for supposed grievances of this government offered during the revolution which has just ended in that republic, and upon questions of boundaries. The government of Guatemala have been surprised by these statements, as there has transpired nothing which could justify them. Between the authorities of the republic and those of the states of Mexico there are the best relations, and we have received the most explicit declarations of a desire to maintain the harmony and peace so necessary between continuous peoples.

There has been an armed invasion, which organized in and came from the territory of Chiapas, but of emigrant Guatemalians, which that government had no power to prevent, but for which they issued orders to that intention—an invasion which was promptly suppressed and energetically punished in our own limits.

With regard to the question of boundaries, although we have never had a fixed line, which has given cause from time to time to complaints and disputes between private citizens which could not be avoided, the government of Guatemala has been disposed to have an adjustment with that of Mexico, to the accomplishment of a friendly and cordial solution of the causes of disagreement. These political events which have disturbed frequently the neighboring republic have not permitted the attention which the question merits. Such is at present the state of affairs between the two republics; therefore there exists no reason which could justify the statements of the dailies to which I have referred. The newspapers of Chiapas have sometimes published articles which have shown a spirit not the most friendly at the time of the close of the late revolution which has agitated Mexico.

When these papers arrived at the capital there were published some articles in some of the papers which intimated a desire to make reclamations and reopen the dispute upon boundaries, and of which they wrote with great inexactitude. These publications were probably contributed by Guatemalian refugees, who would be gratified to see their country involved in an exterior war to subserve their own personal interest. They must most certainly have given origin to the report—in all particulars false—which the dailies of New York have published and circulated. Being sure that the government of your excellency looks with interest upon everything which tends to the preservation of peace between this republic and the neighboring governments, the President has directed me to address your excellency this communication, that you may make known its purport to the government of the United States, so as to dissipate whatever doubt those reports to which I have referred may have given character and currency.

In compliance with the order of the President, I avail myself of this opportunity to repeat to your excellency that I remain,

Your most obedient servant,

PEDRO DE AYCINENA:

Major General FITZ HENRY WARREN,
Minister Resident of the United States.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Warren.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 11, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 6th of January, No. 32, has been received, and its accompaniment, which is a copy of a communication which was addressed to you on the 9th instant by the minister for foreign affairs for Guatemala. The assurance which the minister gives that the rumors of an interruption of pacific relations between Guatemala and Mexico which have obtained circulation are groundless, is highly gratifying. The President especially appreciates the kindness and confidence which the Guatemalian government manifests toward our own in making the matter a subject of formal communication.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, April 20, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform the department that the legislative assembly of this kingdom was formally opened on Saturday, the 18th instant, by a royal commission appointed by his Hawaiian Majesty. owing to the absence of his Majesty the King on a visit to the island of Hawaii.

A copy of the royal address is herewith inclosed.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
Z. S. SPALDING.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

His Majesty's address, delivered by royal commission at the opening of the legislature of 1868.

NOBLES AND REPRESENTATIVES: A great calamity has befallen the island of Hawaii. My duty to my subjects has called me away from my capital, and I have delegated a royal commission, presided over by my well-beloved father, to open the regular session of the legislature.

Until the last few weeks my kingdom had enjoyed uninterrupted prosperity. Peace, quiet, and abundance had prevailed. Let us bow humbly to the will of God Almighty, whose hand is now heavy upon us, and let us, with brave heart and well-timed charity, relieve the distress of those of our countrymen who have been thus suddenly and severely afflicted.

Our relations with foreign powers continue to be most satisfactory. The important treaty with the United States of America, which was considered at the last extraordinary session of the legislature, has not yet received the ratification of the President. My minister of foreign affairs will furnish you with such intelligence of the progress of the negotiation as may be from time to time received.

Preliminary steps have been taken by my government to secure the conclusion of a treaty with the confederation of North Germany, to be substituted for our present treaties with Bremen and Hamburg. Some of our treaties have been denounced. Changes are contemplated in our stipulations with England and France, and I confidently hope that the result of these various negotiations will increase our intercourse with Europe, as the anticipated conclusion of our convention of reciprocity will develop our trade with the great republic of the United States.

Our negotiations with Japan have so far been successful. Important and favorable results may be expected from the opening of trade with, and immigration from, that kingdom.

My minister of the interior will inform you of the steps taken by the bureau of immigration towards securing valuable additions to our population and laborers for our fields. An increased appropriation is applied for to enable my government to solve, by practical experiment, the question of immigration, whose importance to the kingdom will not escape your attention. You will be duly advised of the measures adopted by the board of health during the last two years. Owing, in a great measure, to the exertions of the board, the spread of the disease of leprosy has been checked.

As soon as practicable, my government will inform you of the extent of the damage done on Hawaii by the last volcanic eruption. It is hoped that it will not prove so extensive as to require any considerable curtailment from the appropriation for public improvements in other islands.

Our finances are in a most prosperous condition. The report of my acting minister of finance will furnish you all the necessary information on the state of the treasury. Our credit stands high, our public debt is greatly reduced, and a considerable surplus is on hand. Should the treaty of reciprocity acquire the force of law, some further legislation may be necessary.

It may be well for the legislature to inquire how far the prosperity of this kingdom and the development of its resources may be promoted by judicious assistance to the line of steamers plying between this port and California, as well as to our inter-island steam navigation.

The administration of justice has been conducted with fidelity and impartiality.

It is thought that the public convenience will be promoted by changes in the time of holding certain terms of the court. My attorney general will submit to you the necessary bill for the accomplishment of that measure.

I refer you to the report of the president of the board of public instruction for the details of the work performed by that board. Liberal and intelligent assistance has been granted, on application, to all those who devote their labors to the education of the people. New school-houses have been built; in many places the sexes have been separated; and a system of impartiality, combined with a healthy competition, has contributed largely to the cause of intellectual improvement.

NOBLES AND REPRESENTATIVES: I rely upon your enlightened patriotism and upon your loyalty to our institutions. You will co-operate with me in seeking the welfare of the nation and in providing for its wants. I pray God Almighty, the Ruler of kingdoms, to relieve us in our troubles, to guide us in prosperity, and to help me in maintaining inviolate the dignity of my crown and our national independence—and

We do now declare the legislature of the kingdom opened.

Mr. Spalding to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, July 9, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt per mail, from the Department of State, of one package addressed to this legation, containing four copies of the "Tributes of the Nations to Abraham Lincoln."

The copy enclosed in a case and marked "For the Hawaiian government," I forwarded to his excellency the minister of foreign relations, with a letter, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, marked "Inclosure No. 1." A copy of his excellency's reply is also inclosed, marked "Inclosure No. 2."

The copy addressed to "the municipal authorities of the district of Lahaina" I have forwarded, with letter, to Elias Perkins, esq., United States consul at Lahaina, to be presented to his excellency the governor of the island of Mani, as the head of the municipal authority for the district of Lahaina.

The copy addressed "To the Rev. E. Corwin," &c., &c., I have not yet delivered, Mr. Corwin being temporarily absent from the city.

The copy addressed "To the gentleman who at the time of the death of President Lincoln held the position of minister for foreign affairs," I hold subject to further instructions from the department, the gentleman referred to, the Hon. Mr. Wyllie, being dead.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

Z. S. SPALDING.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES AT HONOLULU,

Hawaiian Islands, July 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to herewith present, through you, to his Hawaiian Majesty's government, in the name of the United States, a copy of the "Tributes of the Nations to Abraham Lincoln."

Permit me to hope that the memory of our revered and lamented President may but intensify those relations of friendship and comity which have so happily marked the intercourse between his Hawaiian Majesty's government and the United States.

I have the honor to renew to your excellency the assurance of the high regard and distinguished consideration with which I remain your excellency's most obedient servant,

Z. S. SPALDING,
Acting Chargé d'Affaires.

HIS EXCELLENCY C. DE VARIGNY,

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Honolulu, July 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of to-day's date, presenting through me to his Hawaiian Majesty's government, in the name of the United States, a copy of the "Tributes of the Nations to Abraham Lincoln."

I beg to tender to you, and through you to the government of the United States, the thanks of his Majesty's government for this handsome memento of the late revered and lamented President of the United States, and I most heartily agree with you in the belief that the reverence felt and paid to his memory by the Hawaiian government and people can but intensify those relations of friendship and amity which have so happily marked the intercourse between the two nations.

I renew to you the assurances of the very distinguished consideration with which I remain your very obedient servant,

No. 54.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Honolulu, August 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of a communication addressed by me to the Hawaiian minister of foreign affairs on the 29th ultimo. At the same time I inclosed him a copy of the resolution of the Congress of the United States which accompanied your circular of January 17, 1867, relative to the coolie trade.

I deemed this action called for on my part from the fact that during my absence a cargo of Japanese coolies arrived at this port on the British ship Scioto, and were distributed among the planters, and other parties on the islands, under a system of contracts holding them to labor for the term of three years. I know nothing of the circumstances under which these people left Japan, but suppose you are fully advised in the premises, through Mr. Van Valkenburgh.

I have been informed that it is in contemplation to send an expedition to the South Sea Islands under the auspices of the Hawaiian government, or the Hawaiian Board of Immigration, for the purpose of procuring laborers (coolies) from there. Should this really have been the design, I hope the communication I have already addressed to his Majesty's government may lead them to abandon their purpose. If any such attempt is persisted in, I will deem it my duty to protest most emphatically against it, unless otherwise directed by you.

As these South Sea Islanders are without an organized government, and unable to protect themselves, any attempt to take them by force or fraud from their own country, and reduce them to a state of temporary servitude here, would, it seems to me, justify such active interference on the part of the government of the United States as might be necessary to prevent the inauguration of a traffic more odious than the coolie trade of China.

I have the honor to be your very obedient servant,

EDWARD M. MCCOOK.

Mr. McCook to Mr. Phillips.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES AT HONOLULU,

July 29, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you a copy of a resolution on the subject of the coolie trade, which has unanimously passed both houses of the Congress of the United States.

It is believed that in this matter the resolution referred to correctly indicates the moral sentiment of the country I have the honor to represent; consequently I transmit the inclosed copy for the information of your government, believing that his Majesty, actuated by those sentiments of humanity for which he has always been so eminently distinguished, will cordially co-operate with the government of the United States in its endeavor to discountenance and discourage a traffic so repulsive that it meets with the reprobation of the civilized world.

With sentiments of the highest consideration and regard, I have the honor to be your very obedient servant,

EDWARD M. MCCOOK.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Honolulu, September 4, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to call the attention of the honorable Secretary of State to the inclosed copy of a dispatch with its inclosures, which I have received from his Hawaiian Majesty's minister of foreign affairs in reply to my communication to him concerning the coolie trade, a copy of which I forwarded to you in my dispatch No. 54, dated August 14, 1868.

I have the honor to be your very obedient servant,

EDWARD M. MCCOOK.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Phillips to Mr. McCook.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,

Honolulu, August 20, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 29th ultimo, inclosing a copy of the resolution of the Senate of the United States in regard to the so-called coolie trade, by which it is sought to indicate the moral sentiment of the United States, and in which the fraudulent traffic in Oriental labor is denounced as "inhuman and immoral."

His Majesty's government recognize the influence of this declaration. The exalted character of the body originating it, and the importance of the philanthropic question considered, demand for it high respect. Neither has your dispatch done more than justice to the humane and elevated sentiments of his Majesty the King of these islands. You are aware, sir, that the constitution granted by the present sovereign, on the 20th day of August, A. D. 1864, contains the following:

"Article 11. Involuntary servitude, except for crime, is forever prohibited in this kingdom; whenever a slave shall enter Hawaiian territory, he shall be free."

His Majesty's government are bound to resist all attempts, under any disguise, to revive a system of involuntary servitude. The resolution of the Senate is, therefore, sympathetically welcomed; for it expresses the purpose of a powerful government to adhere to a world-renowned policy of extirpating the last vestige of human slavery.

The peculiar situation and necessities of the Hawaiian islands invest this subject with especial interest. Upon the introduction of the sugar culture, an unexpected demand arose for cheap labor. The want could not be supplied without looking abroad.

Attention was naturally directed to the over-peopled Oriental countries, and a strong pressure was brought to bear upon the government to permit such an indiscriminate traffic in "coolie labor" as would have deserved the epithets of "inhuman and immoral." The feeling was so strong that the authorities were exposed to the charge of oppression, and unwarrantable interference with private enterprise. But the ground was taken and firmly adhered to, that the introduction of labor from abroad was not a matter of "enterprise" or "traffic" at all, but a high prerogative of government, which should no more be farmed out than the superintendence of the police, or the administration of justice. A board of immigration was organized, which has ever since superintended the introduction of laborers and their contracts with employers, and has guarded their rights by stringent regulations. In fact, it has exercised over these friendless people a superintending care not unlike that of the Freedmen's Bureau of the United States. Strict laws secure appeals to local magistrates, in case of injustice, and although laborers can be compelled to execute contracts specifically, there is no greater abridgment of individual right than in the case of sailors and freedmen in your own country.

It may not be amiss to call attention to the position of the government, in several cases where attempts have been made to impose upon it.

On the 23d of April, 1867, the British ship Eastfield appeared off this port with a large number of Chinese coolies on board, under a contract to a firm in Honolulu, which had some months before become insolvent. Such a contract was, of course, a gross violation of the rules of the government, and had the firm been pecuniarily responsible, they would have been required to return the laborers at once to China, regardless of expense. But the insolvency of the firm required some action on the score of humanity. The government therefore took charge of the laborers, subjected them to their regulations, and made contracts on their behalf, to the great loss of those concerned in the shipment, whose case demanded little sympathy. The government were sustained throughout by the cordial co-operation of the representative of the British government, Mr. Wodehouse. Notice was also immediately transmitted to the Hawaiian consul at Hong Kong, which will doubtless prevent such impositions hereafter.

A copy of the dispatch from the foreign office of this government to Mr. Whittall is herewith inclosed, and may prove interesting in this connection.

A practice was once general, which was thought to be justified by the peculiar necessities of this nation, of issuing from the offices of Hawaiian consuls in other countries temporary or provisional registers to vessels purchased on behalf of Hawaiian owners, by authority of which they might sail upon the ocean until they reached an Hawaiian port, and there obtained an Hawaiian register. This practice led to abuses, of which this government received the first information in a letter from his Majesty's consul at Hong Kong, of which a copy is inclosed for reference.

By reference it will be seen that these vessels, bearing the national flag of this kingdom, made their appearance at Macao, with the undoubted purpose of embarking in a most disgraceful traffic, and prostituting the Hawaiian flag to the basest purposes. The consul immediately and firmly interfered, refusing all papers to these vessels, and forbade them to leave port. The position of the consul was still more firmly explained in a second dispatch, a copy of which is also inclosed.

This government promptly replied to the consul approving his course, as will appear from extracts inclosed.

In view of such abuses the issuing of provisional registers has been discontinued in all cases but those of vessels directly bound to Hawaiian ports. It is not known what became of the suspected ships, but they abandoned all claim to the Hawaiian flag.

This government also took the greatest pains, by public notices in Honolulu and Hong Kong, to make its purpose distinctly known.

The legislative assembly at its recent session, by somewhat stringent legislation, imposed upon the minister of the interior the duty of preparing a form of contracts for labor. One form has been prepared, which is to be amended still more in favor of the laborer, and which, it is thought, will secure them every right.

The legislative assembly also appropriated a large sum of money to aid immigration, one great object sought to be accomplished being the introduction of a large proportion of Polyesian females. The present excess of males is productive of disastrous consequences, and undoubtedly tends, with other causes, to the diminution of the Hawaiian race. It is the purpose of this government to introduce laborers of kindred stock from the less frequented islands of the Pacific, in equal proportion of male and female, and to require every planter who employs any males to provide for a corresponding number of females, and at once to establish houses for these poor people, where the marriage relation shall secure the purity of domestic life.

In this connection I think it well to call attention to the recent introduction of a lot of laborers from Yokohama, which has attracted attention in the American newspapers, and has apparently excited the United States diplomatic representative in Japan. These laborers are not "coolies" in any sense in which that term can be offensively used. They came here voluntarily. They made contracts voluntarily after landing, by which, in consideration of liberal compensation, they agree to work for three years, at the end of which term they are to be taken back to their own country, at the expense of their employers. The board of immigration have superintended all these transactions, and have carefully protected the Japanese against imposition, and I feel that I may confidently give the assurance that every right of personal liberty has been most scrupulously guarded.

Your own government must admit that the general economy of the world and the philanthropic spirit of the times will be promoted by a systematic diversion of the excessive population of Oriental countries to these islands. The Hawaiian group, with its great natural resources and unrivaled climate, can sustain a largely increased population. Their favorable position in the Pacific affords facilities for a varied and extensive commerce, while their proximity to the United States renders it certain that any advancement of their prosperity will directly contribute to the material growth of the great American republic.

This full exposition of national purpose is due to the humane policy of your government and the spirit of the resolution which you inclose. His Majesty's government congratulate themselves that their efforts are likely to be sustained by the powerful influence of the United States. The co-operation of her Britannic Majesty's commissioner has been afforded upon one important occasion, and there can be little doubt that the police of the seas will be most effectually maintained by the two strongest maritime nations of the world.

I renew to you the assurances of the high respect and consideration with which I remain your very obedient servant,

STEPHEN H. PHILLIPS.

His Excellency General E. M. McCook,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Hutchinson to Mr. Whittall.

FOREIGN OFFICE,
Honolulu, April 30, 1867.

SIR: Mr. C. de Varigny, the minister of foreign relations, being absent on the Island of Hawaii, I think it right to inform you by the earliest opportunity that the British ship Eastfield arrived at this port from Manila, on the 23d instant, with a large number of Chinese coolies on board, bound to labor on these islands under contract to the late firm of Walker, Allen & Co., merchants of this city. These coolies were originally shipped from Hong Kong, on the Dutch bark Antonio Petronella, which was forced to put into Manila in distress, and was there, I believe, condemned. It is unnecessary for me, sir, to tell you that the importation of these men into this kingdom is illegal without the consent of his Majesty's government, and in defiance of the ordinances published in the official columns of the Hawaiian Gazette, copies of which were, I believe, republished by you in the Hong Kong newspapers.

His Majesty's government have permitted these men to be landed, on the score of humanity, under stringent regulations. I have to request you on the part of this government that you will interpose and desire the authorities at Hong Kong not to permit any vessel to clear with bonded laborers on board, for any of the ports of this kingdom, without your formal permission.

I have the honor, &c., &c.

F. W. HUTCHINSON,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

To J. WHITTALL,
His Majesty's Consul General for Hong Kong and Macao.

Mr. Whittall to Mr. de Varigny.

HAWAIIAN CONSULATE,
Hong Kong, January 8, 1867.

SIR: I have to inform you that three vessels bearing the Hawaiian flag have recently made their appearance in these waters; the Mameluke, the Polores Ugarte, and C. Carom, holding provisional registers granted by the King's consul at Lima, Mr. J. R. Eldredge.

These vessels have put into this port with the intention of proceeding hence to Macao, and there taking on board Chinese emigrants or "coolies" for Callao. It is possible that the stigma and disgrace attaching to this traffic, as conducted at Macao, have not become known to you at Honolulu, but the abuses, the evils, and the misery and crime which the system involves have earned for it the reprobation of all right thinking men. I have determined to preserve the Hawaiian nation from the scandal attaching to such prostitution of its flag, and I have intimated to all parties interested that should these vessels take on board China coolies at Macao, I shall not permit them to quit China waters, until they shall have presented themselves in Hong Kong and complied with the provisions of the British colonial emigration act, in the efficacy of which I place confidence, &c., &c.

J. W. WHITTALL.

His Excellency the HAWAIIAN MINISTER of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Whittall to Mr. de Varigny.

HAWAIIAN CONSULATE,
Hong Kong, February 16, 1867.

SIR: In reference to my last despatch, I have to inform you that the vessels spoken of are still in this harbor, empty.

The result of an interview upon my part with the governor of Macao has been an understanding to the effect that so long as vessels bearing the Hawaiian flag comply with Portuguese law, he may regard them as rightful traders, but that he can, and will, in no wise interfere with any embargo which I may place upon them, as his Majesty's representative.

I have, therefore, intimated to the charterers of the vessels that unless they can declare to me that when Mr. Consul Gal. Eldredge furnished these crafts with Hawaiian registers, he was aware that such were for the purpose of enabling them to engage in the coolie traffic, I cannot allow them to quit these waters, until I receive instructions from the King's government. None of the parties interested have since addressed any communication to me.

J. W. WHITTALL.

His Excellency C. DE VARIGNY,
Hawaiian Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. de Varigny to Mr. Whittall.

FOREIGN OFFICE,
Honolulu, April 10, 1867.

SIR: Your course of action is most fully and entirely approved of, and I am happy to tender to you the thanks of his Majesty and cabinet for your prompt and energetic interference in behalf of our flag.

I write by this mail to our chargé d'affaires in Lima in relation to this subject, and inform him of the dangers that might accrue to our good name from an indiscriminate use of our flag. Instructions to this effect had already been transmitted to him, &c.

I renew to you, &c., &c.

C. DE VARIGNY.

J. W. WHITTALL,
His Hawaiian Majesty's Consul General for Hong Kong and Macao.

Mr. McCook to Mr. Seward.

No. 59.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, September 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith, marked No. 1, a printed copy of an official notice published by me calling the attention of American residents, ship-owners, &c., on these islands to the laws of the United States and the late resolutions of Congress concerning the coolie traffic. I deemed this necessary, both for the information of all concerned, and for the salutary moral influence the publication of these laws, &c., would exert upon the members of this government, just at this time, when they were endeavoring to inaugurate a new scheme for the introduction of bonded laborers, under the name of "immigrants."

In my dispatch No. 54, dated August 14th, 1868, I expressed the opinion that such an effort would probably be made; since then, the Hawaiian Board of Immigration, as you will see by the inclosure marked No. 2, has solicited proposals for a vessel, to be sent under their auspices, on an expedition to the Gilbert, Caroline, and other South Sea Islands for the purpose of procuring "immigrants." As the savage inhabitants of these islands possess nothing but muscle, which could be available to the people here, and as the further importation of coolies from China or Japan has been pretty effectually stopped, I can only regard this new enterprise as a project to obtain plantation laborers, by bringing them here under the guise of "immigrants."

The stand I have taken has led to a very thorough discussion of the whole system of coolie labor by the press of the kingdom; and caused the government to abandon their South Sea "immigrant" scheme, at least for the present.

I inclose an article, marked No. 3, cut from the Ke-Kuokoa, the leading native paper here, which undoubtedly reflects the sentiments of that class of the native population who have any sentiments, and indicates, as well, the feeling of a large majority of the foreign population of the islands.

Hoping my course may meet with your entire approval, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

EDWARD M. MCCOOK.

Notice to American citizens and ship-owners.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES AT HONOLULU,
August 31, 1868.

For the information of American citizens and ship-owners resident on these islands, and of American shipmasters touching here, I deem it proper to publish the following resolution on the subject of the coolie trade, which unanimously passed both houses of the Congress of the United States, viz:

"IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 16, 1867.

"Whereas the traffic in laborers transported from China and other eastern countries, known as the coolie trade, is odious to the people of the United States as inhuman and immoral; and whereas it is abhorrent to the spirit of modern international law and policy, which have substantially extirpated the African slave trade, to permit the establishment in its place of a mode of enslaving men differing from the former in little else than the employment of fraud instead of force to make its victims captive; be it therefore

"Resolved, That it is the duty of this government to give effect to the moral sentiment of the nation through all its agencies, for the purpose of preventing the further introduction of coolies into this hemisphere or the adjacent islands.

"Ordered, That the Secretary lay the foregoing resolution before the President of the United States.

"Attest:

J. W. FORNEY, Secretary."

In furtherance of the humane policy adopted by the government I represent, I also deem it my duty to call the attention of all whom it may concern to an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coolie trade by American citizens and American vessels," approved February 19, 1862, which provides:

1. That no citizen or resident of the United States shall prepare any vessel to procure or carry from "China or elsewhere" persons known as "coolies," to be disposed of, or sold, or transferred, for any term of years, or for any time whatever, as servants or apprentices, or to be held to service or labor. Any vessel owned by citizens of the United States, in whole or in part, so employed, shall be forfeited to the United States.

2. Every person building, equipping, sending to sea, or aiding to prepare in any way, or navigating as master, factor, agent, owner or otherwise, any vessel belonging in whole or in part to any United States citizen, or registered, enrolled or licensed within the United States to be employed in the above trade, or in anywise aiding or abetting therein, shall be liable to be indicted therefor, and on conviction punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars and imprisonment not exceeding one year.

3. Any citizen of the United States who shall, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, take on board, or receive, or transport any such persons, for the purpose of disposing of them as aforesaid, shall be liable to be punished as before mentioned.

4. Free and voluntary emigrants may be taken upon the certificate of the United States consul or consular agent at the port where they embark, which certificate is to be given to the master of the vessel only upon satisfactory evidence that such emigration is actually free and voluntary.

5. All United States laws applicable to the carriage of passengers by United States merchant vessels apply also to all vessels owned in whole or in part by citizens of the United States, or registered or licensed within the United States, carrying passengers between foreign ports, with the same penalties and forfeitures.

6. The President of the United States is authorized to direct United States war vessels to examine all vessels navigated or owned, in whole or in part, by citizens of the United States, whenever there is reasonable cause to suppose such vessels are engaged in any way in violation of this act.

The foregoing is simply an abstract of the law, which will be found in full on page 340, volume 12, of the United States Statutes at Large.

Minister Resident.

Vessel wanted.

By authority of the Board of Immigration, the undersigned solicits proposals for furnishing a schooner or other vessel, of sufficient capacity to accommodate at least forty immigrant passengers. Such vessel will be required to proceed to the Gilbert and Caroline Islands and such other points as may be designated by the board, or the agent who may be selected to take charge of the enterprise. Proposals will be received until the first day of September next. Further information may be obtained by application to

THE COOLIE QUESTION.

KE-KUOKOA, September 12, 1868.

The Commercial Advertiser of last week has a leader devoted to the question of bonded laborers, or, to be plainer, the coolie system of these islands. This is a subject which we have been convinced would sooner or later force itself before the public. It is a question which vitally affects the principal manufacturing interest of the group, and for this reason, no doubt, the discussion has been evaded by the writers for the press; but the time has arrived when the subject must be met and fully ventilated. The article in the Advertiser is simply an answer to one in the Gazette, by which the ministers have evidently sought to mislead foreign communities, for reasons best known to themselves.

We indorse the Advertiser article until it proposes to transfer the prosecution of the coolie immigration from the hands of the government to those of private parties. In this we cannot concur, believing that the coolie system should be abolished and forgotten, the sooner the better. We will neither propose nor support a compromise with a system which tend to degrade a fellow-man. We have no sympathy with a measure which has for its aim the classification of his Majesty's subjects—the setting apart one class as better than another in the eye of the law. It is our belief that when the Senate of the United States declared that the coolie system only differed from the African slave trade in that it used fraud instead of force to secure its object, it published an opinion which unbiased individuals must indorse. We do not charge that this government is knowingly a party to the fraud. That deceit has been practiced upon the coolies we need no better evidence than the assertion of the Gazette, that during the first years of their bondage they are continually seeking to know the nature and force of their contracts, and it is our belief that they only discontinue their efforts from a sense of utter hopelessness of being righted; yielding in despair to superior force and intelligence. The Japanese recently imported seem to labor under the same ignorance as to the nature of their contracts, and recently we heard that the whole force of Japanese engaged upon a plantation refused to work, and suffered imprisonment, on account of a misunderstanding as to the terms of their contracts; again, the board of immigration notified the employers of Japanese that $10 alleged to have been advanced to them in Japan should be stopped from their wages, which the Japanese deny having received. We believe that fraud was practiced upon both Chinese and Japanese. We were surprised that the Gazette should have stated that the coolie was, upon arrival here, upon equal footing with native laborers, when an act was passed at the recent session of the legislative assembly which empowered the minister of the interior and board of immigration to make such rules and regulations as they might deem best for the proper government of imported laborers; but we are certainly more surprised that the Gazette should dare to deny “in toto” that coolies are brought here. If so, they have practiced the grossest deceit upon planters whom they agreed to furnish with “coolies,” and their agent in China certainly advised them of the shipment “of two hundred and forty-six coolies per Chilean ship Alberto,” and proposed shipment of more per Roscoe. Why not deny that there is a Chinaman on the group? It can be done with equal propriety.

It is of no use for the Gazette “to beg the question” by worse than silly denials. Let the subject receive the attention of the ablest apologists they can secure, or they stand convicted of a grave charge.

It is a source of gratification to Americans that the United States minister resident has taken an early opportunity of declaring, by proclamation, the sentiment of the United States Senate on the coolie question, and we trust that he will receive the sympathy and support of his countrymen in any endeavor he may make to rid these islands of a system so utterly at variance with the spirit of the age.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 4th of September, No. 57, has been received. I have read with much interest the copy thereunto annexed of a note which was addressed to you by the Hawaiian minister for foreign affairs on the 20th of August on the subject of the coolie trade. The government and people of the United States will appreciate the just and proper proceedings which the Hawaiian government has taken upon that important subject.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, October 23, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 45, of August 31, and your dispatch No. 47, of September 4. No. 46 has not yet reached this legation.

On the 16th instant her Britannic Majesty's steam corvette Scout, Captain Price, sailed hence to Tahiti.

Yesterday intelligence reached here that the civil authorities of the island of Hawaii had been resisted by a body of natives, the followers of one of their prophets named Ka-Oua. These people hold a religious faith somewhat similar to the Millerites, and appear to have no especial aim except to live without work, a not uncommon thing in this country.

The only life lost was that of the deputy sheriff of the island, but the authorities here thought the affair of sufficient importance to demand the presence of a military force, and yesterday sent about a hundred troops to the scene of the disturbance. I inclose a strip cut from the Commercial Advertiser of this morning, which gives all the details known concerning the matter.

I have the honor to be your very obedient servant,

EDWARD M. MCCOOK.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

INSURRECTION ON HAWAII—REVOLT AGAINST THE AUTHORITIES—MURDER OF SHERIFF NEVILLE—TROOPS ORDERED TO HAWAII TO QUELL THE INSURRECTION.

The schooner Prince arrived from Kona, Hawaii, on Thursday morning, bringing intelligence of a serious insurrection in that district, resulting in the death of Sheriff Neville, the probable death of Deputy Sheriff Barrett, and severe injury of threename constables. The particulars, so far as we can gather them, are these:

For several years past, one Kaona, formerly district judge in Honolulu, and a man of considerable intelligence for a Hawaiian, imbibed the idea that he was a prophet sent by God to warn this people of the end of the world. For the past three years he has been preaching this Millerite doctrine on Hawaii, and has made numerous converts. Some months ago he was arrested and sent to the insane asylum in this city as a lunatic, but the physician decided that he was as sane as any man, and he was therefore set at liberty again. He returned to Kona, and the number of his followers rapidly increased, till now it is over three hundred. They are mostly natives, but some are probably foreigners, as we received a letter a few weeks ago from one of them, rehearsing their troubles, which we threw aside as nonsense and unworthy of notice; but in this juncture it may be well to publish a portion of it, which will be found elsewhere.

These fanatics believe that the end of the world is at hand, and they must be ready. They therefore clothe themselves in white robes, ready to ascend; watch at night, but sleep during the day; decline to cultivate anything except beans, corn, or the most common food. They live together in one colony, and have selected a tract of land about half way between Kealakekua Bay and Kailua, which the prophet told them was the only land that would not be overrun with lava, while all the rest of the island is to be destroyed. Some of their number came to Honolulu a few weeks ago to lease this land from Prince William Lunallilo, who owns it; but he was advised that it would be best not to do so. They brought the money with them and offered to pay a year's rent in advance, but did not succeed in getting it. The land was subsequently leased to other parties, who, when they came to claim possession, found the fanatics on it, and unwilling to surrender. It then became necessary to issue a warrant against Kaona and his adherents to eject them.

On Monday last Sheriff R. B. Neville, accompanied with Deputy Sheriff Barrett and several native policemen, proceeded to their camp and undertook to arrest the prophet.

Thereupon the followers of Kaona attacked the police with stones, killed Sheriff Neville, and cut off his head from his body. His head they stuck up on a pole; his body they would not give up.

Mr. Barrett was also so severely bruised with stones that his life is despaired of. The three native policemen were also more or less injured. During the fight several of the houses of the fanatics were set on fire and destroyed. They threaten to retaliate and destroy the houses of their enemies, whether natives or foreigners.

The following letter from Dr. Gulick, under date of October 9, was received by the Prince:

"Mr. Neville this morning made an attempt to serve a warrant on Kaona and others of his followers, but was stoned to death; and the fanatics refused to give up his body. Several of the constables had a very narrow escape with their lives, and are pretty thoroughly intimidated. The most that can now be expected of the natives is that they act on the defensive till assistance arrive. Should the foreigners here act together on the morrow something may possibly be done in dispersing the infatuated followers of Kaona. But no time should be lost in communicating with the heads of the police department in Honolulu, as there seems to be a general hesitancy here among the authorities. The Kaonites have made threats this afternoon that they will burn and destroy the houses of their enemies, in revenge for some of their houses which were to-day very improperly set fire to by irresponsible persons. A number of foreigners and natives are on guard to-night in Central Kona—I am among the number, watching near the Kainaliu church."

Immediately on the receipt of this news, government determined to send a force to the seat of the disturbance. The schooners Kaimaile and Prince were at once provisioned and fitted out, and sailed at 2 o'clock p. m. on Thursday, with one hundred and seventy-six soldiers, arms, ammunition, &c. The expedition is in charge of his excellency Governor Dominis, who is accompanied by his excellency the acting minister of war, Marshal Parke, Major C. H. Judd, Captains Von Gosnitz and Hassinger, Lieutenant A. W. Judd, and others. The plan is to proceed direct to Lahaina, intercept the steamer Kilauea, and take her on from that point, transferring her mails and passengers to the schooners. By this arrangement the expedition will reach Kona early on Saturday morning.

The promptness with which the government has acted in the matter is deserving of commendation. Although this revolt is not directly against the government itself, i. e., the fanatics have no design except to retain possession of their camping ground, yet it is a bold defiance of its local authority, which should never be permitted to pass without a prompt exhibition of power, and a suppression.

We do not imagine that these fanatics will show any resistance to armed force when it arrives, and if they are still at their camp at Kainaliu, will probably disperse and secrete themselves in the forests back of Kona. They are said to have no arms, and their only weapons being stones and clubs, the force sent up can find no great trouble in dispersing them, even should they resist. Kainaliu is about three miles north of Kealakekua, and near the late Mr. Johnson's land.

We are permitted to make some extracts from a letter from Mr. Roys to Jas. Lemon, which gives a better insight into the purposes of the Kaonites than anything we have seen, and show that they are more determined than is generally supposed:

"Friday, October 16.—Mr. Neville and the constables arrived here this morning, and we rode down to the camp to put up notices, but the scene this morning was worse than last night. As fast as a notice was put up it was spit on and then torn from the tree that it was nailed to. After receiving much abuse from them we left the ground and returned to our house.

"Saturday, 17.—At the appointed time the magistrate and friend Neville were at my house, but not one of the Kaonites came. Their names were called three times, and no response made. The magistrate then nailed up three warrants, ordering their arrest, and I, in company with sixteen constables rode down; and I must here say that they deserve great credit for the cool way in which they acted, and received the bad usage and blows which they did. One poor constable was dragged from his horse and shamefully beaten, and his horse, saddle, and bridle taken away, so that he had to walk home. The constables stood all this, but never returned a blow. So we made good our retreat. Neville was not with us this time.

"Sunday, 18.—To-day Neville is notifying all parties to muster here to-morrow morning, as the time fixed to carry out and maintain the law in the name of the King. I expect there will be lives lost on both sides.

"Monday, 19.—This morning some two hundred men mustered here, and headed by Neville we rode down to the camp, and such a sight! Blood flowing in all directions; and I am sorry to say friend Neville is killed. This night I expect my house will be in flames, and many more. There are some dozen or more houses on fire. I am taking the children and clothing away, also Mrs. Roy, as they have threatened to kill her to-night. God help us."

P. S.—We have letters this morning from Kealakekua dated Wednesday, the 21st. On Monday afternoon there was another attack on the rebels, resulting in the death of a native named Kamai, who was one of the attacking party, and also the death of three rebels—five in all, including Mr. Neville.

Since that, up to Wednesday noon, no more lives have been lost, though the rebels openly threaten to kill Mr. Roys and his wife, and also Rev. Mr. Paris. One or two prominent foreigners are in sympathy with and aiding the rebels.

Thus it appears that there have been three lives lost so far, and the rebels have taken an oath that they will never leave their land alive.

In this connection we insert the letter before referred to, which will give some insight into the movements of the deluded followers of Kaona.

FROM THE CAMP AT KAINALLU.

“NORTH KONA, October 9, 1868.

“To the Editor of the Commercial Advertiser :

“Some folks might like to know what a jolly time we had celebrating the 150th psalm. You see we are justified in having a big time. We had been a month previous collecting all the kerosene oil cans, tin pots and kettles, pipes and plates that we could think of, except the old harps of King David, which we did not know how to make. Our thanks are due to a neighbor, who fitted us up with some big drums, made from sugar kegs, which answer the purpose well—he being a man well skilled in all manner of work. Our prophet says we must keep it up for seven days, as they did among the Israelites of old.

“We have seven banners of divers colors to represent the seven vials of wrath which is to come, and we have other flags of different colors to represent the clouds at night, which we keep watch for, while other people sleep. It's true we feel very stupid in the morning, and are not able to do any work, although we have been offered work. But then our beloved prophet tells us we don't require any work, provided we keep awake night and day a fasting, and that we will talk with unknown tongues, and then we, ourselves, will prophesy. Well, you see it is a fact, and that any man may see, if he will come and see for himself, for our tongues are so thick, and ourselves so stupid, that we can't understand each other, from watching and fasting.

“This same day we were much troubled by seeing our prophet fall into a trance; so then we expect to hear of another volcano running down, as that would be fulfilling another prophecy, that all outsiders are going to be destroyed, and we only saved, who were then stopping on the land Lehuula nui. But when he came to himself, what astonished us most was, that God objected to our renting that said land, and that the man sent to Honolulu came back with the money, $120; Mr. C. Kanaina declining to receive it. That was all right, as God told the prophet that a stream of lava would soon run down said land. We believe all this to be a fact, and so would others if they had taken their oaths on the Bible, as we have done, to stick to Joseph Kaona through thick and thin. So you see, when a man takes an oath on the Bible it is hard to break it, although I don't mean to say that all the prophecies come right, for at the time we had a long drought he told us to fill all our bottles and calabashes with water, and stow them away in holes, caves, and in our trunks, as there would be no more rain until the millennium, which would destroy all but ourselves.

“Whenever we see our enemies, or go by their houses, we strike up the psalm King David sung against his enemies, and we, the parents, instruct our children to do the same, as therein we feel joyful.

“Now, then, since the prophecy about the land, we understand that our neighbor, the noble Duke, had secured the land previous to our application, and that we have no one to blame but ourselves, since we gave out what a fine time we would have gathering our enemies' stock. But our neighbor, who likes a retired life, did not like the idea of being harassed at the bar of justification, and having an eye to number one, he engaged the land in good time, for which he deserves the thanks of others of his neighbors in the same fix as himself. However, it will not be a hard matter for us to get other land, as that will be the only land that will be safe from the volcano that is to destroy all other places.

“It is true we are getting short of products, such as hogs, turkeys, chickens, and taro, and now that our feast of heaven is taking place, we have cooked all on the hot stones or altar, as they did of old with the blood. You see our doctrine is an improvement.

“We are getting a good many new disciples, who are coming in every day, and we hope to get some influential ones, to help us keep up our feasts. They might as well do it, as they will lose all they have got if they don't join us. If they will come to us, they will not have to work, as our prophet will tell them how to get along without it.

“Sometimes persons come among us wearing our white veils, but whether they think as we do or not is best known to our prophet, who knows all things; or whether it is to kill two birds with one stone or not, and who have kindly invited our prophet to wine. So you see we are a respectable sect. We would like to bring all these things to light, so that this good government, so kind in subsidizing foreign steam navigation, might help us. It may now be late for us to ask for a little subsidy, yet if we are behind the last legislature, we may be in time for the next Parliament. If not that, couldn't we get the island of Lanai or Kahoolawe? We will not be particular about the soil, as we don't cultivate except sweet potatoes, corn, and beans, which come to maturity quick; we calculate to live mostly by psalm singing.

"Another pilikia we have just at hand. The tax collector is coming along on the 6th of next month for money that we have not on hand, as we spent all we had for linens, which are costly, and got credit. But we did not consider that anything, as we expected before this time that all would be destroyed except ourselves. Another misfortune is, that instead of going to the place where the assessor told us to assemble, we would not go because the owner of that house was not of our persuasion; the consequence is that he took down the last year's assessment, although we previously sold our horses to buy our white robes, to be ready for our passover. But we will soon know something mighty, as our prophet prophesies that he has to go to prison once more, which then will be seven times; and then will be the end, and we will be all right. So you see we are waiting patiently for this last miracle. Some of us are prophesying; you must know by this time we all do a little at that business.

"The church Lanakila is going soon to be opened, and we are all going to make a grand rush to that building, as we all contributed towards the building of it, and that might be the time our great Head may do something that might commit him. But I am in hopes they won't keep him altogether the next time they get him down there, for that would spoil our fun, and there might not be a chance of subsidy. We want reduction in the taxes, as we ourselves, and the blight, and the ants, are a heavy pressure on this little place, Kainaliu. There are over three hundred of us, and we are sworn to abide by our Makua, and as he tells us we must not work, we need the subsidy or the island before mentioned. We are not allowed to sign individually. We call ourselves

"OHANA.

"NEW CAMP, LEHUULA."

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, May 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to represent that for the last two weeks this city has been kept in a constant state of disturbance in the night season by a mob. It has not been safe for any one to go into the streets after dark, as muskets were fired off without reference to men, women, or children, not aimed at, but liable to be hit any moment by a chance shot. Last Monday General Salnave returned, and made his triumphal entry into the city at 12 o'clock, noon. The demonstration was noisy but not violent. The next day troops arrived from Gonaives, and were, in common with those already in town, furnished with ammunition. They ranged the streets in a turbulent way all the afternoon. In the evening I went to town and spent the night at the office of legation, which is kept at Mr. Conard's house. The house was full of refugees, men, women, and children, to the number of one hundred and fifty. The utmost consternation prevailed. On Wednesday morning I called on Mr. St. John, the British chargé d'affaires, and afterwards on Count Méjare and Mr. Alvarez. We concluded to meet Mr. Delorme, secretary of foreign affairs, and see what could be done to keep the peace. Delorme had already threatened to take the refugees out of the French consulate in the evening, but at last thought better of it, and wrote us all a note inviting us to meet him at 3 o'clock p. m., which we did. He was very conciliatory, and assured us that the peace should be kept and the city quiet. My apprehensions were lulled a good deal, but still the streets were filled with armed soldiers, and many of them were intoxicated. I had hardly reached home when I heard muskets go off, and at last whole volleys were fired in quick succession. To those in town it was a horrible night, and on my arrival in the morning I found that the stores and houses of many persons had been robbed, and several men killed and wounded, business suspended, and everybody in a state of alarm. It is believed that property to the amount of a million of dollars had been stolen during the night. I at once wrote Mr. Secretary Delorme the letter, a copy of which I send inclosed, and then waited on the chargés from England, France, and Spain, and proposed that we should draw up a joint letter of remonstrance, and beg for an early interview with the President. This was done. That my letter was timely and put an end to the mischief I have no doubt. I acted on the best advice that I could get at the time. I knew that nothing but firmness would bring the authorities to their senses. The more these men are flattered the more assured they are that they will be allowed to do what they please. We have had rest now for two nights, and the stores are again opened. The authorities are responsible for the mob, however stoutly they may deny it. Do please send me one or more ships of war at once, as the rebellion is still raging at St. Marc, Aux Cayes, Gonaives, Jacmel, and I expect new demonstrations here. The country is in a wretched condition. I also beg instructions in relation to the receiving of refugees.

It does more mischief here than it does good, and is really, as it is practiced, little more than offering a premium for factious disturbances and a bid for sedition. The three chargés here are ready to recommend the discontinuance of this much abused custom if our government is ready to take the step. I have sent you a copy of my letter to Secretary Delorme of the 6th instant, but on account of the uncertainty of communication I thought it best to send you another. As I am confined to the office of legation every moment, and have no suitable stationery here, I beg you will excuse the appearance of this hastily written letter.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. H. HOLLISTER.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

P. S.—Commodore Boggs arrived here last evening in the De Soto. I begged him to remain and protect us. The inclosed copies will explain the situation of both parties. Please send me a ship, with orders to remain until the troubles are over.

G. H. H.

Mr. Hollister to Commodore Boggs.

LEGATION UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Port-au-Prince, May 18, 1868.

SIR: From information which I have received since I left your ship, I am compelled to enter my most earnest protest against your leaving the American citizens in this city in this defenseless condition. President Salnave threatens to burn the town, and I have good reasons to believe that he intends to do it.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. H. HOLLISTER.

Commodore BOGGS,
United States Steamer De Soto, Harbor of Port-au-Prince.

Commodore Boggs to Mr. Hollister.

UNITED STATES STEAMER DE SOTO, (2d rate,)
Harbor of Port-au-Prince, May 18, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of this date.

I regret extremely my inability to comply with your request, from want of provisions, having only four days' on board, and the positive orders from the rear-admiral commanding the North Atlantic squadron, I must sail this afternoon.

Should I find a vessel at Key West, I will immediately dispatch her to this port; in default of finding one, I will return as soon I have taken in supplies.

I am, respectfully,

CHAS. S. BOGGS,
Commodore United States Navy, Com'd'g De Soto.

G. H. HOLLISTER,
United States Minister, &c., &c., Port-au-Prince.

Mr Hollister to Mr. Delorme.

PORT-AU-PRINCE, May 6, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to represent that, according to my instructions, I have observed the most strict neutrality in regard to all political matters in this country. It is true that from what I had heard of the valor of the President, and of his struggles in the field, I came here inspired with great admiration for him, and prayed for his success. I had a further motive to desire such success from the fact that he had associated with him at the head of affairs a gentleman not unknown in Europe or America as a writer, scholar, and civilian, worthy to represent the sentiments expressed in that noble essay which you sent me a few days ago. I have looked forward from day to day, hoping to find an end to the disturbances in the streets of this city; but I have looked in vain. Things kept growing worse and worse. Only a few days before the return of the President a young girl was horribly mutilated in the street, and after that other outrages followed of a worse character.

When the chief arrived I expected, of course, a demonstration, and it passed off quietly.

Yesterday morning the representatives of the four great powers, the United States, England, France, and Spain, waited on you by your special appointment, and received such representations as to the protection of the rights of our respective nations, and of the citizens generally, as made us well assured of the future. I left the office of legation and went to my country seat with perfect confidence that all would be well. Still, I had observed a large number of soldiers walking about the city during the day in a lawless manner, many of whom were intoxicated. They were armed, and I am informed that ammunition was dealt out to them yesterday by the government in quantities sufficient to enable them, if they chose, to commit the outrages which followed.

About 8 o'clock in the evening a mob of soldiers gathered at the quay, and a musket was fired, and after that, others. At this time the presence of a single policeman or officer of the guard could have put an end to the disorder. So far as I know, not a single refugee has escaped from the asylum that he had chosen, although we had a right, under the arrangement made with you yesterday, to turn them all loose in the street at any moment.

It was at the will of your government to put an end to the disturbances in ten minutes. Yet this mob of intoxicated soldiers was allowed to have full range of the city for about two hours. During this time the most brutal excesses were committed—excesses not to be tolerated by civilized nations. Stores and warehouses were broken into and robbed. The sanctities of home were violated, and men were shot defending their property. There is now under my roof a respectable merchant, a native of Virginia, suffering from the agonies caused by a wound which he received defending his own dwelling. I refer to Mr. Hepburn, one of your oldest and most enterprising citizens.

The house of Mrs. Hamilton was assailed, and one bullet, at least, passed through her bedroom and near her bed. Several other houses and stores were broken open and robbed, under cries of "Viva Salnave." In some of the houses thus entered, little children were taken from their beds and thrown upon the floor, and the pillows upon which they had slept carried off by the robbers.

Not even national flags were respected. As this armed rabble passed the house of Mr. Hubbard, consul for Brazil and Bremen, and an American citizen, they saw his flags flying, and cried out, "You may hang out your flags, and we will trample them under our feet." Not even my own house of legation was respected. The soldiers stopped in front of it; one of them struck the gate with his sword, and another with some other weapon. It was proposed to fire on it, and I have reason to believe that this violence would have been done had not some one in the crowd called out to them to forbear.

They did fire off a volley near the back gate, but not at the house. Of course, in this condition of things, all business here is at an end. Many parties are taking refuge on shipboard, or fleeing into the country. Now, sir, with all kindness, but with all frankness, permit me to say that these violences must not be repeated.

If national flags have ceased to be the symbol of safe citizenship and free commerce, guaranteed by treaty, it must be understood that there is a nationality behind every flag. As regards myself I have no fears. It is for the citizens of the United States that I speak. If the city is constantly embroiled in this way, no matter whether the houses or stores of American citizens are invaded, still their business is ruined. If the goods of Haytien merchants are burned or stolen, who are debtors to the Americans, the parties who are robbed are not Haytiens but Americans. This is a small city of about thirty thousand inhabitants, the seat of authority, and having within its limits a large military force. A little care would have prevented all this crime and destruction of life and property.

I know you are in a state of war, but this makes it all the easier, armed as you are, to keep up a police adequate to the demands of the hour. Anticipating evil on my arrival here, I wrote for two or three ships of war to defend the rights of the citizens of the United States in the ports of this country. I expect one here soon. If the authorities cannot keep the peace here, so that persons under my charge shall be safe, I will undertake to do it, and have no fear but that I shall succeed.

The claim that the mob of last evening resulted from the opening of the prison cannot be sustained. Nor did it grow out of the escape of refugees from my house. Not a single refugee has left the shelter of the legation.

The house is filled with defenseless women and children, and the few men who came have remained. As to the receiving of refugees in the exceptional way practiced in this country, you know it is not for the benefit of the United States, but grows out of the unsettled condition of affairs in this country. Haytiens of all parties and factions have always received the benefit of it—we only the trouble and blame.

I shall forward a copy of this communication to the Secretary of State for the United States, and beg an early answer.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, your obedient servant,

G. H. HOLLISTER.

Hon. DELORME, Secretary of State, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Hollister to Mr. Seward.

[Extract.]

No. 4.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, May 17, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that this country is in the midst of an insurrection almost coextensive with the limits of the republic. As all regular mails are cut off, it is impossible for me to inform you accurately of the state of affairs, but the large towns, except this, have surrendered to Nessage Saget, the provisional commander-in-chief on the part of the people, who is marching upon this city, as is believed, with about ten thousand men. If this be true, the cause of Salnave is lost, as he cannot have more than one thousand effective troops at this place, and almost all the principal citizens and men of property are ready to join the insurgents on their arrival.

The President receives no visitors, nor advice from any one, but remains at the palace surrounded by a strong guard, and declares that he will burn the town on the arrival of Saget, unless he can repulse him, and that we must all perish together. I have not seen an intelligent person here who doubts that such is his intention. * * * *

The gallery of my house of legation was fired into by a soldier on the 12th instant. The bullet lodged in the roof of the balcony. I was obliged to go to Mr. Delorme and use very strong language by way of remonstrance. He said it was accidental, should not happen again, and that the offender should be punished. I will say for Mr. Delorme that since my letter to him of the 6th instant, a copy of which I have sent you, he has kept up a strong police in the city and the streets have been quiet.

I beg you to think that my whole time and attention are devoted to the interests of our people here and to the general cause of good order. The house of legation protects from one hundred and fifty to two hundred persons every night, and I have been obliged to sleep there on the floor to keep the inmates quiet.

You would be surprised to witness the consternation that exists here. They think that I am the only person who can protect them and insist on my being with them. Salnave will not allow us to embark any of the men who are in the house, and has kept a guard on the quay to shoot any of them who might attempt to leave the city by ship. As I cannot see you to take your advice, I am compelled to take the best counsel that I can get here, and then act on my own judgment. Firmness alone can avail anything in this crisis, and if I have had any fears, I have at least kept them to myself. I have received but one communication from you since I arrived here. The De Soto remained here twenty-four hours.

Repeating my earnest request that you will send me a ship of war, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 28, 1868.

SIR: Your painfully interesting dispatch of the 8th of May, No. 3, has been received. The lawless condition of society in Hayti which you describe is a subject of grave concern and deep regret. The proceedings by which you remonstrated and reasoned with the government in the interest of public peace and safety at Port-au-Prince are approved. The Secretary of the Navy, on receiving the first intimation of the extreme revolutionary disturbances in Hayti, took the necessary measures for the dispatch of a ship of war to Port-au-Prince, to be employed, if necessary, for the protection of the lives and property of citizens of the United States.

You request an instruction on the subject of the continuance of the exercise of the right of asylum by the legation. The question is attended with much embarrassment. The right of a foreign legation to afford an asylum to political refugees is not recognized by the law of nations as applicable to civilized or constitutionally organized states. It is a practice, however, which, from the necessity of the case, is exercised to a greater or less extent by every civilized state in regard to barbarous or semi-barbarous countries. The revolutionary condition seemed to become chronic in many of the South American nations after they had achieved their independence, and the United States, as well as the European nations, recognized and maintained the right of asylum in their intercourse with those republics. We have, however, constantly employed our influence, for several years, to meliorate and improve the political situation in these republics, with an earnest desire to relinquish the right of asylum there. In the year 1867 we formally relinquished and renounced that right in the republic of Peru. This government has also largely modified the exercise of that right among some of the Oriental nations.

Thus we are prepared to accept the opinion you have deliberately expressed that it is no longer expedient to practice the right of asylum in the Haytien republic. Nevertheless, we should not be willing to relinquish the right abruptly, and in the midst of the anarchy which seems to be now prevailing in Hayti, in the absence of matured convictions on your part. Nor do we think it expedient that it should be renounced by the United States legation any sooner or in any greater degree than it is renounced by the legations of the other important neutral powers. With these reservations, the subject is confidently left to your own discreet judgment.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, Hayti, May 29, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the condition of this city is growing daily worse. Yesterday the President burned down about thirty houses, and threatened to fire into an orphan asylum where there were about sixty little girls, giving them only twenty minutes to leave. We persuaded him at last to give them a reasonable time. He still declares that he will burn the city. Whether he will I cannot say, but I shall do my best to prevent it. If I had a ship of war here, my moral position would be improved. I send an extract from the Jamaica Guardian, (May 25,) relating to Mr. St. John and myself, stating things which are entirely without foundation. We have never attempted to interfere with matters here, except as I have informed you heretofore.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. H. HOLLISTER.

[From the Jamaica Guardian, May 25.]

HAYTI.—ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY'S STEAMER PHOEBE.

Her Majesty's steam frigate Phœbe, Captain Bythesea, arrived at Port Royal on Saturday evening from Port-au-Prince, whither she had been sent from St. Jago de Cuba, by instructions received at that port per "Caravelle," on the 16th instant, from Commodore Phillemore.

On her arrival at Port-au-Prince she found the President entrenched within the city, the revolutionists surrounding it, and encamped within eight miles. The President had called upon the inhabitants to take up arms in his defence, declaring that every citizen, above the age of eighteen, who refused or neglected to take up arms for the protection of the government of the dictator, would be treated as a rebel, and punished accordingly. A general conscription had followed, and about five hundred men constituted the national guard of Port-au-Prince.

The army of Generals Hector and Nassage were hourly looked for, and a dash upon the capital was expected; for this critical moment Salnave was preparing, and the fortifications around the national palace which commanded the town had been strengthened by guns in front of the palace gates.

The dictatorship had been publicly proclaimed.

The foreign consuls still refused to deliver up the refugees within the consulates.

Her Majesty's steamer Royalist had arrived, but not knowing that the insurgents had got possession of the light-house at the entrance of the harbor, and extinguished the light, she got ashore in the channel, being deceived at night by the light of a vessel in port, which she mistook for that of the light-house.

The channel is difficult and dangerous. The Royalist remained for fourteen hours in the mud, without being able to obtain any assistance whatever; she eventually got off without having sustained any injury.

Salnave, at the head of a large reconnoitering party, had marched from Port-au-Prince, to discover the position of the revolutionists who threatened him, but, after a distressing march of seven miles, failed in meeting with his adversaries. During the march the troops of the president were fired upon from heights and from the bush, where the insurgents concealed themselves. The party, therefore, returned to Port-au-Prince, with the loss of about ninety men, in the manner we have described.

Salnave, however, determined upon making an attack, and he was busily engaged in preparations for the conflict when the Phœbe left Port-au-Prince.

Strong remonstrances had been made by Mr. St. John, the British consul, and Mr. Hollister, the American minister, against the threatenings of the authorities, and particularly to the terms of a proclamation issued to the effect that if the citizens of Port-au-Prince did not, within two hours after the promulgation of the order, present themselves in arms, in front of the palace gate, the most rigorous and determined measures would be adopted against the city. The said proclamation stated that this would be the last and only notice the President would give. No person was permitted to leave the capital, and the expression of opinion was prohibited.

Mr. Hollister, backed by the guns of Commodore Boggs and the United States steamer Do Soto informed the government that it would be held responsible for any damage that might be done to the property of peaceful citizens, and for the property of American citizens in particular. Salnave replied that the proclamation was issued with the design of frightening his own subjects into obedience, but that he had no intention whatever of carrying into execution the threats which the proclamation held out.

When the Phœbe sailed into the waters of Port-au-Prince, there was a great rejoicing. Salnave, in an order of the day, which appears in the Moniteur of the 16th, says the revolution has been brought about by correspondence from Jamaica, which has influenced the opinions of the foreign press, run down the government, and destroyed its credit.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, Hayti, June 29, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to represent that the danger from disease at Mr. Conard's house made it necessary for me to get a promise of amnesty from President Salnave for the safe departure of the Haytien women and children, and for their protection after leaving the house, and his consent that the men by him deemed culpable might be put on board a merchant ship, quietly in the night season, under an escort from the Penobscot, and landed in New York. We had about one hundred and fifty persons in the house who fed at our table, and slept not only in the rooms, halls, galleries, and kitchen, but also in the back yard.

* * * * *

Even the consent that I got from the President was very reluctantly given, at the solicitation of Captain Eastman, Mr. Conard, and myself, who went to the palace together to make the arrangement. The President finally agreed to it as a sanitary measure and out of personal regard for me, for Mr. and Mrs. Conard, and for our government. I then wrote Mr. Conard a letter telling him what was agreed upon, and at the same time told General Romain, one of the refugees, that he might remain, notwithstanding the order, with such of his friends as he thought most in danger.

The next morning the Haytien refugees all left except General Romain and six others, who are still with us. I knew the President would allow me to keep such as I pleased, and afterwards saw him, and he assented to my conduct under our arrangement.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 18, 1868.

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 29th of June, No. 8, in which you have related the proceedings which you took on a recent occasion to relieve the consulate of an extraordinary and exceedingly inconvenient number of insurrectionary refugees, and of the communication which you held with President Salnave on that subject. * * *

I see no reason to censure or disapprove of your proceedings mentioned, by which you obtained relief from the excessive encumbrance of refugees. The proceeding is in harmony with the instructions you have received from this department, and with the settled policy of the United States. The practice of opening asylum in consular offices to political refugees is exceptional. It is adopted only in intercourse with States imperfectly constituted and established, and it rests for its vindication not upon principles of international law, but only upon laudable sentiments of humanity.

In all cases the exercise of the right should be attended as far as possible with delicacy towards the State concerned, and with forbearance from all appearance of arrogance and dictation. The imperfect knowledge we have of the existing crisis in Hayti gives us no reason to suppose that you have either compromised the national honor, or done violence to the interests of liberty and humanity.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, August 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that our situation here is still very critical. The presence of Captain Eastman in this port has enabled me to maintain my position, as well with the government as with those who are trying to overthrow it. Without being able to hear from you, I have been obliged to act on my own judgment, and have done, in my official character, just what I would have done in my own private affairs.

* * * * *

I ask, as a special favor to President Salnave, and to me, in behalf of the interest of both republics, that you will intercede with the Secretary of the Navy, that Mr. Melville, of the United States ship of war Penobscot, may be detached from active service for the period of two years. I assure you that, in my judgment, the cause of humanity and civilization responds to this request.

Salnave is the only man in Hayti fit to govern the country. The common people love him as their protector and friend. He has been obliged to do what we did in our rebellion, and has shot, for base treachery, a few persons who were better dead than alive. Perhaps I was in the wrong, but I have interceded in behalf of others. The executions which have taken place, as the President assures me, were not in retaliation for the murder, in cold blood, of five or six hundred common people, some of whom were women, shot by the insurrectionary chiefs.

The state of things here, sir, is truly horrible, and something positive must be done for this desolated country. The poor people are suffering beyond what I can tell you of. Commercial interests are nearly destroyed, and unless decisive measures are taken by the only power which can desire to have any relations with the island, except to plunder its people, everything that belongs to a nationality is lost.

I refer you, sir, to a letter of this date, written to the Secretary of the Navy, by Captain Eastman, of the Penobscot, to confirm the sentiments expressed in this letter.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

G. H. HOLLISTER.

[Extract.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, Hayti, September 7, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the city of Port-au-Prince is again quiet. General Faubert has evacuated La Coupe, leaving all his artillery in the hands of the President. For miles around the country is in absolute possession of the government. I hope this state of things will continue. I also desire to state that I have just completed a little round of visits to my consuls and commercial agents at St. Marcs, Gonaives, and Cape Haytien, and found everything in as good order as could be expected to exist during a period of insurrectionary war. I have been much complained of in the smaller ports for not visiting them more and giving them the presence of a ship of war, but I did not think it would be prudent to take the ship away from Port-au-Prince until affairs here were in a more settled state; so I have embraced this opportunity to make these visits while there was a lull here.

On my return we put into the harbor of St. Nicholas Mole, and I thought you might like to know the observations which Commander Irwin, of the Gettysburg, and I made of the harbor and its surroundings during the few hours that we spent there. I desired to have the government in possession of the opinion of a candid and experienced naval officer, such as I believe him to be, and I thought it would be worth while to follow his suggestions and take the soundings of such parts of the harbor as were not to be found on the old French charts. Perhaps you have not seen the mole, and I therefore venture a little description of it, although it is so out of the way of the ordinary works of nature that words cannot do it justice. The mole proper must be more than three miles long, is almost of uniform height, and at a distance looks like some vast Roman wall. It is mainly composed of limestone. Before you come to it, as you enter from the west, Cape St. Nicholas, on your right, is the first object that commands your attention. It is magnificently bold and volcanic-looking, and clouds always hide the summits so that you cannot well judge of its height. The harbor may be said to begin where the mole and the cape are at opposite points. In fact the cape proper begins nearly opposite the mole. At this point the cape rises from the water in a series of natural terraces, at proper distances for the mounting of guns. The first three seem as level as a house floor. The others are more rugged. I think there are six in all. As you enter the harbor the mole is on your left, and it stretches along between the ocean and the harbor, until it meets a little neck of land which protects the inner harbor from the ocean on the east. The village is of little consequence except to show how snug and cool and healthy a town would be on that site. It is situated on the right hand as you go in, almost at the entrance of the inner harbor. Just beyond the village, and before entering the little harbor, is an old French fort and magazine in a good state of preservation. The outer harbor is almost too deep for anchorage in some places, but protected enough from storms for that purpose, and would hold all the fleets of the world. Just in front of the fort, and for one-third of a mile further in, is a beautiful sand beach shaped like a crescent, and back of it a plateau extending to the mountain in the rear from a quarter to a half of a mile in width. Commander Irwin took the soundings all along this beach, and they ranged in accordance with a little chart marked A, prepared under his direction, which I herewith send you.

The whole of this part of the harbor has a sand bottom, and the water is so clear that I could see the tufts of sponge and the little fish at a depth of eight fathoms. The whole length of this beach above described could be made into a perfect wharf by driving piles into the water at a depth demanded by any kind of ship, and filling in from the shore, so that all classes of vessels could be fastened there by cables in perfect safety. The table land behind the proposed wharf would be entirely practicable for building purposes, and behind the plateau are stone quarries on the mountain side for building materials. Besides this, near by, a river of good fresh water could be made available with little expense, and connected with any enterprise, either naval or otherwise. This river would also supply the city if it were fifty times as large as it is. * * *

It is as healthy a place as Newport. I slept on the hurricane deck in a cot, under an awning, all night, and was obliged to protect myself with a double blanket, and had a fine fresh breeze blowing in my face.

The inner harbor is so remote from the end of the mole that it is perfectly land locked by it. Aside from this, the mainland which forms this little pocket projects far into the water, leaving a deep and narrow channel, but wide enough for the passage of ships. After you get in, you can hardly persuade yourself that you are not on a little country lake surrounded by bold shores. Ships can anchor any and everywhere in this basin, according to their size. The commander went over its whole surface and took the soundings where he thought it necessary, and found them to correspond essentially with the old French chart made 1 don't know how many years ago.

The outer harbor itself, with a battery on the end of the mole and batteries on the terraces of the cape, is perfectly unassailable. Besides, no ship could anchor outside the mole or outside the isthmus before described, for the purpose of landing troops, as it is a wild coast, and the waters are without soundings.

Aside from this, both the mole and isthmus are insurmountable, the mole being about eighty feet high, and the other, on the ocean side, I should judge from forty to fifty feet high. The back country a few miles from the village is said to be exceedingly fertile, and the whole neighborhood is salubrious. * * * * *

I take this opportunity to say that in my opinion the firmness and judicious advice of Commander Irwin as well here as in all other ports which we have found it necessary to visit, have aided me here materially in allaying the bad passions of the contending parties, and in giving whatever support it is proper for us to give to a friendly power.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

G. H. HOLLISTER.

No. 10.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, Hayti, September 22, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have received your two dispatches, Nos. 7 and 8, and that I shall strictly follow the suggestions which I find in them. * * *

There can be, in my opinion, no doubt as to the ultimate success of the government here in putting down the rebellion. The Haytien ship of war Alexandre Petion, which has been so long detained in the United States, arrived on the 19th instant, and on the 20th instant went to Petit Goave and sunk the Sylvain, a government ship which had been betrayed, and was then in the hands of the insurrectionists. The boats of the Alexandre Petion picked up and saved about seventy of the crew of the Sylvain. A few were drowned and a few swam ashore.

The Alexandre Petion also found at the same place the Liberté, another ship of war, which had been in a similar manner placed in the hands of the revolutionists, and fired on her, and it is believed that the shots received would have sunk her, had she not got ashore and been burnt by those who had charge of her. As these two ships, so destroyed, constituted the entire naval force of those who are in arms against the government, and as the president has recently fitted up a new ship of war, and as the armament of the Alexandre Petion is quite formidable, he will be able to reach the headquarters of every insurrectionary chief in any seaport of the country. I have, therefore, no doubt that he will soon retake Meragoane, Jeremie, Aux-Cayes, Jacmel, and St. Marc. The other ports in the hands of those acting against him are of minor importance and must soon fall. In this way the seaboard of the whole country will, I think, very soon be opened to the commerce of the world, and business will be restored. Still, the situation is quite critical. I will keep you advised, from time to time, of the state of affairs here, and I beg you to think that in relation to contending parties I shall not intermeddle or do anything not authorized by the known policy of our government. I do not disguise from you the fact that my sympathies have for a long time been with President Salnave. I do not think that any one of the chiefs in arms against him could manage the affairs of the country any better than he does, and I have not been able to discover that he is the tyrant and murderer that he is represented to be by his enemies. His principal fault, on the contrary, appears to be that he has been too credulous in putting his ships and forts into the charge of persons who have betrayed their trust, and that he has been more forgiving than the President of the United States would have been under similar circumstances during the administration of Mr. Lincoln. He is certainly a man of marked ability, great determination, and force of character.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

G. H. HOLLISTER.

No. 13.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Port-au-Prince, Hayti, October 21, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the Haytien corvette Alexandre Petion arrived in this port on or about the 23d September last, and at once proceeded, under the command of Captain Nickells, an American citizen, to the port of Petit Goave, with the President on board, for the purpose of capturing the two ships Sylvain and Liberté, which were in possession of the rebels. He went within easy range of the Sylvain with the American flag flying at the peak of his ship, thus using our colors as a decoy to deceive the officers of the Sylvain. As soon as he was ready for action, he instantly hauled down the American flag and hoisted the Haytien colors, opening fire on the Sylvain at the same moment. This affair has caused much excitement in the country, and all the rebel chiefs have written to me in regard to it, some of them in a threatening way, and intimating that our flag would not be respected by them unless the thing was explained. Of course I have not felt at liberty to reply to their letters, but I have written to our vice-consuls and other officers residing in the ports held by the rebels, stating that I considered such a use of the American colors improper, and contrary to the practice of civilized nations upon the high seas, and authorizing those officers to say to such persons as they might see fit to communicate with, that such was my opinion; also to say that I should immediately take your advice upon the subject, and if I found that I was wrong, I should inform them by the first mail.

I have also remonstrated with Mr. Pate, the secretary of foreign affairs, in relation to the matter above communicated. He did not claim to approve of what had been done, but seemed disposed to think that I had been misinformed in regard to the facts. I am sure that I have stated them correctly, for I have them from Captain Nickells himself. Please advise me in the premises.

On the 5th instant, the American steamship Maratanza arrived in this port. She had been sent here by Messrs. A. S. & W. G. Lewis, of Boston, to be sold to the government, if terms could be agreed upon. As it was necessary for me to visit our consular agent at Jeremie, and as I could not ask the commanders of the British, French, or Spanish ships of war constantly kept here, and as I had no American ship to carry me, I begged the privilege of going on board the Maratanza, with the promise that I should be landed at Jeremie for the purpose aforesaid. When we arrived off Jeremie, we found that the Alexandre Petion was there, with the President on board, bombarding the town. I asked to be sent on shore under a flag of truce, in order that I might see Mr. Wiener, and assist him in protecting American interests. I was told by the captain of the ship that he could not comply with my request, as he was informed by the captain of the Alexandre Petion that the rebels in port had fired upon a flag of truce the day before, and that he would not be responsible for my safety, or that of his men, if I attempted to go ashore. Within a few hours the President came on board the Maratanza, and, soon after, I was informed that the government of Hayti had bought the ship. The American colors were at once hauled down, and replaced by the Haytien flag. Not long after, I saw preparations were being made on board for bombarding the town. I requested the officers of the ship not to do it until I could be landed, if not at Jeremie, at some other convenient place. They disregarded my request, and opened upon the town, discharging, I think, eight shots.

I am informed by Mr. Wiener that five hundred and seventy-five shells have been thrown into the place with very little damage.

The President left Port-au-Prince yesterday, as is supposed, for Jeremie, and it is thought that his intention was to renew the attack. I would be much obliged to you, if it is possible, to send me a ship of war, in order that I may visit Jacmel, Aux Cayes, Jeremie, Miragoane, St. Marc, and all other places where there are American interests to be protected. It seems more important now than heretofore that I should have such a ship. All the other powers represented here regard it as highly important to their citizens that they should be so protected, and our interests here are much more important than theirs. I will advise you from time to time.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

G. H. HOLLISTER.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, November 2, 1868.

SIR: I inclose a translation of a communication to this department of the 30th of September last, from Jacmel, signed by L. Tanismaine and ten others, calling themselves the committee of public safety, and of a protest which accompanied it, represented to have been addressed to you, against a bombardment, on the 20th of September, of the town of Petit Goave, and the sinking of two war steamers, the 22d of December, and the Liberté, by a war steamer under the American flag. The destruction of these vessels by the Alexandre Petion is mentioned in your dispatch No. 10, of the 22d of September, which, however, is silent upon the subject of the bombardment of Petit Goave.

It is supposed that the committee of public safety referred to may wish it to be believed that because the Alexandre Petion did, as they allege, fly the United States flag upon that occasion, this government is responsible therefor. They consequently threaten to take severe measures against all vessels under that flag, until justice shall have been done them. This department has no other information than that contained in the letter of the committee, that the Alexandre Petion did fly our flag. If, however, the statement of the committee should be true, the act referred to was probably adopted as a stratagem of war. You will make inquiries upon the subject, and if you should ascertain that the statement is well founded, you will address a note to the minister for foreign affairs of Hayti, protesting against a proceeding which was unauthorized, and which may lead to a fulfillment of the threat referred to.

REPUBLIC OF HAYTI,

Jacmel, September 30, 1868.

Committee of public safety of the district to his excellency the secretary of state for foreign affairs at Washington:

We have the honor to send you with this packet, copy of a protest which we have made known to the consul general of the United States at Port-au-Prince.

We expect justice from the great nation which is at the head of the civilization of the New World.

You will blame, no doubt, the unheard-of act which has been committed by a ship of war under the American flag, against a city of the republic, which by the ties which connect it with the great American nation, by the sympathies which exist between the two countries, has a right to its entire protection.

Your excellency will not allow the flag of the noble nation, your care of which is well known to all, to cover the misdeeds of General Salnave, who, notwithstanding the strongly expressed will of the majority of the Haytien people, tries by all means to keep in power.

We are your excellency's very humble servants,

L. SANISAINÉ,

Vice-President of the Committee, and ten others.

His Excellency the SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington.

REPUBLIC OF HAYTI,
Jacmel, September 30, 1868.

The committee of public safety of the district to the consul general of the United States at Port-au-Prince:

MR. CONSUL GENERAL: The town of Petit Goave has been the victim of an act of hostility on the part of a war steamer, under the American flag. The 20th instant, an armed packet boat, bearing the American flag, entered the port of Petit Goave, which without doubt is known to you to be in the hands of the revolutionists that succeeded in all the departments of the south, all of the north, a great part of those of the east and of the west.

The people of Petit Goave had no alarm at the sight of the flag of a friendly power, a power with which Hayti had relations of commerce and friendship. This vessel came to anchor close to two of our war steamers, the 22d of December and the Liberte, and suddenly opened fire upon them; sunk them in a short time, and bombarded the town of Petit Goave, which it reduced in part to ashes.

We now protest, in the name of the nation, against this unjustifiable act, contrary to the law of nations, and demand justice from the government you represent.

This justice, we hope, will be done by the eminently civilized government of the United States. The deed done at Petit Goave, where a war vessel under the American flag was guilty, will compel us, you know, Mr. Consul, to take severe measures against all vessels under that flag until justice be done to us.

Accept, Mr. Consul General, the assurance of our high consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, Hayti, November 5, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the government of Hayti has notified me that several ports of this country will be bombarded at any time after the 31st of October last, at the discretion of the President. I have sent to the secretary of state a written remonstrance against such a proceeding without giving twenty-four hours' notice of the time fixed upon for the bombardment. This remonstrance seemed necessary, as I had no ships of war to protect American rights in any of the ports subject to the order of the government, as above stated. If I had the opportunity to visit the towns thus exposed, I think I could save many lives and much property; as it is, I am powerless. The British government has ordered a ship of war to remain here, at the disposal of Mr. St. John, until the insurrection is brought to a close. The same order has been made by the governments of France and Spain. As it is, I am obliged to remain here and await the result. I earnestly beg you, if it is possible, to send me the Gettysburg or Penobscot, or some other means of conveyance, so that I may visit Jacmel, Petit Goave, Jeremie, Aux Cayes, St. Marc Gonaives, and Cape Haytien, and, if possible, prevent the loss of life and the destruction of property which is very likely to follow. I do not wish to cavil at the policy of the Haytien government, or to complain of the construction put upon the law recognized by civilized nations in such a case: I leave that to your judgment. At the same time, I could do no less than remonstrate. I think that Salnave is certain to succeed, and is the only man here who is fit to rule the country.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. H. HOLLISTER.

No. 15.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 10, 1868.

SIR: I recur to your dispatch of the 21st of October, No. 13, in which you mention that on the 5th of October last the United States steamship Maratanza arrived at Port-au-Prince, having been sent by Messrs. A. S. and W. G. Lewis, of Boston, to be sold to the government, if terms could be agreed upon. You further mention that it was found necessary for you to visit our consular agents at Jeremie, and, inasmuch as you could not ask commanders of certain foreign ships of war to convey you there, and had no American ship of war to carry you, that you therefore obtained a passage on the Maratanza, with the promise that you should be landed at Jeremie for that purpose. You further mention that on arriving off Jeremie you found that the Alexandre Petion was there, with the President on board, bombarding the town; that you asked to be sent on shore that you might assist in protecting American interests; that the captain of the Maratanza declined your request, upon the ground that he had been informed by the captain of the Alexandre Petion that the rebels in port had fired upon a flag of truce the day before, and that he, the captain of the Maratanza, would not be responsible for your safety or that of his men if you attempted to go ashore; that the President of Hayti then came on board the Maratanza, and you were soon after informed that the Haytien government had bought that ship; that the United States colors were then at once hauled down and replaced by the Haytien flag, and immediate preparations were made for bombarding the town; that you requested the officers of the ships to refrain from their attack until you could be landed, if not in Jeremie, at some other convenient place; that your request was disregarded, and that the captain, while you were thus detained on board, fired upon the town, discharging eight shots.

From this statement it would appear that you embarked on board a United States vessel which you were aware at the time was proceeding for the purpose of being sold there to the Haytien government, to be used as a ship of war. It is not to be doubted that you trusted in the good faith of the commander to respect your official character and the neutrality laws of the United States, so long as you should remain on board as a passenger. The result, however, proves that you were mistaken in that confidence. Your proceeding must, therefore, be regarded as very indiscreet, and one which must not be repeated hereafter. It is to be presumed that the captain of the Maratanza was a citizen of the United States. His conduct on the occasion is inexcusable, and proper measures will be taken for the punishment of the offense which he committed by your detention, and by engaging in the assault upon that occasion.

The President of Hayti, having been present and commanding on board the Maratanza, the United States must hold the Haytien government responsible for your unlawful detention, under the circumstances mentioned, on board the Maratanza.

You will address a letter to the minister for foreign affairs, in which you will inform him that the United States will expect an early explanation, with due atonement, for the injury thus committed by the President of the Haytien Republic.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 10, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 21st of October has been received. You mention that the Haytien corvette Alexandre Petion arrived at Port-au-Prince on the 23d of September last, and at once proceeded, under the command of Captain Nickells, a citizen of the United States, to the port of Petit Goave, with the President on board, for the purpose of capturing the two ships, Sylvain and Liberté, which were in possession of the rebels; that he went within easy range of the Sylvain, with the American flag flying at the peak of the ship, thus using our colors as a decoy to deceive the officers of the Sylvain; that as soon as he was ready for action, he instantly hauled down the American flag and hoisted the Haytien colors, opening fire upon the Sylvain at the same time. You mention that you have written to our vice-consul and other officers residing in the ports held by the rebels, stating that you considered such a use of the American colors improper, and contrary to the practice of civilized nations upon the high seas, and authorizing those officers to say to such persons as they might see fit to communicate with, that this was your opinion; also to say that you should immediately take my advice upon the subject. You mention also that you remonstrated with Mr. Pate, the Haytien secretary of foreign affairs, in relation to the same matter.

You were entirely right in denouncing the conduct of Captain Nickells, as also you were right in remonstrating with the secretary of state for foreign affairs in relation to the matter. It is manifest, from your report of the transaction, that President Salnave, if he did not command it himself, at least permitted the abuse of the United States flag on that occasion, a proceeding by which the dignity and honor of the United States are greatly offended. You will, therefore, immediately address a communication to the Haytien government, asking an early explanation, with due satisfaction for that disrespectful and unfriendly proceeding. An inquiry will be instituted, with a view to a punishment of Captain Nickells for his conduct on the occasion referred to.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: Your dispatch, No. 15, of the 5th November, has been received. In reply, I transmit herewith a copy of a letter of the 3d instant, received by this department from the Secretary of the Navy, to whom the subject of your dispatch had been referred. You will perceive therefrom that it is not in the power of the Navy Department to assign another vessel to Haytien waters.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,

Washington, December 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, inclosing copy of a dispatch from the United States minister at Port-au-Prince, relative to the state of affairs on the island of Hayti, and the want of protection to the interests of American citizens there.

The naval force having been reduced, to comply with an act of Congress, Rear-Admiral Hoff is restricted in his operations. A single vessel is probably all that can be assigned to Haytien waters, and the Nipsic is now there.

Very respectfully,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

NEW YORK, NO. 132 FRONT STREET,

August 24, 1868.

MR. SECRETARY: I have the honor to inform you that emissaries from the rebels of Hayti have lately arrived in this city, and among them is a person named Dejoie, ex-commander of the Haytien dispatch-boat Liberté, which he treacherously delivered to the enemy in exchange for arms and munitions of war, to be used against the constitutional government of the country; and, in consideration of the treaty and the good relations existing between the republic of the United States and the government of Hayti, I must ask you to give orders prohibiting the clearance from this port, or any other in the United States, of all arms, munitions, or contraband of war, intended to foment or supply the rebellion in Hayti.

I also inclose a copy of the Moniteur Haïtien, containing the decree of my government in relation to the two vessels, Liberté and Sylvain, which have fallen into the hands of the enemy, and are now used for committing all sorts of depredations upon the coast.

Please accept the assurance of my very distinguished consideration.

GEORGE RAESTER.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

[From the Moniteur Haïtien, of the 15th of August, 1868.]

DECREE.

SYLVAIN SALNAVE, PRESIDENT OF HAYTI.

Whereas a few ambitious persons, regardless of the responsibility of causing disorder, pillage, arson, and other crimes in the state, have excited a rebellion and seized the two national war vessels, Sylvain and Liberté, to commit depredations at sea as they are doing on land, by using those vessels to rob innocent vessels, to their own advantage, and to the damage of general interests;

And, considering that it is necessary to make known the injury those vessels are doing to commerce, and to retake them as soon as possible;

Announcing that the laws punish piracy by death, and the law of nations sanctions every measure for the suppression of such crimes;

By the advice and counsel of our cabinet, we decree as follows:

ARTICLE 1. Let the vessels Sylvain and Liberté, now in the hands of the rebels, and used against the government of the republic, and in depredations on our coast, be seized wherever found, and punished as pirates.

ART. 2. Every armed vessel is authorized to attack and capture them as lawful prizes.

ART. 3. The present decree shall be published and promulgated by the secretary of state, and the minister of war and marine is charged with its execution.

Done at the national palace, in Port au Prince, this 11th day of August, 1868, in the sixty-fifth year of independence.

S. SALNAVE.

HILAIRE JEAN PIERRE,
Secretary of Justice, Public Education, and Worship, &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Raester.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 27, 1868.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has received a note from Mr. George Raester, chargé d'affaires for the republic of Hayti, under date of the 24th instant. Mr. Raester informs the undersigned that rebel emissaries of Hayti, among whom is a person named Dejoie, ex-commander of the Haytien dispatch-boat Liberty, have arrived in New York; wherefore Mr. Raester asks that the undersigned give orders to prohibit a clearance from that port or from any other port in the United States of all arms and munitions or contraband of war intended to foment or supply the rebellion in Hayti.

In reply, the undersigned has the honor to inform Mr. Raester that the power of this government to maintain neutrality in regard to foreign and friendly nations is regulated by law, and constantly resides in the judiciary. While an appeal can be made to the judicial authority at any time by any interested party, it is not conformable with any practice of this government to issue executive orders, unless such special and urgent necessity are shown to the government as are neither shown in the present case by Mr. Raester nor have otherwise come to the knowledge of the President.

The undersigned avails himself of the occasion to tender to Mr. Raester a renewed assurance of his high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

No. 33.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monrovia, December 11, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the legislature of Liberia met in this city, according to the constitution of the republic, on Monday, December 2, but immediately adjourned, in consequence of that day being the anniversary of the great battle and victory of 1822.

The day being celebrated with the usual ceremonies and appropriate oratories from the honorable secretary of state and I. H. Roberts, esq., could not fail to perpetuate a remembrance of the patriotism and bravery of the pioneers who laid the foundation of this Christian nation on these barbarous shores. Both houses of the national legislature met again on the 3d December, and have been for some days engaged in deciding the cases of several contested seats. So soon as this is accomplished, they will organize themselves in a joint convention, when the question in reference to the election of a President will constitutionally come before them.

I had the honor to inform the department, in my dispatch No. 16, that of the three candidates for the presidency no one had a majority of votes at the election held in May last, and that it would devolve on the legislature to elect one from those having the highest number of votes. It is generally and confidently believed that the Rev. J. S. Payne, of this city, will be elected.

It shall be my duty and pleasure to keep the department advised of any measures adopted at this session of the legislature affecting those interests of an international character with which the United States or other nations may be concerned.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monrovia, December 12, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the British mail steamer due here at 6 a. m. this day having been delayed, I am afforded the opportunity of announcing the fact that James S. Payne, of Monrovia, has been duly elected President of the republic of Liberia.

The house of representatives having seen fit, because of some want of constitutionality in the election returns of one or two places, to throw them out of the general ballots, Mr. Payne was found to have a majority of the votes cast, and his election was announced by the said house of representatives, thus precluding the necessity of a joint convention of the two branches of the legislature for said purpose.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monrovia, January 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the inauguration of his excellency J. S. Payne, as President of the republic of Liberia, took place with very imposing ceremonies on the 6th instant in this city.

A large and commodious platform, encircled and canopied with the flags of the different nations having treaties with Liberia, was erected in the public square, and on it were seated the retiring President, newly elected President, and such of his intended cabinet as had already been selected, all the members of the diplomatic corps, both houses of the legislature, the mayor and city council of Monrovia, and the members of the judiciary department.

The Vice-President, J. T. Gibson, of Cape Palmos, had not arrived, and could not with the President be sworn into office at the same time.

President Payne's inaugural was of the first character, and was received by the surrounding multitudes with enthusiastic applause. So soon as it is published I shall see that copies are sent to the department, as well as the very superior message of Ex-President Warner at the opening of the legislature, which document is now going through the press.

The representatives of foreign powers having met the day before, unanimously resolved that the United States minister should be the medium of congratulation on their behalf.

I have the honor to inclose a copy of the few remarks made on the occasion, just at the termination of the inaugural address.

The honorable J. N. Lewis, for many years secretary of state, has been nominated, confirmed by the senate, and has accepted that office again.

The honorable H. W. Dennis as secretary of the treasury, and W. M. Davis, esq., as attorney general, are talked of.

I shall keep the department advised of all public movements, and have the honor to be, sir, with the utmost respect, your most obedient servant,

JOHN SEYS.

Address to his excellency James S. Payne, President of the republic of Liberia, on the occasion of his inauguration, January 6, 1868.

MR. PRESIDENT: Having been duly accredited during the past year, near the seat of this government, as "United States minister resident and consul general," permit me to indulge the hope that the same uniform courtesy and favor which I have met with at the hands of your most worthy predecessor will be accorded to me by your excellency, and that the harmonious and friendly relations which have hitherto existed between the two republics may be perpetuated during your excellency's administration.

Mr. President, for myself and in behalf of these honorable and duly accredited representatives of foreign powers, my respected associates of the diplomatic corps, permit me to congratulate your excellency on the great event of this day, your excellency's inauguration as President of the republic of Liberia, and to express our fervent wish that your excellency's administration may be one of great peace to yourself, increasing amity and comity with the Christian nations of the world, and abundant prosperity to the republic of Liberia.

SENATE CHAMBER, January 15, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor, by the direction of the senate, to forward your excellency the following resolution, which was adopted by the senate to-day:

"Resolved by the senate, That his excellency the minister resident and consul general of the United States of America, near the seat of government of this republic, be informed that the senate will be pleased to receive his official visit on Friday, the 17th instant, at 12 o'clock m."

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

DANIEL J. BEAMS,
Secretary of the Senate.

His Excellency JOHN SEYS, Minister Resident and Consul General.

MR. SEYS:

SIR: I have the great honor, as president of the senate of the republic of Liberia, to welcome your excellency the United States minister and consul general to the republic of Liberia to this the senate chamber of Liberia; and hope, as during the past year so in time to come, that your residence near the seat of government of this republic may serve to perpetuate the friendly relations now existing between the republic of the United States and the republic of Liberia.

ADDRESS TO THE SENATE.

Mr. President and members of the senate of the republic of Liberia :

This is to me an hour of no ordinary interest, an event of no common occurrence. Occupying as I do a position in which, however imperfectly, I yet represent one of the greatest republics on which the sun ever shone, or about which the historian ever wrote, a grade of office, too, because the more elevated, therefore the more responsible, than any which has preceded me. I cannot from such a standpoint witness the doings of this sister republic without deep, strong, anxious wishes for her continued growth and prosperity as a nation.

In this honor conferred upon me, accredited near the seat of this government, and to-day permitted to officially appear before this honorable body, to whose wisdom and ability so many momentous interests are committed, I feel the privilege I enjoy to be an enviable one, the more especially as I see causes for congratulation to which, as a true and ardent lover of a republican form of government, I cannot refrain from alluding.

Permit me then to congratulate the senate of Liberia in that, after those commotions and agitations which are inseparable from a form of human government where "majesty is in the people," such an auspicious calm should have succeeded; such perfect enthusiasm as was manifested in the ushering in of the new administration; such magnanimity as was displayed by those whose wills succumbed to the popular will.

In these events we see the nucleus of a future nation of indestructible material, a government of lasting and enduring perpetuity, because it exists in the consent of the governed.

Another high source of congratulation is the most timely, wise, and admirable combination of measures emanating from the executive, recommended to the legislative branch of this government, and taken hold of with such promptitude, and acted upon with such perfect confidence, that the good of the masses, the welfare of the people is the grand object of the executive, and not the prosperity of any party, any favored class or aristocratic clique in high places.

When those two branches of a form of government like this, the executive and the legislative, thus harmonize and co-operate for a nation's good, the nation must prosper.

When distrust, misapprehension, and discord creep in and alienate the one from the other, the seeds of disunion are soon sown, and germinate with a fearfully progressive tendency to disruption and ruin.

Permit me, Mr. President and members of the senate, to assure you that I take a peculiar pleasure in keeping the government I represent advised of every important event in your history. While I am speaking here this day, enjoying the honor conferred upon me, the Secretary of State of the United States of America is perusing the intelligence conveyed by the December mail from the United States office of legation in Monrovia, that James S. Payne was duly announced by the house of representatives of this government as the people's choice, and constitutionally elected President of the republic of Liberia.

And I assure you, gentlemen, that any measure which I can deservy in the distance as conducive to the perpetuation of those happy relations which now exist between the two governments, any measure which I can, by proper presentation to my country, conclude will subserve the interests of Liberia, I shall not fail most cordially to embrace and as promptly to advocate.

Mr. President and members of the Senate :

This is a day unparalleled in the history of this republic. We have displayed on the one side of the president of the senate the star-spangled banner of America, and on the other side our national pride, the brilliant lone star of this republic.

On the right side of his excellency the president of the senate, we are favored with the presence of the right honorable John Seys, consul general of the United States of America, and minister resident in this republic.

This, Mr. President, and other considerations, render this an auspicious day to the senate of Liberia; and, while we feel flattered by the noble sentiments of our illustrious guest, expressive of those emotions of joy which he realizes in visiting this hall, I cannot allow this moment to pass without expressing the sentiment of our nation.

Hon. JOHN SEYS :

SIR: Providence has so arranged that you have been appointed minister resident to this republic by that magnanimous nation which you have the distinguished honor to represent; and be you assured, sir, that our interest in your nation generated in consequence of your unrelenting zeal for the promotion and perpetuation of that feeling of friendship and commercial intercourse between this and your nation is of parallel growth with this republic. May your residence in this republic continue to prove a blessing to us as well as highly promotive to your health and happiness. We thank God that you are minister resident here. We are happy to have you visit the senate of the republic of Liberia.

Mr. Seys to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monrovia, February 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the members of the cabinet of the republic of Liberia have been appointed by his excellency President Payne, and all, except in one instance, duly confirmed by the senate. They are—

Hon. J. N. Lewis, secretary of state.

Hon. D. A. Beams, secretary of treasury.

Hon. W. M. Davis, attorney general.

Hon. J. Evans, postmaster general.

H. W. Dennis, esq., formerly speaker of the house of representatives, having declined the offer of secretary of the treasury, Mr. Beams, late clerk of the senate was nominated and appointed by President Payne, but not in time for the confirmation of that body previous to its adjournment.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 9, 1867.

SIR: The time fixed for the assembling of the national congress of Mexico, in the decree calling the late election, was the 20th of November.

On that day one hundred and four members, out of the full number of two hundred and seven, were present, and what are here termed the preparatory meetings, then commenced.

These meetings continued until the 4th instant, one hundred and ten members being then present, when the examination of the credentials of the members, which is here a preliminary act, and the organization of congress was declared effected, and Sunday, the 8th instant, was fixed for the formal opening, in the presence of the President of the republic, of the regular sessions.

The ceremony of this formal opening, therefore, yesterday took place, and I have now the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the "Diario Oficial," containing the speech of President Juarez, and the reply of the president of congress, Mr. Ezequiel Montes, delivered on that occasion.

The importance of these discourses, under all of the circumstances, and the character of certain positions taken in both, lead me to refrain from any comment thereon.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[Translation.]

Address of President Juarez to the Mexican Congress, convened on the 8th of December, 1867, in the city of Mexico.

CITIZEN DEPUTIES: On the 31st of May, 1863, I addressed the people's delegates, and congratulated them on the promptness and energy of the true children of the republic in their resistance to foreign intervention. The national representatives having once more assembled, I now felicitate them upon the just triumph of the republican cause.

By their courage, loyalty and patriotism, the Mexican people have preserved their independence and their beloved institutions. The foreign partisans of monarchy vainly attempted to overthrow the government of our precious republic. But the whole people arose in unanimity against the usurpers, and the foreigners had to vanish, leaving the republic stronger at home and more respected abroad.

The children of the country, who showed themselves great in the mighty struggle for liberty, have shown themselves magnanimous in generosity, since their final victory: as they recovered places occupied by the enemy, they gave protection to all, without distinction of nationality, even to their conquered enemies.

The government believes it interprets the generous feelings of all true republicans by conning the severest penalty of the law to the chief of the insurgents, who is a foreigner, and to a few natives who took the most active part against us. Present justice, for the sake of future peace, demanded the execution at Queretaro, to put an end to internal convulsions and soften the calamities brought upon the country by the most sanguinary war. The necessity of an example, by applying the extreme penalty of the law to the most guilty, allowed the use of greater clemency towards the many culpable. The republic has pardoned her wicked children, as much as she could, and has extended lenity to the invaders of her soil from abroad, who came to ensanguine the earth, and spread ruin and desolation in every quarter.

The slanderers of the republic have seen law and order restored, as the invaders were driven out; and with the return of liberty, the inhabitants begin to enjoy the blessings of good government.

The influence of the national government being now felt throughout the land, the duties of administrative officials are gradually resuming their wonted course. The laws are administered in the spirit of our institutions; federal affairs being first in rank, then state concerns.

In compliance with its most sacred duty, the government has ordered a general election, both for the national congress and for the States, to take place as soon as possible. The fullest liberty is allowed by the government in all these elections; there is no trammel put upon word or writ.

Orders have been issued for the organization of courts of justice and the just administration of the laws. With the intention of serving individual interests, the decisions of judges who had no authority under the usurper have been confirmed.

Institutions of learning and charity have been attended to, with the solicitude that such important things deserve.

The government has granted protection and all possible privileges to enterprises that might be useful to commerce, manufactures, and other sources of public wealth.

Besides regulating financial affairs, and attending to the public debt, with a due regard to economy, avoiding the old system so ruinous to public credit, the government has duly attended to the civil list and redeemed many of its bonds.

The army has been reduced to a peace footing, and as those soldiers and officers who served against the foreigners have chiefly been retained, they will surely be the true defenders of liberty and law.

So far as its revenue would allow, the government has paid off those of its faithful servants who have returned to their families and their domestic duties; and pensions and honors have been awarded to those who have particularly deserved such a testimony of national gratitude.

The consequence of European intervention in favor of monarchy is, that Mexico now has friendly relations only with the republics of America, having similar institutions. During our struggle, those republics evinced their sympathies for the cause of independence and the liberty of Mexico.

The people and governments of some of the South American republics exhibited special demonstrations of friendship for the cause of Mexico and its government. Bolivia recently sent a special envoy to felicitate the republic on its triumph.

The United States of America continued their friendship for us during the whole period of our long and bitter struggle. The constant sympathy of the people of the United States, and the moral support given by their government to our cause, justly deserve the sympathy and regard of the people and government of Mexico.

The intervention broke up our relations with the European powers. By a convention in London, three of them declared war against the republic. Two of them soon withdrew, and France was left alone, as actively hostile to us. The others, however, soon recognized the monarchy established by the French, and thus became our moral enemies because they did not declare neutrality. In that manner many of the European governments violated their treaties with the republic, and broke off their friendly relations with us.

The conduct of the government of this republic towards those nations must be regulated by those discourteous acts. We asked nothing of them, and we have been careful not to give them cause of offense; and even now we offer them an occasion to renew their treaties with us for the general benefit of commerce.

The government has also taken care that the subjects of those nations, residing in this republic, shall be protected by its laws, and justly dealt with by its officials; and the protection has been such that we hear of no cause of complaint. Thus it is practically demonstrated that the enlightened principles of our institutions and the civilization of our people offer foreigners in Mexico all the security its own people enjoy, without the necessity of special treaties.

Public opinion has lately been occupied by the proposals of sundry amendments to the constitution, made in the convention of the 14th of August last. No objection has been made to the proposed amendments, but the manner in which they should be made is warmly discussed. Though many failed to vote on the proposed reforms, the majority favored them. The opinion of the government was freely expressed in the convention. Its express conviction was, that amendments, in ordinary times, should only be made in accordance with the provisions of the constitution itself, and that the present appeal to the people by proclamation should not serve as a precedent in future, under any circumstances; yet the government considers proper at this time, owing to the grievous trials through which the republic has just passed.

The result of the vote is not exactly known, but so many votes have been cast for the proposed reform that the question ought to be taken into due consideration. The government thinks it would not be proper to call another election because of the delay it would give to necessary reforms, and it suggests that the decision of the subject be left to the present congress.

By the law of the 27th of May, 1863, the power of the chief executive was continued for thirty days after the meeting of congress, or it was to end as soon as the war with France was concluded. Mexico could not say when the war was at an end, although hostilities had ceased, for France had brought on the war, and had not announced its close.

Thus, according to law, the presidential term of office must continue for thirty days from this date; yet I think it best to declare, as I now solemnly do, that I will not claim this continuation of my executive powers. If any emergency should arise requiring additional support to the government, I am sure the patriotic representatives of the people will render that aid and assistance by adopting measures dictated by their acknowledged prudence and profound wisdom.

I am pleased, citizen deputies, to return to you the plenary powers you had the confidence to bestow upon me in my very responsible position. If I have erred in the use of them, I ask your forgiveness, with the excuse that in all my acts my only motive has been the good of the nation and the salvation of our beloved country.

Article 2 of the above-mentioned law limits the power of concluding treaties. In view of this, the government has carefully refrained from compromising the republic by any treaty, convention, or engagement with any other nation.

In conclusion, I beg you, citizen deputies, to accept my best wishes for complete harmony in your deliberations, and my hope that your enlightenment and patriotism may be a blessing to the republic.

Reply of Speaker Montez to the foregoing address.

CITIZEN PRESIDENT: The nation this day resumes the constitutional exercise of one of the most precious attributes of its sovereignty—the power of legislating through its representatives. This blessing is due to the heroic constancy of her brave sons in the glorious contest, of five years' duration, against the foreign invaders, and to the justice of that greatest of modern nations and best friend of Mexico, the United States of America. Yes, in the United States they are continuing a work worthy of the great father of American independence, the founder of republicanism on the continent of Columbus—the venerable and immortal Washington. The republic of Mexico will always reckon among its best friends the statesmen that directed the American policy during the period of our crisis. The principle of non-intervention, faithfully observed by the oldest of the republics of this continent, the only ally of Mexico, has proved the salvation of our country.

A prince from one of the most civilized, powerful, and war-like nations of Europe resolved to destroy the Mexican republic and elevate a throne upon its ruins. To do this, he used the most flagitious means—violation of public faith and the assassination of prisoners of war. The preliminaries of Soledad, on the 19th of February; the note of the French commissioners of the 9th of April, 1862; the return of the French army to Orizaba on the 20th of the same month, without surrendering Paso Ancho; and the circular of Marshal Bazaine of the 9th October, 1865, will be lasting monuments of our justice and of the perfidy of our enemies. Yet the republic is alive; and on to-day, as on the 12th of April, 1862, it says to the world, friendly Frenchmen residing in the country are protected by the laws and by the Mexican authorities. (See the law of the 12th of April, 1862.)

It would be unjust to blame the French for the act of their chief. The independent press and free tribunals have done us justice; the impartial speeches of Berryer, Picard, Thiers, and Jules Favre, are evidences of a rational policy that will acknowledge our rights and give satisfaction for our wrongs.

It is pleasant to know that the government has cultivated the friendly relations that existed between Mexico and the United States, and it is no less gratifying to learn that all our sister republics of South America have offered us constant evidences of sympathy in the days of our misfortune, and now seek to renew friendly relations with our republic.

Mexico will not refuse her friendship and commerce to any nation on the globe, but Mexico will not beg diplomatic intercourse with any nation in existence; she has demonstrated to the world that she can defend her sovereign rights against the most powerful enemy, and will beg no foreign government to acknowledge her existence as an independent nation.

The internal affairs of the republic are not yet perfectly arranged, but organization has advanced as rapidly as could be expected. The cities of Puebla, Queretaro, Merida, Mexico, and Vera Cruz have returned to the legitimate government, and have been occupied by the republican army, after long and tedious sieges. An army of only sixty thousand men has preserved peace in the republic for the last six months.

It is not strange that we hear of some outrages that the government has not been able to suppress; but now that its authority is acknowledged in every part of the national territory, security of person and property will soon be felt in every portion of the country. The executive may depend upon the support of congress in securing protection to persons and property. In order to assure peace, it was the painful necessity of the government to be more severe in June than it has been since that time; but the Latin maxim, salus populi suprema lex est, must not be forgotten. The usurper gave frequent proofs of his contempt for the people's will, in the formation of their government. He well knew that not one of them favored intervention. He subjected them by the bayonet, and knew they would return to the republic as soon as the French troops were withdrawn; and yet he persisted in styling himself the Emperor of Mexico. So long, therefore, as he lived, the republic could not be tranquil; the sacrifice of his life was our peace. The assassinations at Tacubaya, in 1859, demanded the execution of those who perished with the chief of the rebels.

Five months have not passed since the government returned to the capital, and yet its constitutional authorities are established in many states. To-day the national congress opens the first term of its regular sessions, and the two other departments of the general government will soon be organized and put in complete operation. The diligent solicitude of the government to restore constitutional order is very apparent.

Relieved from the cares of war, the government can now devote its whole attention to the different branches of the public service. The administration of justice, reforms in the army, and in the collection of the revenue have already been considered by proper laws and regulations; and it is a satisfaction to know that the treasury notes have a ready circulation, thus removing one of the chief causes of public calamity.

The sovereignty of Mexico is exercised by its people through the general government, so far as the constitution allows. The President of the republic has the right to propose laws, and his proposals of reform are legal in the proposal; the legislator is to decide upon their acceptance.

Congress hears with pleasure that the chief executive restores the powers conferred upon him by the laws of the 11th of December, 1861; 3d of May and 27th of October, 1862; and 27th of May, 1863; for it is declaring to the monarchs of Europe who have calumniated our government, that this republic can maintain its sovereignty in peace. Where, in Europe, do we hear of a sovereign deposing his powers into the hands of the people, from whom they ought to be derived?

I am sure the executive power will attend to the duties with which he was charged by the laws of the 27th of October, 1862, and the 27th of May, 1863, and that he will render to congress a just account of what he has done, in conformity with the provisions of those acts; after that the legislative power will determine what extra recompense shall be awarded to the national army for its courage in this second war of independence; and I believe I give a faithful interpretation of the sentiments of congress when I say it is pleased with the conduct of General Garcia, Riva Palacio, Regules, Corona, Escobedo, and Porfirio Diaz, who never despaired of the salvation of the republic, but continued to struggle against the invader and his allies; and at this time they are examples of fidelity to our free institutions and models of obedience to the President of this republic. They have perfectly understood, just as congress understands, that obedience to the laws and the preservation of public peace ought to be the constant care and anxious solicitude of all public functionaries.

The convention of 1857 called the blessing of God upon the constitution about to be formed at that time, and which fundamental code yet directs us in our rule; let us once more invoke a Divine blessing upon the recommencement of our constitutional labors. May the Almighty Creator and Preserver of the human race, He who directs legislators in the just ways of government, condescend to hear your prayers and ours, and guide us in our deliberations, so that all our acts may be for the good of the republic.

As true representatives of the people we are assembled to promote, sincerely and ardently, the consolidation of public peace, pledged to a faithful observance of the laws and respect to property and persons, and, above all, to the preservation of the sovereignty and independence of Mexico.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

No. 44.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 12, 1867.

SIR: In dispatch No. 32, of the 9th ultimo, I called the attention of the department to a decree recently issued by this government establishing what is termed a protective duty upon foreign flour.

I also mentioned that the duty so established consisted of a specific duty, fixed according to the value of flour in the United States and of certain "additional duties," charged under that name, upon the amount of the direct duties imposed.

As this system of additional duties is one probably not well understood in the United States, and as it is a system which the decrees herein referred to give reason to apprehend it is the intention of this government to adhere to, some remarks regarding it may not be out of place.

The tariff of 1856, which, as I stated in the dispatch referred to, is, in general, still in force, established certain direct duties upon all foreign effects, as specified in the schedule named therein, imported into the republic.

These duties were made payable, one-half in forty days, and one-half in eighty days, counting from the day following the conclusion of the discharge of the vessel. Of each payment, one-half was to be made at the ports, and the other at the capital of the republic.

In addition to the foregoing direct duties, there were established what were termed "additional duties." These were five in number, and were as follows:

1. A municipal duty of twelve and one-half cents upon each package of two hundred pounds, to be collected by the maritime custom-houses and kept in a separate account, and designed for the use of the municipalities of the ports, as might be directed by the government.

2. A duty of public improvements of twenty per cent. upon the amount of the duties of importation, to be applied to the payment of interest upon capital raised for the construction of railroads, as might be specially assigned by the government.

3. A duty of internacion, or inland duty, consisting of ten per cent. upon the amount of the duties of importation, and to be paid on the departure of effects from the ports or frontier custom-houses for places in the interior.

4. A duty of counter register, consisting of twenty per cent. upon the amount of the duties of importation, and payable upon the arrival of effects at the capital or principal point of destination in the interior.

5. A duty of amortizacion, or sinking fund of the public debt, consisting of twenty-five per cent. upon the amount of the duties of importation, and payable at the general treasury of the nation in bonds of the public debt.

There was also imposed, by article five of the same tariff, upon all effects embraced in the free list, (which includes coal, quicksilver, railroad iron, machinery, salt, &c.) a municipal duty of twenty-five cents on every two hundred pounds weight of such effects, payable one-half at the ports, and one-half at the place of final destination in the interior.

Since that period these several and numerous additional duties have been varied from time to time, and either changed in character or the total amount increased or diminished by various special decrees. This has been done to such an extent that the merchants, and even the government officials, are often in doubt as to what is the total amount of the duties actually in force. This fact is well illustrated by the circumstance that, when writing the dispatch to which I referred at the opening of this communication, I applied to the chief officer of the section in the treasury department from which the decree in question had emanated, to learn what the total amount of the additional duties now in force actually was, and after sending specially to the custom-house to have a liquidation made, being in doubt himself, he informed me by note that the amount was sixty-eight and one-half per cent., and I so made the calculations given in that dispatch. Yet, a few days afterwards, and when my communication had already gone, I received another note from the same gentleman advising me that a mistake had been made, and that, as the duty of counter register had been augmented by a federal contribution of five per cent., the additional duties now amounted to seventy-three and one-half per cent., instead of sixty-eight and one-half per cent., as he had before informed me.

The calculations I made in dispatch No. 32 are, therefore, too low by five per cent. Since the date of that dispatch, also, the additional duties have been still further modified by three several decrees upon subjects not directly pertinent to the tariff, which have been issued by this government.

One is a decree, issued under date of the 19th ultimo, which, while it establishes a much-needed reform in the abolition of the old Spanish system of tolls on all the highways of the republic, yet perpetuates the system of additional duties, and of treating subjects pertaining exclusively to the tariff in special decrees having no direct connection therewith, by imposing, to supply the place of the revenue from tolls abolished, a new duty upon all foreign effects introduced by the maritime or frontier custom-houses of the republic of one dollar for every two hundred pounds weight of such effects; and this duty is to be applied also to such articles as machinery, agricultural implements, &c., that have heretofore been free of duty, except the twenty-five cents per two hundred pounds before mentioned, as imposed by article five of the tariff.

This new decree, therefore, increases the duty upon flour from the United States by a further amount of $1 per barrel, which is to take effect from the 1st of January next.

The second decree to which I refer as affecting the existing tariff rates is the concession revalidating the rights of the railroad company from this city to Vera Cruz, which appeared under date of the 27th ultimo, and is issued in the form of a general law.

By this decree the additional duty of public improvements, of twenty per cent., is to be payable hereafter, not in money, as heretofore, but in a public paper which is to be emitted for that purpose by the department of Fomento, and is to be sold by agents of the railroad company in all the ports and in the capital of the republic, to a sufficient extent to secure to the company the receipt of an annual subvention of $560,000 for twenty five years. The merchants, therefore, will now have to buy this paper before they can make the settlement of their duties.

By article 40 of the same decree there is also a further provision made by which, until the 31st of December, 1871, or an earlier period if the railroad is sooner completed, the duty of amortizacion (sinking fund) of the public debt is reduced from twenty-five per cent. to fifteen per cent., and is made payable, not in bonds of the public debt, as heretofore, but in shares of stock in the railroad from this city to Vera Cruz. The foreign importer, therefore, before he can adjust this portion of his duties, has to search for and purchase shares of stock in a railroad company and to pay such percentage of his duties with said shares, rather than in bonds of the public debt or in money.

The duty of amortizacion, as heretofore payable in bonds of the public debt, really amounted to but some two and one-half per cent., for the bonds could be purchased at from seven to ten cents on the dollar, while, as now made payable, in the shares of the railroad company, it will amount to the full rate of fifteen per cent.

The third decree was issued under date of the 28th ultimo, and establishes a special tariff of duties, which are to be collected by the federal custom-house at this city for the benefit of the municipality. These duties, besides certain specific rates, as $4 50 per barrel on cider, $2 25 per barrel on vinegar, &c., consist of 40 cents on every two hundred pounds of foreign groceries and 75 cents per two hundred pounds on all other foreign effects, except machinery, which is to pay 20 cents per two hundred pounds. This decree, therefore, not only establishes a further additional duty, but appears to look to a continuance of the system of interior custom-houses.

It is easy to see that with this complicated system of different duties, and the changes that are so frequently made, and as, for instance, in the decree establishing the new rates of duties on foreign flour, sometimes without any previous notice, that commerce with this country must labor under very great disadvantages and uncertainties, and that the most beneficial part of trade—numerous shipments in small amounts—must be entirely shut out. If I find it difficult myself, when on the spot, to ascertain what the fixed amount of the duties that have to be paid actually is, how can a merchant or small shipper abroad, who thinks of making a venture to this country, make any calculation as to what he has got to pay, and whether the adventure will be desirable or not. On the contrary, the moment he comes to investigate what the charges will be he finds himself involved in an uncertainty so great that the idea of making a shipment to Mexico is at once abandoned. The result is seen in the fact that the foreign commerce now carried on remains in the hands of comparatively a few, who dedicate themselves, as to an intricate profession, to a study of the manner and means of getting merchandise from abroad into the interior of this country, and accessible to consumers.

As the liquidation of the duties has now to be effected part at the ports and part in the interior, merchandise is followed from the ports with custom-house passes and inspection, and, arriving in the interior, as at this place, has to undergo for the second time custom-house formalities, and again, for a third time, when passing from this point, or any other central market, to the interior states.

A merchant in this city, desiring to send goods from his own warehouse to a customer in the interior, has to go through all the custom-house formalities attending the shipment of goods to a foreign country. These trammels, while embarrassing and costly in the extreme to foreign commerce, also rest a heavy burden upon the consumption of the country, by which, in the end, all charges have to be borne.

Since commencing to write this communication, I addressed a note to the chief clerk of the treasury department, asking him for a statement of the present number and denomination, as well as amount, of the different additional duties now in force, and have received from him a reply, in which he incloses to me the following list as showing the various duties that have now to be paid upon foreign merchandise imported into the republic, viz :

1st. Important duties according to the tariff.

2d. Internacion, or inland duty, ten per cent. upon the foregoing.

3d. Public improvements, twenty per cent. upon the same.

4th. Railroad, fifteen per cent. upon the same.

5th. Counter register, twenty per cent. upon the same.

6th. Municipal, for Vera Cruz and Tampico, three and one-half per cent. upon the same.

7th. Municipal, at the other custom-houses, twelve and one-half cents per package, and the other duties annexed to this as beneficencia, hospital, &c.

8th. Federal contribution of twenty-five per cent. upon the duty of counter-register.

This statement should be considered as final and conclusive, as it emanates from the chief clerk of the treasury department, but it does not include two local duties of eight per cent. and of twelve per cent. made by the summing up of several local charges, which I am informed merchandise arriving in this city has to pay before it can reach the warehouse of the merchant and pass thence to customers in the interior. The total of the additional duties upon merchandise coming to this city would therefore appear to be ninety-three and one-half per cent. upon the amount of the duties of importation.

In order that commerce with this country may be placed upon that footing of liberality which it may properly claim, it is very evident that some reforms in the Mexican customs system which will unify and simplify it, and render it everywhere equally applicable throughout the republic, are vitally necessary, and without such changes it would appear to be very difficult for a healthy or enlarged commerce to be established. Such modifications would unquestionably be as much for the benefit of Mexican consumers as of foreign shippers, inasmuch as by generalizing and simplifying commercial intercourse trade is not only increased but consumers are supplied at lower rates; while at the same time the national revenue of the country, which so encourages commerce, is largely augmented over the amount realized while pursuing the opposite policy.

The first necessity, in my judgment, for the increase of commercial intercourse with this country, now that a period of peace has arrived, is the simplification and unification of its customs regulations. It is not so much what rate of duties may be imposed, for this burden will fall eventually upon the consumer, as it is that the duties should be fixed in one precise sum, be everywhere equally applicable, and that the liquidation be made once for all at the port or frontier custom-house of entry, and merchandise then be allowed to move freely into the interior of the republic, instead of being followed by passes and permits, and custom-house inspection, as now.

The moment when commerce between the United States and this country should be built up appears to have arrived; but unless the Mexican government can be induced to adopt some such changes in its customs regulations as those that have been indicated, the existing trammels are so vexatious and the embarrassments so numerous, that there would appear to be great danger that they will constitute an almost impassable barrier to any extensive or satisfactory commercial intercourse.

This must be evident, I think, from the analysis of certain features of the present regulations that I have made in this communication.

What the amount of duty to be paid shall be is a question that every country has a right to adjust according to the exigencies of its financial position, under a wise regard, it is to be trusted, as to what rates will prove most beneficial in all respects; but it is surely a proper subject of friendly international solicitude that unnecessary formalities not sanctioned by the commercial customs of the present day shall be removed and legitimate commercial intercourse be facilitated.

Certainly our immediate neighborhood and a common commercial interest, that should tend to strengthen the ties of peace between the two countries, makes this subject one of interest to the people of the United States.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 12, 1867.

SIR: As all measures adopted by this government initiating valuable reforms will undoubtedly be viewed with interest by the department, and as it is my duty to communicate such new laws as affect in any way our commerce with this country, I transmit herewith copy and translation of a decree issued under date of the 19th ultimo, which is of some importance in both particulars.

The object of the decree is the abolition of the system of national tolls upon all the highways of the republic, which has been continued in existence from the time of the vice-royalty. These tolls, from their excessive amount and the vexations of their collection, and latterly the state of abandonment into which the roads have fallen, have become a heavy burden upon the industrial movement of the country, and their suppression, which is to go into effect on the 1st of February of the coming year, will be hailed with great satisfaction.

The theory of the decree is twofold: first, the entire removal of the system of tolls; and, secondly, the providing of some other means of raising the funds necessary for the construction and preservation of the public roads.

For this latter purpose provision is made from four sources, viz:

1st. A tax of fifty cents per thousand on the value of all rural property.

2d. A tax of fifty cents per thousand on the value of mills and manufactories.

3d. A tax upon stages used for the conveyance of passengers of one cent per kilometer for the distance run.

4th. A duty of one dollar for every two hundred pounds weight upon all foreign effects introduced into the republic, special mention being made that this duty is to include machinery, agricultural implements, &c., that have heretofore been free.

A slight analysis will show where it is intended the burden of the future maintenance of the public highways of the republic shall rest.

The tax upon rural property, it will be seen, is so low that a farm of the value of ten thousand dollars, and which perhaps is now without the means of communication, will have to pay for this object of such vital importance for the disposition of its products, only the sum of five dollars per annum; and a mill or manufactory of the value of one hundred thousand dollars will pay but fifty dollars per annum.

But upon foreign commerce the duty which is now laid for this purpose, in addition to those previously existing, amounts to ten dollars upon every ton of merchandise or of machinery, and to a dollar per barrel upon flour, and so a dollar for every two hundred pounds weight of all foreign effects introduced into the republic.

The purpose of the decree in this respect is not left in doubt, for in the preamble the unsound principle is asserted that it is foreign commerce that makes the most use of the roads, and it is stated, therefore that commerce should chiefly furnish the funds for their construction and repair.

While ready to applaud all measures of practical reform, the interests of our commerce with this country compel me to call your attention to this feature of the present decree.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF FOMENTO, COLONIZATION, INDUSTRY, AND COMMERCE.—SECTION 3.

The citizen President of the republic has addressed to me the following decree:

Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known, that—

Considering that the impost known under the name of “peajes,” (tolls on the public highways,) is the cause, to those who are subject to it, of detention and injury, which weighs particularly on the poorer class of the population;

Considering that it is desirable to adjust, as early as possible, the collection of taxes in such a manner as to facilitate the future establishment of the complete liberty of interior commerce;

Considering, finally, that the effects which, by this law, are to be taxed, are those which really make the most use of the roads, and should, therefore, supply the means for their repair;

I have thought proper, in use of the faculties with which I am invested, to decree as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The tax known under the name of “peajes,” (road tolls,) is abolished in all the republic.

ARR. 2. To provide means for the opening and repairing of roads, the following taxes are established:

1. Fifty cents per annum per thousand on the value of rural property in the republic, payable every four months in advance.

2. Fifty cents per annum per thousand on the value of all manufactories and mills, payable also every four months in advance.

3. A duty of one dollar on every two hundred pounds upon all foreign effects introduced at the maritime or frontier custom-houses of the republic.

4. Enterprises of carriages for the transportation of passengers shall pay one cent for each kilometer of road over which their carriages run. This payment shall be made at the end of every month, computing the distance run by the number of trips each carriage has made during the month.

ARR. 3. The collection of the taxes imposed by this law on rural property, manufactories and mills, shall be made by the respective chief treasury officers, and in the federal district by the office of direct contributions.

ARR. 4. The collection of the duty upon foreign effects shall be made also upon machinery and other objects heretofore excepted from duty by law, and such exemption shall hereafter be enjoyed only by such objects as are included in the special privileges heretofore given, or that may hereafter be conceded. Such collection shall be made by the collectors of the maritime and frontier custom-houses, who shall place the funds so received at the disposal of the department of fomento, without the right, in any case, of diverting them from the use to which they are destined.

ARR. 5. The department of fomento is authorized to change, when it shall be deemed necessary, the manner of collecting the imposts herein referred to.

ARR. 6. The product of these imposts shall remain exclusively destined to the construction of the roads.

ARR. 7. The imposts established by this law shall commence to be collected from the 1st of January, 1868.

Transitory article.—In order that the department of fomento shall not be without the necessary funds for the repairing of the roads, the collection of the tolls heretofore established shall continue until the last day of January, 1868.

Wherefore, I order that the same be printed, published, and circulated, and that due compliance be given to it.

Palace of the national government in Mexico, the 19th of November, 1867.

BENITO JUAREZ.

To the citizen BLAS BALCARCEL,

Minister of Fomento, Colonization, Industry, and Commerce.

And I communicate the same to you for your intelligence and the consequent ends. Independence and liberty! Mexico, November 19, 1867.

BALCARCEL.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 12, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy and translation of an important decree issued by this government, under date of the 27th ultimo, establishing the decimal system of coinage.

The monetary unit of the Mexican Republic, under this decree, is to remain as heretofore, the silver dollar, with the same fineness and weight that it now has.

The subdivisions of the dollar are to be coins of fifty cents, twenty-five cents, ten cents, and five cents. The coin of one cent is to be of copper, or an alloy of that metal. The gold coins are to be pieces of twenty dollars, ten dollars, five dollars, two dollars and fifty cents, and one dollar.

The weight, diameter, and fineness of the coins is established according to the metrical decimal system, and after ninety days from the date of the publication of the decree, it is to be obligatory upon all assayers throughout the republic to mark the fineness of gold and silver in thousandths instead of the Spanish terms of "dineras," "quilates," and "granos," heretofore in use.

From the 15th of September, 1868, the circulation of money of the so-called imperial coinage, and of twelve and a half and six and a quarter cent pieces is to be abolished.

The early attention to so important a reform as that effected by this decree reflects great credit upon this government.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF FOMENTO, COLONIZATION, INDUSTRY, AND COMMERCE.—SECTION 1.

The citizen President of the republic has been pleased to address to me the following decree:

Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same be it known: That in use of the ample faculties with which I am invested, and considering the necessity that exists of reforming the national coin, and of establishing a uniformity in the subdivisions of the same, for the benefit of all classes of our society, and the greater facility and simplicity of commercial transactions; considering that the simultaneous and authorized use of coin of the old system and of the decimal, besides being embarrassing, is contrary to the principles of administration generally accepted, and is also the cause of difficulties and of losses to the larger portion of citizens who form the laboring part of our population; considering that the copper money coined in the States, on account of the exceptional circumstances, does not fully meet the necessary conditions, and that its lack of uniformity restricts its circulation within very narrow limits, thus causing great inconvenience to the development of commerce; considering that the actual type of our coin is imperfect in its artistic part and is susceptible of the improvement and perfection that has been attained by the arts in our country; considering, finally, that the present is an opportune moment to put in practice the prescriptions of the law which determined the establishment of the decimal system in the republic, without making any essential alteration in the value of the monetary unit of Mexico, generally known and appreciated in the world, I have thought proper to decree as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The monetary unit of the Mexican Republic shall be as heretofore, the silver dollar with the same fineness and the same weight that it now has.

ART. 2. The silver dollar shall be divided into two pieces of fifty cents, four of twenty-five cents, ten of ten cents, and twenty of five cents. The one cent piece shall be of copper, or a special alloy in which said metal shall predominate.

ART. 3. The coinage of gold shall be pieces of twenty dollars, of ten dollars, of five dollars, of two dollars and fifty cents, and of one dollar.

ART. 4. The fineness of all coins of silver shall be 902 $\frac{1}{1000}$, (10 dineras 20 grains,) and of all coins of gold 875 thousandths, (21 carats.)

ART. 5. The dollar of silver shall weigh 27 grams 73 milligrams; that of the piece of fifty cents, 13 grams 536 milligrams; that of the piece of twenty-five cents, 6 grams 768 milligrams; that of the piece of ten cents, 2 grams 707 milligrams; that of the piece of five cents, 1 gram 353 milligrams. The weight of the gold coin of twenty dollars shall be 33 grams 841 milligrams; that of the piece of ten dollars, 16 grams 920 milligrams; that of the piece of five dollars, 8 grams 460 milligrams; that of the piece of two dollars and fifty cents, 4 grams 230 milligrams; and that of the piece of one dollar, 1 gram 692 milligrams.

ART. 6. The diameter of the dollar of silver shall be 37 millimeters; that of the piece of fifty cents, 30 millimeters; that of the piece of twenty-five cents, 25 millimeters; that of the piece of ten cents, 17 millimeters; that of the piece of five cents, 14 millimeters.

The diameter of the gold coins shall be adjusted according to the following dimensions: The piece of twenty dollars, 34 millimeters; the piece of ten dollars, 27 millimeters; the piece of five dollars, 22 millimeters; the piece of two dollars and fifty cents, 18 millimeters; the piece of one dollar, 15 millimeters. The piece of one cent will have 25 millimeters of diameter, if of copper, or 20 millimeters if made of a special alloy.

ART. 7. Each piece of money shall bear, clearly stamped upon it, its respective value; the initials of the name of the government assayer, the place and year of its coinage, and also marked upon it the fineness, when of silver or of gold.

ART. 8. The cent shall be made of copper or a special metallic compound in which copper shall predominate in such proportion as shall be fixed by the department of fomento.

ART. 9. The range or difference permitted in the fineness of the precious metals shall not exceed three thousandths for silver and two thousandths for gold; but this difference shall only be admitted in certain exceptional cases and not as a general rule, in the coinage.

ART. 10. Ninety days after the publication of this law in this capital, it will be obligatory upon all the assayers of the republic to mark in thousandths the fineness of silver and of gold, whether these metals are separated or mixed. The terms "dineras," "quelates," and "granos," heretofore used to designate the purity of said metals and their alloys, being abolished, the expression of the fineness will hereafter be carried to tens of thousandths.

ART. 11. In order that the preceding article shall be carried into full effect, the corresponding decimal weights shall be ordered to be made by the department of fomento, and shall be sent to all the assay offices and mints of the republic.

ART. 12. For the preparation of the new molds for the national coin, in conformity with the reforms now decreed, and in order to improve and perfect the actual type, a meeting shall be called of all the Mexican engravers, and of foreigners, in order that they may present their models, which shall be submitted to the decision of a special jury, appointed and presided over by the minister of fomento, under such regulations as shall be prescribed in the call therefor.

ART. 13. On the 15th of September, 1863, the circulation of the so-called imperial coins shall be abolished; as also that of the denominated "reales" and "medios," and such of the copper coin as is not in conformity with the new system. The department of hacienda is authorized to issue the necessary orders for the redemption of said coin.

Wherefore, I order that it be printed, published and circulated, in order that it may be duly complied with.

Palace of the national government in Mexico, the 27th of November, 1867.

BENITO JUAREZ.

To the Citizen BLAS BALCARCEL,
Minister of Fomento, Industry and Commerce.

And I communicate the same to you for your intelligence and the consequent ends. Independence and liberty! Mexico, November 28, 1867.

BALCARCEL.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 13, 1867.

SIR: The importance to commerce with this country of the early completion of the railroad from Vera Cruz to this city, may render it proper that I should transmit to the department a copy of the decree issued by this government on the 27th ultimo, revalidating the rights of the company engaged in the construction of that work, which, it was alleged, had been impaired by dealings with the late so-called imperial authorities.

The commencement of the construction of this important work dates many years back, as in 1854, when I first visited this country, ten miles of the road, from Vera Cruz, had been completed by the government. In 1855, Santa Anna being then in power, a concession for the construction of the road was made to parties who soon after transferred their rights, with the consent of the government, to a Mexican capitalist, to whom, on the 31st of August, 1857, a new concession was made by the government of President Comonfort.

On the 5th of April, 1861, the rebellion of Zuloaga and Miramon having intervened, a new concession was made to the same party by the government of President Juarez, and the construction of the work was actively commenced. The intervention then occurred and the work was suspended.

In 1864 the grantee transferred his rights to a company formed in England. The concession containing a requirement that the consent of the government must be obtained to any transfer of the same, application was made for that purpose to the so-called Maximilian authorities, and in January, 1865, such approval was procured, and a new concession, modifying in some particulars the old, was accepted from the said so-called authorities by the parties interested.

Under this the work was resumed and prosecuted, until, at the termination of the intervention, forty-seven miles out from Vera Cruz, and eighty-six miles from this city, had been completed, and some considerable portion of the intermediate superstructure, leaving only one hundred and twenty-eight miles, or less than half of the distance from Vera Cruz to this capital to be completed.

Under these circumstances the parties interested have applied to this government for a new concession, or revalidation of the previous franchises, which has been obtained in the decree now issued. The terms of this decree are liberal in the extreme, but the measure has the greatest public importance in showing that capital invested in the vitally important work of railroad building in this country will be respected under all of the changes of government that can possibly occur.

Being without rivers this country must have railroads; its magnificent resources cannot be developed until such means of communication are provided, and no one necessity of the country is more palpable than this. It must be equally evident that nowhere can the enterprise, the energy and the capacity for their construction, be so properly or desirably looked for, as in the United States, where the achievements in this line, and the wonderful progress of our great national work to the Pacific, are extorting the admiration of the world.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 13, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the Diario Oficial of the 4th instant, containing a decree issued by this government, establishing what is termed a municipal fund for this city.

By the terms of this decree, it appears that the old system of interior custom-houses is to be perpetuated, as a distinct tariff upon national and foreign effects is established for this city, the duties under which are to be collected by the federal custom-house of this capital for the benefit of the municipality.

Besides the objectionable feature, also, of the further additional duty which this decree creates, the duties levied are very high, for after having paid the duty of importation and all the various additional duties that foreign effects are subjected to, for account of the federal government, before reaching this city, they have now to pay, simply as a municipal charge, fifty cents a case on wine, beer, and spirits; two dollars and twenty-five cents per barrel on vinegar; four dollars and a half per barrel on wine, ale, and cider; forty cents per two hundred pounds on foreign groceries, and seventy-five cents per two hundred pounds on all other foreign effects except machinery, which is to pay twenty cents on every two hundred pounds.

With these multiplied and successive charges, and the requirement of such repeated custom house formalities, it would appear as if commerce was regarded as an enemy to be watched, and mistrusted, and restricted, rather than as a welcome friend whose presence scatters only mutual benefits.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 16, 1867.

SIR: Upon the return of the national government to this capital, in July last, it was understood, though not officially announced, that it would decline to hold any intercourse with the agents of the powers who had recognized the so-called government of Maximilian.

On the part of the diplomatic representatives of course no intercourse was attempted. Some of the consuls, however, held their exequaturs from a period dating very far back. This was the case with the British consul, Mr. Glennie, who was appointed on the 2d of November, 1853, and whose exequatur was issued by Santa Anna, who was then in power, on the 4th of February, 1854. Under this exequatur he had continued to exercise his functions as consul during all the different changes of government that had occurred.

In August last, however, the question being raised, in the case of an intestate estate in his charge, which was in court, as to whether he was now recognized as in the exercise of such functions, he addressed a note to Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, who replied that he was not so recognized, as this government had decided not to recognize any representatives of any power that had been in relations with the so-called government of Maximilian.

This correspondence was sent to England in September, and instructions have now been returned, which reached here on the 7th instant, for the withdrawal of the members of the late legation and the consul, together with the archives of the legation and the consulate.

When Mr. Scarlett, who was accredited as British minister to Maximilian, left this country in November of last year, Mr. Middleton, secretary of the legation, remained as chargé d'affaires.

In April of the present year, in common with the other members of the diplomatic corps accredited to Maximilian, he terminated relations with that so-called government. Since then he has remained here with the members of his legation, while all the other European representatives have left the country; and it seemed to be the expectation that at no distant period relations might be reopened between England and the government of the republic.

I am enabled to transmit to you, herewith, the correspondence that has taken place on this occasion between Mr. Middleton and Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, as also that between Mr. Glennie and Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, in August last.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Middleton to Señor Lerdo de Tejada.

MEXICO, December 8, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I was last night placed in possession of the instructions of her Majesty's government to request you to have the goodness to furnish with passports myself and all such persons as are engaged in the service of her Majesty's late legation here, and also for her Majesty's consul and his family, for the purpose of leaving this republic by the port of Vera Cruz.

I have also the honor to inclose herewith a list of the names of the persons for whom this favor is solicited.

With respect to the motives which have induced her Majesty's government to remove the several members of her Majesty's late legation, as well as those employed in her Majesty's late consulate in this capital, as well as all archives and government property appertaining to the same, from this country, I have the honor to inform you, sir, that I have been ordered to make the present application for passports for myself, as well as the persons referred to, in consequence of the decision of the Mexican government to hold no intercourse with the agents of powers who recognized the government of the Emperor Maximilian. I am, at the same time, desired, upon my departure, formally to place under the protection of the Mexican government the persons and properties of British subjects, and to call upon the Mexican government, in fulfillment of the duty for which all states are responsible, to secure from injury at the hands of the public authorities all British subjects residing in or passing through their country, and to extend to them, as long as they are within the country, and to their properties, full justice in all their dealings.

So soon as I am able to complete the arrangements for my departure, and for the transport of the archives of her Majesty's legation, it will be my duty, in conformity with my instructions, to apply to you, sir, for the necessary escort for enabling me to reach Vera Cruz in safety.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest consideration, your most obedient, humble servant,

R. T. C. MIDDLETON.

Señor Don SEBASTIAN LERDO DE TEJADA, &c., &c., &c.

Señor Lerdo de Tejada to Mr. Middleton.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, December 11, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to send you the passports requested for yourself and company, in your note of the 8th instant. You say the reasons for such instructions from the government of her Britannic Majesty are because of the resolutions of the Mexican government not to have any communication with the agents of the powers that recognized the so-called government of the Archduke Maximilian.

The position of the government of Mexico, in relation to those powers, has been caused by no voluntary act of its chief; those powers decided to put an end to the friendly relations with the Mexican republic, by expelling it from the society of nations. The republic exists by the will of the Mexican people, and its government is ready to renew relations with all foreign powers, so soon as they will make proposals in just and proper terms.

The government will see that English subjects residing in Mexico are protected by the laws of the country. During the war there was no complaint in any part of the country subject to the authorities of the republic; and since the close of the foreign intervention the government has heard of no cause of complaint anywhere.

As it has always done, the government of the republic will comply with the precepts of the law of nations, and will see that its own laws are properly executed.

The escort you ask for will be furnished when you are ready to start.

With the greatest consideration, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
S. LERDO DE TEJADA.

Mr. R. T. C. MIDDLETON, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Glennie to Señor Lerdo de Tejada.

BRITISH CONSULATE, Mexico, August 27, 1867.

MR. MINISTER: By virtue of the commission granted me on the 2d of November, 1853, and its relative exequatur of the 4th of February, 1854, I have performed the duties of British consul since that time.

My son, Charles F. Glennie, was acting in my name when he was called by the courts of the country to take charge of the estate of Mr. Alexander Lafontaine, a British subject, deceased.

Again he was summoned in the same case by the judge of the sixth district, when I learned that the President of the republic refused to acknowledge me as British consul.

As it is my duty to protect my countrymen and attend to the estates of deceased and absent British subjects, in conformity with the laws of the republic, you will please inform me who is to discharge the duties of British consul in this city.

Your very obedient servant,

F. GLENNIE.

Mr. S. LERDO DE TEJADA,
Minister of Foreign Relations, &c., &c., &c.

Señor Lerdo de Tejada to Mr. Glennie.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, August 30, 1867.

SIR: In your communication of the 27th instant, relating to the property of an intestate British subject, you ask if the government of the republic refuses to recognize you as British consul.

You are hereby informed that the judge in the case mentioned was ordered by the department of justice not to allow you to intervene as consul.

This was done because the government of the republic had determined to have no official intercourse with any agent of the governments abroad that had acknowledged the usurper of foreign intervention.

I am, respectfully, your very obedient servant,

S. LERDO DE TEJADA.

SIR: I have received your dispatch No. 25, of the 26th ultimo, inclosing copy of a letter addressed to the department by Mr. E. J. More, from Allentown, Pennsylvania, asking interposition in behalf of Captain Krauseneck, represented to have faithfully served in the Union army during our late war, and who was supposed to be in confinement at Guajuato, having been made prisoner at Queretaro while in the service of Maximilian.

By the terms of the general-amnesty order of the 31st of October last, a copy of which was transmitted to the department with my dispatch No. 28, of the 4th ultimo, all foreign officers held as prisoners on account of service under Maximilian had their sentences commuted to banishment from the country. Under this order all such officers, or nearly all, have already left. I presume Captain Krauseneck is among the number. I will endeavor to make inquiry concerning him, and will promptly communicate any information that I may obtain to the department.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 26, 1867.

SIR: On the 19th instant the special committee of the Mexican congress, appointed to examine the votes of the electoral colleges for President of the republic and president of the supreme court, made their report, which was adopted.

Of the 10,380 votes cast by 180 electoral colleges for President, it is stated that 7,422 were given for Benito Juarez, 2,709 for Porfirio Diaz, 57 for Gonzalez Ortega, and the remainder (192) scattering.

A decree was, therefore, passed by congress declaring Benito Juarez constitutional President of the United Mexican States for the period terminating on the 30th of November, 1871, by reason of his having received an absolute majority of all the votes cast.

Of the 10,421 votes cast for president of the supreme court, (the Vice-President of the republic,) it is stated that 3,874 were cast for Sebastian Lerdo de Tejada, 2,541 for Porfirio Diaz, and the remainder (3,970) divided among a large number of other candidates. No candidate having an absolute majority of all the votes cast, the election fell to congress, and rested between the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes. The election then proceeded by states, twenty-three states voting by their delegations. Of these seventeen voted for Sebastian Lerdo de Tejada, and six for Porfirio Diaz.

A decree was thereupon passed by congress declaring Sebastian Lerdo de Tejada constitutional president of the supreme court of justice, by reason of his having obtained an absolute majority of the votes cast by the deputations of the states.

On the following day congress fixed the 25th instant as the day on which the president of the republic should take possession of his office under the new term of which he had been now declared to be elected.

Having received a formal invitation from the minister for foreign affairs, I was present at the ceremony of the inauguration, which took place yesterday in the hall of the national congress.

I have now the honor of inclosing herewith a copy of the Diario Ofi- cial, containing the address of President Jaurez, and the reply of the presiding officer of congress, delivered on that occasion.

It will be observed that in neither of the above addresses is any allusion made to foreign affairs. The tone of the addresses is moderate and practical, and inspires hope for the preservation of constitutional order in the future.

Mexico has now conquered the establishment of a republican form of government. The constitution of 1857, subject to such changes as may be made, in the manner it prescribes, it is settled is to be the supreme law of the land. The separation of state and church has been effected. The vast property of the latter has been nationalized and passed into private ownership.

All the power of France and the pledges and obligations of Maximilian have proved insufficient to reverse this action.

The three years' rebellion of 1858 to 1861 having been put down, defeated faction appealed to its last resort, foreign intervention. That has succumbed to an eternal verdict, so far as Europe is concerned.

Permanent peace, therefore, appears now to be within Mexico's reach, if she will be just to her national obligations abroad, and the government at home will resolutely and promptly repress any local attempts that may be made to disturb the public order.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Address of President Juarez.

CITIZEN DEPUTIES: The confidence of the people who have deigned to honor me with their votes imposes upon me new and sacred duties. With a loyal and patriotic determination to fulfill them, I have come to make before you the solemn protest prescribed by our fundamental code.

Scarcely had the conflict passed in which war had involved the republic, when it presented before the world the example of returning to enter upon the regular administration of its institutions. In order to proceed in conformity to those institutions, as well in the union as in the states, the people have freely made the election of all their public functionaries.

When the nation was in peril the national representatives decreed that the executive should be the depository of the most ample faculties. Then, as a necessary consequence of the circumstances, the observance of various precepts of the constitution was interrupted. Nevertheless, I endeavored always to act according to its spirit, in so far as was permitted by the inevitable exigencies of the war. Now that the happy triumph of the republic has permitted the full regimen of the constitution to be again established, I shall take care faithfully to guard it, and to cause it to be regarded, both from the duty imposed upon me by the confidence of the people and in conformity with my own convictions.

The faithful observance of the fundamental fact by the federal functionaries, and those of the states, will be the most efficacious means of consummating the reorganization of the republic. That important object will be attained, if always in conformity with the constitution the federal power respects the rights of the states, and the states respect the rights of the union. Without this, the primary basis for the consolidation of peace, which should be the chief aim of all our aspirations, will be wanting. All private rights, and all the interests of society depending upon the preservation of peace, the government should omit nothing for the jealous protection of the liberty and the guarantees of citizens faithful in their obedience to the laws, and for the energetic restraint of those who rebel against them, disturbing the public order.

During the years that I have been at the head of the government, in prosperous situations, as well as in those that have been adverse, it has been the sole object of all my acts to guard the interests of the people, and to procure the well being of my country.

I feel that all my gratitude is due to it, as I recognize that to be elected again I have had no other merit than the loyalty of my intentions.

It is one of the fundamental principles laid down in the constitution that all public power emanates from the people and is instituted for their benefit. As a son of the people I can never forget that my sole title is their will, and that my sole object should always be their highest good and prosperity.

In my administration, citizen deputies, your intelligence will be my guide, and my duty will be fulfilled in carrying out your decisions, in sustaining the dignity and the independence of the nation, and in making effective the principles of liberty and of progress which the Mexican people have conquered with their blood.

[Translation.]

Address of the Vice-President, D. Manuel Saavedra.

CITIZEN PRESIDENT: For many nations of the earth one sole independence has been sufficient to give birth to a full and free existence, and to enter upon the high road of progress towards well-being and prosperity.

Mexico has required the renewal thrice of her independence, in order to place herself securely in the road to that end: the independence from Spain, the independence from the clergy and the former army, and the independence from Europe.

With the efforts and blood of her faithful sons, Mexico has now consummated this triple independence, and has thus given incontestable proofs of a vigorous life, and that she has now placed herself on the road to a rapid prosperity. To reach this point she has had to tread a path of blood and of tears; she has passed through more than fifty years of sacrifices, of disenchantments, and of hard experience, but she will know how to improve these severe lessons of the past, and by the aid of her noble sons will assure a happy future.

You, citizen President, elected by the people, have been at their head and have acted an important part in two of these epochs, prominent in the life of the nation. They confided to you their liberties in 1857, and you saved them, securing their emancipation from the clergy, the army, and from retrogression.

They confided to you their banner in 1862, and you maintained it untarnished and aloft, presenting it to-day proud and triumphant.

The national representation complies now with a just and grateful duty in saluting you as the worthy standard-bearer of Mexico.

The Mexican people, in the full exercise now of their sovereignty, have again elected you their President, and intrust to you the final work of their happiness, the consolidation of public peace. Grave and difficult the task certainly is, but your constancy and patriotism, and the good sense of the nation, of which recent proofs have been given, give assurance that you will not despond in the undertaking, and that it will be realized. In this result the sovereign congress of the union will have a very important part. It realizes the magnitude of the work, and although it distrusts its capacity to properly fulfill its mission, it is at the same time animated by a feeling of patriotism, that noble sentiment which is the source of public good and of worthy actions, and it will not cease in its labors nor vacillate in the accomplishment of the object that it will hold constantly in view.

The installation of the federal powers proves that Mexico enters upon a constitutional regimen, and the situation in which the country now is shows that the sole problem to be solved in order to assure the public peace is that of a good administration.

The chief means to realize that end will be a respect for the law, and its most faithful and exact fulfillment. Let us direct all our efforts to that end, and if we attain that happy result we shall correspond to the great confidence that has been placed in us, will fulfill the high mission that has been intrusted to us, and will realize the hopes that are centered in us by our beloved country.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, January 11, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy and translation of a manifesto, addressed under date of the 8th instant, by the congress of Mexico to the Mexican people.

It will be observed that this manifesto reiterates, on the part of congress, the position taken by the Executive of the republic, in his address to that body at the formal opening of the session on the 8th of December, that all treaties are at an end between Mexico and those powers who recognized the so-called government of Maximilian.

I am reliably informed that in the discussion and adoption of the manifesto, which took place in secret session, and proceeded by paragraphs, an amendment was proposed more especially recognizing the aid Mexico has received, during her recent struggle, from the United States.

This amendment was strongly supported, I am told, by Mr. Montes, formerly minister for foreign affairs under President Comonfort, Mr. Mata, formerly minister to the United States, and Mr. Cañedo, a talented deputy from the state of Jalisco, but it failed to be carried.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Manifesto of the Mexican Congress.

[Translation.]

THE CONGRESS TO THE NATION :

The congress of the union on finding itself again in session, after the tremendous crisis which threatened the existence of the republic, feels the necessity of addressing itself to the Mexican people in order to unite its congratulations with theirs upon the salvation of the country, and to felicitate them upon the glorious result that has been achieved by the heroic efforts of a generation that has shown itself worthy of the legacy, which, at the cost of their blood, was bequeathed to it by the illustrious martyrs of the independence.

Joined together, the efforts and the elements of war of three powerful nations, in order to invade our territory; the convention of London ruptured; the treaties of Soledad violated by the French commissioners, and undertaken by France alone; the enterprise of extinguishing our nationality in order to convert our country into a French colony as miserably oppressed as those established in Africa while giving it the pompous title of an empire; brought among the baggage of the invading army the ill-advised prince who assumed an imperial diadem, and was, notwithstanding, the first vassal of the Emperor of the French; established and supported by foreign bayonets a shadow of monarchical government destitute of an independent existence and of all national element; the invasion extended to a great part of the republic, and employing sometimes seduction and a so-called clemency, at others corruption and prodigality, and, still more, terror, devastation, and extermination, the intervention always and everywhere encountered the most determined resistance on the part of the Mexican people, who, abandoned to their fate, and without foreign aid, combatted without cessation and without rest, and regained with their blood the whole of the national territory. Each faction of our army, every guerilla who fought the invader, was the representative of a nationality that could not be extinguished; that struggled without measuring the forces of its adversaries, and that energetically protested against the iniquity and against the injustice of the most baseless usurpation.

This heroic resistance of the people who longed for independence and liberty convinced the Emperor of the French that it was impossible for him to realize his plans, and obliged him to withdraw in the most ignominious manner. Of no use to him were his victories, due to the superiority of his elements of war; of no avail were the atrocities with which his banner was stained; and, in the end, he utterly failed before the impotency of force to extinguish justice and right.

When the throne that France pretended to erect remained without the aid of France it disappeared without leaving a footprint before the simple breath of the popular indignation, and the pitiful prince, abandoned by his protector, met the fate of the lowest leader of filibusters; for this act of justice was demanded by the outraged dignity of the republic, and was also indispensable to assure by the means of a statutory warning the independence and the tranquillity not only of Mexico but of all America, constantly menaced by insensate ambitions and by the delirium of reconquest to which the despots of the old continent have been delivered up without knowing the progress, the vitality, and the force which at its independence was possessed by the New World.

Mexico has now completely restored its independence, and, as during the struggle, this was identified with its political liberty; it has restored also the constitutional order which assures this liberty and guarantees all rights.

The triumph of Mexico is not obscured by any compromise; the disasters of the war have not lessened its dignity; misfortune has not caused it to sacrifice any principle; and it has not purchased peace at the cost of shameful compromises or humiliating concessions.

For such brilliant results the representatives of the people lack words fittingly to express their felicitations. This result is the work of the people, who could not be seduced or intimidated by the foreigner.

To this result the eminent citizen charged with the executive power most efficaciously contributed. Always the faithful representative of the republic, he never for a moment thought of compromising with the invader, nor did he despair for an instant of the salvation of his country. Congress does no more than do homage to the truth in saying that this citizen fulfilled his duty. Such has been, without doubt, the judgment of the people in re-electing him to the chief magistracy.

To the congress it belongs to constitute itself the interpreter of the national gratitude, honoring and recompensing the services that so many good Mexicans have rendered to their country, and attending to the widows and orphans of those who sacrificed their lives upon the scaffold, or on the field of battle, for the independence of the republic.

There is a duty that is not grateful to congress, but that is imperiously necessary, and it consists in not conceding impunity to the greater criminals. Congress, in complying with this duty, will endeavor to conciliate clemency with justice, will fix its eyes upon the future, and will seek to re-establish public morality; but it will not be actuated by any spirit of rancor or of vengeance, nor will it be false to the magnanimity of which the generous Mexican people have given so many proofs.

The situation of the republic upon the completion of its triumph over its foreign and interior enemies is highly satisfactory, and reanimates the hopes of all those who desire the prosperity, the well-being, and the aggrandizement of our country. Upon the wisdom, the good sense, the patriotism and the civic virtues of the Mexicans it depends that these alluring expectations shall not be frustrated. They are the masters of their own destiny; and upon the practical application of the liberty they have defended with so much courage, and the strict observance of the fundamental law so much desired, depends peace and public order, which are the first necessities of the country, as also the subsistence and the perfecting of the institutions, the credit, and the respectability of the republic before the world. The first duty of Mexicans consists to-day in respect and submission to the laws and the authorities that emanate from them, and in making full use of all the liberty authorized by the constitution, without compromising the public ease or inciting to new revolutions.

For public evils, for abuses by the authorities, for the misconduct of the government, there are legal remedies established by the constitution itself, and no others should be adopted, for there is no greater peril than in the interruption of the legal order.

With the observance of the law peace will reign, and peace will engender concord and conciliation, and will shortly lead to an intimate, close, and sincere union of all Mexicans willing to sacrifice their private interests for the good and honor of the country.

The congress earnestly excites all citizens, and particularly those invested by the people with public authority, to the faithful and scrupulous observance of the constitution. Congress, on its part, has already laid down this invariable rule for its conduct, and has resolved on no consideration to overstep the constitutional limits, bearing in mind that if salutary reforms are desired, it is also to be desired that they should have all the prestige and all the force of legality.

It has consequently abstained from counting the votes under the convocatoria of the 14th of August, upon constitutional reforms.

Congress, on commencing the work of reorganization which the country demands, in seeking to repair the grave evils left by the intervention, and in exercising all the attributes assigned to it by the fundamental charter, will have for its sole aim the public good, and it will be the vigilant custodian of the constitutional order.

It sees with satisfaction the reorganization which is being effected in the States, and it will take care that they shall be respected in their sovereignty and interior rule, trusting that the States on their part will take care not to place any embarrassments in the way of the legitimate action of the federal power.

Congress has occupied itself preferentially with the reorganization of the other federal powers. It is for the interest and decorum of the country that these powers shall be sustained and respected by all, while at the same time not depriving them of the light that results from free discussion. The congress, in celebrating the national triumph, in congratulating itself upon the restoration of institutions which combine order with liberty, and in exhorting their constituents to peace and to respect to the law, cannot omit to express, in the name of the nation, a sentiment of profound gratitude towards the enlightened republics of America, for the moral support that they have lent to it during the struggle, in not recognizing the work of the usurpation and in not despairing that in Mexico the holy cause of right and of democracy would triumph. It is the desire of congress that in the interest of civilization and of humanity a close alliance of the American republics may be realized.

With reference to the European powers who, in recognizing the so-called empire, interrupted their friendly relations with the republic and broke the old treaties, congress does not entertain any malevolence or resentment; it will keep open the ports of the country to commerce, to the industry and to the emigration of the whole world, and it will not oppose the renewal of diplomatic relations with the nations that take measures to that end, whenever such relations have for their basis strict justice, mutual interest, and due reciprocity.

Meanwhile it is honorable for our people who have been so atrociously calumniated, that the world is seeing that in Mexico foreigners, in order to enjoy every guarantee, require no other protection than that of the laws and the Mexican authorities.

Congress is confident that the people who have been constant and intrepid in the combat will continue showing themselves magnanimous and generous in the enjoyment and benefits of victory.

MEXICO, January 8, 1868.

(Signed by Mariano Yanez, deputy for the State of Tlascal, president; Francisco de P. Cendejas, deputy for the State of Guanajuato, vice-president; and by one hundred and thirteen deputies from twenty-one States, the federal district, and the Territory of Lower California.)

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, January 13, 1868.

SIR: As a matter of information, I transmit to the department herewith a copy and translation of a recent correspondence that has taken place between this government and the agent here of the bondholders, under what has been known as the English convention debt.

It will be observed that two positions are taken by the Mexican government in this correspondence. First, that the convention regarding this debt, being at an end, under the general principle that all treaties with the powers who have recognized the so-called government of Maximilian are terminated, the Mexican government is free to make new arrangements regarding the manner of liquidating the debt and paying the interest thereon, which new arrangements it prescribes; and secondly, such new arrangements being prescribed, the payment back into the national treasury of a sum now lying in the bondholders' agent's hands on account of dividends, is required, in order that the same may be applied by the Mexican government under such new arrangement.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 2.

The citizen President has well-founded motives for considering insubstantial the treaties which united Mexico with the powers who disowned the republican government of this country and recognized the so-called imperial government which the French intervention pretended to establish, it being those powers who by such conduct broke said treaties.

As among those treaties figures the English convention, it is in the same case as any of the others, and must in consequence be considered as insubstantial.

The government, however, does not for this deny the obligation of the national treasury to pay the legitimate, and recognize titles of this extinguished convention. All that it denies is that such obligation retains an international character, and that the terms of payment stipulated in a no longer existing arrangement should subsist.

In virtue of the liberty which it now has to fix these terms as may appear best, it has considered it convenient to determine that the redemption of the titles of the extinguished English convention be proceeded with by public auctions. The first of these auctions will be held with the fund of $29,649 08, which existed in the hands of Mr. Glennie, as communicated to this ministry by his note of the 7th of November last, and which is now deposited with you, as Mr. Glennie has further communicated in his note of the 19th instant. That amount you will therefore deliver immediately into the general treasury.

The subsequent public auctions will be held with the funds which will be opportunely designated, there being only and exclusively admissible for the redemption the titles of the extinguished English convention which are recognized as legitimate by the republican government, and those titles are to be preferred for the redemption which are tendered by the most favorable bidder, i. e., those that are offered at the lowest price.

As in the archives which are in your charge, there should exist the coupons which have been paid, you will be pleased to deliver them at the general treasury, together with the corresponding account of what has been redeemed up to this date of the capital and interest of the extinguished English convention.

By direction of the citizen President I communicate this to you for your intelligence and the consequent ends.

MEXICO, December 24, 1867.

SIR: Your official communication of the 21st instant has been delivered to us to-day. In it you have been pleased to inform us of the disposition of the supreme government with regard to the English convention, and we are directed to immediately deliver into the general treasury of the nation the funds which Mr. Glennie deposited in our house, appointing us at the same time agents ad interim of the said convention.

We do not doubt that the supreme government, comprehending the embarrassing position in which we have been placed by the dispositions of the citizen President, will not take it amiss if, before complying with the order that has been addressed to us, we take the opportunity to call a meeting of all the creditors, in order that they may be informed of the terms of the said supreme order which has now been communicated to us.

We shall do this with all the haste which the urgency of the case requires, and in the mean time, protesting our respect and consideration.

MEXICO, December 27, 1867.

SIR: In compliance with what we had the honor to submit to you in our communication of the 24th instant, a meeting of the creditors of the English convention has been held to-day and the official note of your department of the 21st instant has been read.

Informed of the contents of it, the gentlemen who attended, and who jointly represent the majority of the credits, agreed unanimously to the following resolution, viz:

"The meeting does not consider itself authorized to take into consideration the points treated of in the note of the supreme government of the 21st instant, and in consequence limits to request the government, through Messrs. Barron, Forbes & Co., to be pleased not to proceed with the proposed public auction, leaving the funds remaining in the deposit where they now are."

On soliciting you to communicate this resolution to the citizen President, hoping that he will be pleased to accede to the wishes of the meeting, on our part we have to add that we shall occupy ourselves in forming as quickly as possible the account of capital and interest redeemed to date, and at the same time we will deliver into the general treasury the coupons which have been paid in accordance with the disposition in the note of the 21st instant above mentioned.

In the mean time be pleased to accept the assurances of our respect and consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND OF PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 2.

Notwithstanding what you state in your note of the 27th instant, with reference to the petition which the meeting of creditors resolved to make, that the funds which you received from Mr. F. Glennie as belonging to the English convention might remain in the same deposit, the citizen President has directed that it be said to you in reply, that for the reasons expressed in the note addressed to you by the supreme government on the 21st instant, through this department, the determination with regard to the delivery of the funds which you have to make into the general treasury of the nation be carried into effect.

I communicate the same to you for the corresponding ends. Independence, liberty, and reform! Mexico, December 28, 1867.

SIR: Our desire to act in accord with the parties interested in the English convention has led us to delay our reply to the communication which you were pleased to address to us under date of the 28th ultimo, informing us that the citizen President has not thought it convenient to accede to the desires of the meeting, but has directed that the determination with regard to the delivery into the general treasury of the nation of the funds belonging to the said convention shall be carried into effect.

In view of this reiterated disposition, and the desires of the majority of the parties interested in the convention being already known, it is our duty to proceed at once to the delivery referred to; but before effecting it we beg you to be pleased to inform us, if in giving us the corresponding receipt for our security we can count upon its being expressed in it, that we make the delivery under compulsion of the supreme government, and protesting in the name of the parties interested in said convention against an act which they regard as prejudicial to their rights.

We do not doubt that the citizen President, comprehending the object we have in asking this explanation, will exonerate us from any intention of raising embarrassment, or of passing the limits of a just defense.

We do ourselves the honor of reiterating to you the assurance of our respect and consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, January 17, 1868.

SIR: Since the reoccupation of this capital by the national government, and the commencement of the work of reconstruction, there have been constant rumors of changes, more or less complete, in the cabinet of President Juarez, and changes have been believed to be desirable by many of the friends of the government as well as by the opposition.

Except in the case of the minister of treasury, Mr. Iglesias, whose health has for some time interfered very much with the discharge of the duties of his office, these rumors have lacked foundation.

Upon the entry, however, of President Juarez upon his new term of office, on the 25th ultimo, all of the ministers tendered their resignations, for the purpose, as stated in their joint note, of leaving the President free to form a new cabinet if he deemed it convenient, but none of the resignations were accepted, except that of the ministry of the treasury.

I have now to report that this position has been tendered to Mr. Romero, who formally accepted the same on the 15th instant.

The note of the president and Mr. Romero's letter of acceptance appeared in the Diario Oficial of last evening, and yesterday he entered upon the discharge of the duties of this important and difficult office.

In consequence of this appointment Mr. Romero has resigned the position he has so long and so worthily filled of minister from Mexico to the United States.

While this fact will, I am sure, be learned with regret by the government of the United States, his acceptance of this position in the cabinet of President Juarez I feel certain will inspire confidence not only in this country and the United States, but also in Europe.

As the correspondence published, alluded to herein, is not only honorable to Mr. Romero, but indicates the principles that will govern his action in his new position, I append a translation herewith.

So far as I have learned, it is not the intention of this government to appoint a minister at present to the United States.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Taking into consideration your acknowledged patriotism, ability, acquirements, and other qualities, the President has thought proper to appoint you secretary of state of

I have the honor to communicate the same to you, assuring you of my attentive consideration.

MEXICO, January 15, 1868.

I have had the honor to receive the communication you have been pleased to address to me under this date, informing me that the President has thought proper to appoint me secretary of state of the department of treasury and public credit.

Deeply grateful for this further proof of confidence with which the chief magistrate of the nation has again honored me, I make known to you that I accept the charge that he has confided to me solely from deference to the desires of the President and respect to his sound judgment, but by no means believing that I possess the qualifications necessary to its proper discharge.

Indeed my inclinations and my habits have not permitted me up to the present time to study in a conscientious manner the financial questions of our country, and for this reason I can only carry with me to the difficult ministry to which I am now called the firm determination to administer with purity the public funds, the disposition to avail myself of the lessons of experience in order to establish something that may be considered as a financial system, which we have hitherto lacked, and the intense desire to co-operate with the President in the great and patriotic work of consolidating the peace, order, and institutions of the republic.

I renew to you the assurances of my very distinguished consideration,

M. ROMERO.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES;

City of Mexico, January 24, 1868.

SIR: On the 13th instant the telegraphic announcement, of which a translation is inclosed herewith, was published in the papers of this city that a large number of the leading and most respectable merchants, chiefly foreigners, of San Luis Potosi had been arrested, under an order condemning them to imprisonment for three months for their failure to pay a forced loan, or anticipation of contributions, summarily levied upon them by the governor of that state.

The event created great alarm and anxiety in foreign commercial circles here, and was apparently viewed with regret by many leading Mexicans.

After the pledges made with regard to foreigners, both by the executive and by the Mexican congress, I did not doubt that immediate action in the matter would be taken by the general government.

In this I have been disappointed.

On the 20th and 21st instants letters stating the facts reached here from San Luis and were placed in my hands, and I was appealed to to make some interposition in behalf of the foreigners so thrown into imprisonment.

As the only foreign representative in this country, I felt that I should be wanting in my duty if I permitted such an occurrence to pass without some notice at my hands.

At the same time, under the tenor of the correspondence that has taken place with this government regarding the protection to be extended by the United States to foreigners in a condition of non-representation in this country, and your latest instructions in that regard, I did not feel at liberty to address this government officially upon the subject, nor to assume to make any demand, but I thought it to be my duty at least to lay before it the information that had reached me to recall to their attention their own pledges and their own laws, and to show that such acts could not pass without notice, but that they would be officially laid before the judgment of the world.

I therefore addressed to Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, on the 22d instant, the unofficial note of which a copy is inclosed herewith.

Yesterday, the 23d instant, a further telegraphic communication from San Luis Potosi was published here, of which I annex translation, which shows that the merchants who have been arrested are still in prison.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

MEXICO, January 22, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I feel it my duty, as the only foreign representative in this country, and in the spirit of the correspondence that has taken place between the government of the United States and the government of Mexico, upon the subject of the extension of the protection of the United States to foreigners resident in this country who are in a condition of non-representation, to call your earnest attention to the occurrence that has taken place in San Luis Potosi, where a number of the leading foreign merchants have been imprisoned, in addition to the embargo of their property, because they have declined to pay a contribution summarily levied upon them by the governor of that state.

My attention was called to this matter by the telegraphic accounts of what occurred published in the papers of this city; but I now lay before you copies of two letters, not addressed to me, but which have been placed in my hands, from highly respectable commercial houses at San Luis, whose partners have been imprisoned, and which give a full account of the affair.

By no modern legislation is the person of the individual held for the payment of public taxes. His property is liable to the extent of all he possesses, to meet the equitable and proportional contributions, levied in accordance with law, required by the legitimate necessities of the government under which he lives; but the individual is not held liable to personal imprisonment because he is unable or unwilling to pay the civil demands that may be made upon him. This was the case under Marquez, but it had been supposed that time had passed.

In your note to Mr. Otterbourg, of the 7th of September last, you state that "foreigners resident in Mexico, who have no representative of their government, have been and are under the protection of the Mexican authorities, to whom they can apply with confidence that they have enjoyed, and will continue to enjoy, the guarantees conceded by the laws of the republic."

In your note to me of the 26th of October last, you add: "Although such subjects have not a representative of their own, the government will watch with special care to see that they are protected by the Mexican authorities, and that they enjoy the guarantees conceded by the laws of the republic."

In your note on the 11th of December last to Mr. Middleton, the late chargé d'affaires of England in this country, I find it stated that "the government has taken care that English subjects resident in Mexico shall be under the effective protection of the laws," and "the same as until now, the government of the republic will comply with the duty imposed upon it by public law and by its own legislation."

In the discourse of the President of the republic at the opening of the sessions of the national congress on the 8th. of December, he said:

"The government has also taken care that the subjects of such nations resident in the republic shall be under the protection of the laws and the authorities. The efficacy of this protection has been such that there has been no ground for complaint. It has been practically demonstrated that under the illustration of our people, and under the principles of our liberal institutions, foreigners resident in Mexico, without the necessity of the special protection of treaties, are considered on an equality with Mexicans and enjoy the rights and the guarantees established by the laws."

In the manifesto, issued on the 8th instant by the national congress of the republic, bearing the signature of one hundred and fifteen deputies, from twenty-one States, the Territory of Lower California and the federal district, it is stated as follows:

"Meanwhile it is honorable for our people who have been so atrociously calumniated, that the world is seeing that in Mexico foreigners, in order to enjoy every guarantee, require no other protection than that of the laws and the Mexican authorities."

Whether, therefore, what has now occurred at San Luis is the act of the State authorities or of the federal authorities, the duty has been assumed by the general government of the republic of securing to foreigners the guarantees authorized by the constitution and the laws of the country.

Section 1, article 1, of the constitution of the republic, I find is as follows:

"The Mexican people recognize that the rights of man are the basis and the object of social institutions. Wherefore it is declared that all the laws and the authorities of the country must respect and sustain the guarantees established by the present constitution."

Article 14 states that "no retroactive law shall be passed. No one shall be judged or sentenced except under laws of date anterior to the fact, and exactly applicable to the case, and by a tribunal which shall have been previously established by law."

Article 16 states that "no one may be molested in his person, family, domicile, papers, or possessions, except in virtue of a written order from a competent authority, based upon legal cause for the proceeding."

Article 17 prescribes that "no man can be arrested for debts of a character purely civil;" and article 18 that "imprisonment shall only take place for offenses which merit personal punishment. In whatever stage of the proceedings it shall appear that the accused may not be liable to this penalty, he shall be put at liberty under bail. In no case shall the imprisonment be prolonged for default of payment of fees, or whatever other furnishing of money."

Article 19 further adds that "no detention shall exceed the term of three days, except upon proof of sufficient reason for imprisonment, in conformity with the requisites required by law."

"The sole lapse of this time shall render responsible the authority that orders or consents to it, and the agents, officers, or jailors that execute it."

In section 2, article 31, it is declared that it is obligatory upon all Mexicans "to contribute towards public expenses as well of the federation as of the state and municipality where they may reside, in an equitable and proportional manner, as shall be prescribed by the laws."

And in section 3, article 33, with reference to foreigners, it is stated that "they are entitled to the guarantees established by section 1, article 1, of the present constitution, (which have been quoted,) except that in all cases the government has the right to expel those who are pernicious to society. It is obligatory upon them to contribute toward public expenses in the manner that may be prescribed by the laws, and to obey and respect the institutions, laws, and authorities of the country, submitting to the judgments and sentences of the tribunals, without power to seek other protection than that which the laws concede to Mexican citizens."

And, finally, article 126 of the constitution states as follows:

"This constitution, the laws of the congress of the union which emanate from it, and all treaties made or that may be made by the President of the republic, with the approbation of congress, shall be the supreme law of all the union. The judges of each State in giving their decisions shall do so in conformity with said constitution, laws and treaties, anything to the contrary that there may be in the laws or constitutions of the States notwithstanding."

Under these constitutional provisions, and under the declarations that have been made by the Mexican government, there can be but one opinion entertained by the world, if the foreigners who have been thus imprisoned at San Luis are not immediately placed at liberty, and there be not some power felt throughout the republic, by which the occurrence of such acts in the future can be prevented.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

SR. D. SEBASTIAN LERDO DE TEJADA, Sec., &c., &c.

IMPRISONED IN CASA DE BENEFICENCIA,
San Luis Potosi, January 15, 1868.

SIR: I had this pleasure, on the 3d instant, with a resumé of what was passing here in consequence of a new law laying a direct tax on merchants from $38 up to $18,000 per year, and I have to state subsequent events that have caused my imprisonment with other eight confères.

I think it was on the 4th that the State congress, by a decree, authorized the governor to ask (pedir) an anticipation of $27,000 to account of the contribution, which is nothing else than an authority to contract with the commerce a loan.

Instead of so doing and calling on us to lend an amount to account, he assigns the sum among a few of us of amounts from $500 to $1,000, and ordering that the amount be paid within twenty-four hours.

If you look over the law you will find that it has a retroactive effect; that it deprives a man of the full use of his property, and in fact it is unconstitutional, let alone the exorbitance of the amount of taxation. It is natural that every one should resist lending any amount to account of a tax that, by the constitution, could not affect us, let alone that we were not asked to lend the money, but had a peremptory order to pay the same at a stated time.

With few exceptional cases, arising from fear, all determined to resist what we could not interpret otherwise than a forced loan; and some in writing, and others by word, made their excuses for non-compliance.

The reply given all of us was, that our reasons could not be admitted as sufficient, and giving us another twenty-four hours.

This second term expired and no one paid, because a voluntary payment would have proved against us, and that we were conformed to the law. Seeing this resistance, the minister ejucador calls on all non-contents with an order, that if by 12 o'clock on the 11th we had not paid, he had to embargo us.

When I and others knew this we at once addressed ourselves to the district judge, requesting protection, (amparo), not only from the effects of the law, but also the payment of the forced loan levied on us. We thought ourselves pretty secure, but the sequel proved that we had something else in store for us.

About 6 p. m. on the 11th, as many as could be found were called up before the prefect, who presented an order from the governor condemning all and each one of us to a fine of $500, or imprisonment for the term of three months.

I was notified the next day at 10 a. m., and as I had refused to pay the amount assigned me, I naturally refused also to pay the fine of $500, and in accordance was imprisoned.

I fortunately got what was refused to others—a copy of the order—as I said that I naturally wished to have a document stating the reasons for my arrest.

I inclose you an alcance of the "opposicion," in which you will find the same; and the remarks commenting on this order I think you will find such as to show that it is illegal to all intents and purposes, and instead of having that liberty so much talked about, we are only under the rule of a petty tyrant who recognizes no law but his own will.

I have now completed three days in prison; but I have heard it said that if in fifteen days we do not give in and pay the fine we are all to be put in the common jail. I do not know if this is a tale or a threat, but be it as it may, I am as ready to go to the common jail as to remain here.

We have applied again to the district judge, as we have not been consigned to any of the State justices, as the law enforces, to know what we are accused of; because refusing to pay what we do not owe is no disrespect to the authorities or to any one. With equal reason he might have assigned the full amount on me of the $27,000 instead of the $1,000; and this surely does not condemn me that I should pay such an amount.

The foregoing is a true statement of facts, and as I make no doubt a differing coloring will be given to this scandalous business, I would esteem it as a favor that you would publish this statement, even subscribing my name to it if you so wish.

I hear that an execution was put into my house this morning to cover the $1,000 forced loan, and they took nine pieces of broadcloth valued at five dollars and fifty cents per vara.

I also hear since that it has been sold at public auction at three dollars to three dollars and thirty-seven cents per vara.

I suppose I shall again be embargoed for the costs, and you may think how pleasant it must be when I do not even owe the money.

Yours truly,

JOHN PITMAN.

[Extract from a letter from Messrs. Davies & Co.]

SAN LUIS POTOSI, January 17, 1868.

Here the excitement about the new law is as great as ever, and business quite at a stand. Our authorities seem determined to carry the law into effect, and if they do so all the houses will have to liquidate and go to some other State.

The quotas for first class houses we hear have been reduced from $18,000 to $6,000, but even this we cannot pay, as it would be simply so much money lost.

Because we decline to pay a loan on account of the new contributions, our Mr. Endara was arrested on the 12th instant, and thrown into prison, together with nine other merchants, and is still in confinement.

In addition to the above, we were embargoed on the 15th instant, and the sum of $1,000 forcibly taken out of our chest.

This is the way in which our authorities understand constitutional liberty.

We have petitioned our State congress, asking for the derogation of the new law, but they have refused to take our petition into consideration. We have also applied to the judge of the district for protection, both against the law and the imprisonment.

As regards the first request, he has not yet replied, but about the latter he has decided "that there is ground for the petition," and the prisoners are to undergo some kind of a trial to-morrow.

We have telegraphed to the President on the subject, but as yet have received no answer. We are now preparing a petition to the general congress.

It seems that our government is determined to get the first third of the new law out of us, even if it has to abrogate the law afterwards; and to insure this, a resolution of our congress was published yesterday imposing a fine of $500 on any person who closes his house of business in order to evade payment of the tax.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy and translation of a note received last evening from Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, in reply to the unofficial communication I addressed to him on the 22d instant, with reference to the foreign merchants arrested at San Luis Potosi.

I have just returned from the interview to which I was cited in the said note, and am glad to be able to state that I am informed by Mr. Lerdo de Tejada that yielding to the representations of the general government, the governor of the State of San Luis has placed at liberty the merchants who have been imprisoned, of which fact the government has been advised by a telegram from San Luis, dated day before yesterday.

The explanations offered by the governor of San Luis, communicated to me by Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, do not require any remark; they only add to the necessity of the step he has now been induced, by the influence of the general government, to take; that is, to place the persons arrested at liberty.

DEAR SIR: I have received the unofficial letter you have been pleased to address to me, under date of the 22d instant, with reference to the case of certain merchants arrested in the city of San Luis Potosi, by order of the government of that State.

The government has had, and will have, in just consideration the good offices you have been pleased to interpose in this affair, with reference to which congress has already asked for information, and the judge of the district of San Luis has also intervened in conformity with the law relative thereto.

I can with pleasure make known to you in an interview the explanations and the motives which have been given by the governor of San Luis with reference to his proceedings, and if not inconvenient for you, I will be at your orders for such interview at the department of foreign relations, at four o'clock in the afternoon of to-morrow.

SIR: An important step in the direction of commercial reform has been taken by this government in the appointment of a commission for the formation of a new tariff.

I inclose herewith a translation of the order from the treasury department, making the appointment, which at the same time indicates the general basis of the reforms proposed.

The simplification and unification of the tariff will, as I understand, be more especially sought than any general reduction of duties.

The commission has already commenced its labors, and it is probable a report will be prepared in time for the new tariff bill to be submitted by the executive at the next session of the congress, which commences on the 1st of April and terminates on the last day of May, and which, by the constitution, is to be dedicated in preference to the consideration of financial subjects.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION I.

The general ordinance of the maritime and frontier custom-houses of the republic of the 21st of January, 1856, which is that actually in force, has been so varied by different modifications which it has received from time to time, that there are very few of its provisions that are now considered as in force.

Besides, many of its provisions conflict with the letter and the spirit of the constitution, and for that reason should not longer be permitted to exist.

The modifications that have been made are already so numerous that the system of duties of importation upon foreign merchandise has become very complicated and difficult, which, besides occasioning inconvenience to commerce, produces difficulties and complications for the supreme government and its offices.

The citizen President desiring, therefore, that there shall be formed with all the study and care possible a new tariff, which shall be in accord with the spirit of the constitution and with the necessities of the country, and in which at the same time that the interests of the public treasury shall be protected, the labors of the merchants shall be simplified, has been pleased to direct that there shall be named a commission composed of yourself and Messrs. Jesus Castaneda, S. Castain A. Barcena, Julio Ulink, and Miguel Gutierrez, charged with forming, upon the basis herein indicated, a project of tariff which shall embrace so far as possible all of the conditions desired.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, January 4, 1868.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, February 8, 1868.

SIR: Since the recent entry of Mr. Romero upon the position of minister of treasury, a report has been made by him to the congress, which may be considered as embodying the financial programme of the Mexican government.

An English translation has been published here under direction of the treasury department, of which I inclose a copy herewith.

It will be observed that in several important particulars this report bears upon the foreign relations of this republic.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE FOR FINANCE AND PUBLIC CREDIT.

Report presented to the Congress of the Union by the Secretary of State for the Department of Finance and Public Credit, in virtue of the 89th article of the Federal Constitution, on the 31st of January, 1868.

CITIZEN DEPUTIES: In accordance with the 89th article of the federal constitution, and by an order of the congress communicated to me on the 17th instant, I have the honor to report that the brief space of time elapsed since I entered upon my department has not permitted me to inform myself thoroughly of the progress and alterations that have occurred in its several branches since the date of the last financial report of the 10th of February, 1867, nor to acquaint myself with the actual state of all those departments of public administration connected with the federal revenue. Neither, for the same reason, have I been able to develop any plan which might permit us to regulate our finances for the future by affording us sufficient resources to meet the public expenses, the material improvements of the country, and the redemption of our consolidated and floating debt.

The events of the war which has happily terminated; the occupation of a great part of our territory by the French army of invasion; the necessity under which our military chiefs and the local authorities made use of the funds of the federation recovered in their respective districts: the irregular manner in which they have had to effect these operations; and the loss and destruction of a great part of the documents showing the distribution of the public money, are motives that cause it to be almost impossible to form a report by which an exact idea could be given of our financial affairs during the war with France. Moreover, the exceptional circumstances of that war (notwithstanding that the formation of the account of its expenses might be a very valuable work, considered in the light of historical interest, and the injury caused to the nation) would be a motive why, at the same time, it would not have much importance taken as a basis from which to start for our future financial system.

The preceding considerations are, therefore, the cause that the present report must be necessarily very succinct and incomplete, and that it will not be accompanied by all the indispensable data for ascertaining the amount of the ingress to the national treasury and that of the egress for the last ten years, but that it will be rather a slight sketch for the future than an account of the past.

Existing, moreover, a legal injunction lately renewed by congress, by which the secretaries of the various departments are ordered to report on the use made by the government of the extraordinary faculties conceded to it by the national representation, it appears to be more in order to leave the relation of the past to the report about to be made in accordance with the instructions referred to, as also more natural to intrust this work to the citizen who was at the head of the finance department during the greater part of the period in which the executive was invested with legislative powers, and to whom it has already been recommended by the President.

The principal basis for the formation and adaptation of a system of finance is the conservation of public tranquillity; without this requisite it would be impossible to obtain the necessary income to cover the estimates or to establish the necessary order for collecting the revenues effectually. Government will therefore use every effort to preserve public tranquillity at all costs, in the certainty that this is the first requirement of the country, and to which all the others have to submit themselves. If, as is believed, this desirable result be obtained, the principal difficulties that have hitherto existed towards the organization of the public revenues will have been overcome.

Another indispensable element towards attaining this important object is that the laws establishing the federal revenues shall be punctually obeyed by all the inhabitants of the republic, including, of course, the authorities of the States. The necessities of the war had required up to the present that the local authorities should dispose of the federal income, and the government presumes that there is no exaggeration in the assurance that this practice has been one of the greatest obstacles that has existed so far towards the organization of the federal finances, and that which has maintained the republic in a constant state of bankruptcy for many years. One of the first requirements is, therefore, to put an end to this practice, so prejudicial to the interests of the public revenue, and which, on account of the restoration of peace, has ceased to have the motives that might have justified it formerly. The government, being satisfied of the imperious necessity of the federal exchequer, receiving in future the whole of its revenues, has dictated the competent measures towards obtaining this important result, and is resolved to carry them into effect with all the energy required by the circumstances, and with the conviction that in this way it fulfills one of the most sacred duties which it owes to the nation. For the fulfillment of the revenue laws, government relies upon the efficient co-operation of congress, without which perhaps its patriotic views might possibly not have the desired effect. The government is persuaded that with these two important elements, namely, the preservation of public tranquillity and the strict compliance with the revenue laws throughout the country, it would not only be possible but also certain to organize the national income and to count upon the necessary means to meet all requirements by covering the public estimates and liquidating within a comparatively short period a great portion of our debt.

The government considers that one of the most prejudicial errors for the republic, and one that has brought on the most disastrous and transcendent consequences, has been that the country did not possess sufficient resources of its own to exist by itself, and that it required inevitably assistance from abroad. A painful experience has taught us to know how unfounded is this illusion. After our war with the United States, in 1848, we had a considerable supply of means, which, had they been well administered, would have sufficed to have established our financial prosperity. But, as the other indispensable requisites were wanting to attain this object, they were dissipated like smoke. Later, and in virtue of the Mesilla treaty, we received a subsidy from abroad, which scarcely became perceptible, and hardly left any trace behind it. Lastly, those misled Mexicans who, in a moment of supine hallucination, appealed to a foreign country, not only soliciting pecuniary resources, but also armed forces and positive intervention in the domestic affairs of the republic, were quickly convinced that notwithstanding the fabulous result they obtained by converting into an instrument of their unworthy views a sagacious monarch, all was of no avail—neither the hundreds of millions of dollars expended in the expedition, the thousands of troops sent to the country, the recognition and moral support afforded by European nations to the intervention, nor the unheard-of efforts which were made to establish a state of things that did not count upon its own resources, but had to depend upon foreign aid.

If the republic had not counted upon its own resources for its existence as an independent nation, it would have been more decorous and perhaps more patriotic to have subjected ourselves to the foreign yoke, which on distinct occasions has been tried to be imposed upon us, and which in the last one we had to make gigantic efforts to overthrow. The entire confidence which the government enjoys that the republic possesses within itself all the necessary elements for self-existence, and that with the re-establishment of peace and obedience to the laws she can not only dispose of the requisite means to consolidate her government and satisfy all her wants, but that by the development of her immense material resources she will attain that prodigious degree of welfare and prosperity to which it would appear she is destined by a benign and prodigal nature, was without doubt one of the reasons why the government was inspired with unlimited faith, and was made to assume a dignified and decided attitude in our last struggle with a foreign invader.

The government has had the patriotic satisfaction to observe, (notwithstanding that traces are still unblotted of the foreign enemy, who fled precipitately, abandoning all the interests he had created here in a period of five years,) that, assisted by the good spirit of the Mexican people, it finds itself in a far more preferable position, without doubt, than any that has existed since the period of our emancipation up to the present time. As a proof of this, there has scarcely been time to commence to repair the disasters occasioned by the invasion, when the government, thanks to its efforts to re-establish order and morality, covers its expenses with a punctuality that has never before been witnessed. Notwithstanding that the republic maintains a standing armed force, larger than has existed in times of peace, this force, perhaps for the first time in many years, and with the fact that the government is not yet in possession of all its revenues, receives full pay, which is generally paid a fortnight in advance. The civil list, which comprehends all the employés of the federation, those of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers, and a considerable number of widows, orphans, and other pensioners of the state, are also paid up with all punctuality. The other expenses which the government necessarily has to meet, such as the transportation of war material, construction of warlike stores, military clothing, printing, &c., &c., are either fully paid up, or in the course of payment, with the probability of being covered immediately. The expedition to Yucatan, which under other circumstances would have been impossible, except by taking transport vessels by force, and recurring to other violent measures, has now been effected, as it might have been, by a nation whose credit was cemented upon a more solid basis, namely, by chartering steamers and sailing vessels at fair prices, covering two months' pay, in advance, to the expeditionary forces, and moreover remitting funds for those already organized, or about to be organized in the States of Yucatan and Campeachy, with the view of re-establishing public order, and putting down the insurrectionists; and these enormous outlays, which exceed the sum that congress considered sufficient to disburse, have not disarranged our estimates nor prevented our making our payments as if the public tranquillity had not been disturbed in that peninsula.

One of the causes that has contributed to produce this promising position, is the determination of government, carried out so far in an inflexible manner, and in which it is the firm intention to persist, of not consenting to any ruinous contracts respecting the anticipation of duties. Until now, usury has been the cancer of our financial system. Government has adopted the policy of putting an end thereto, and the results of so praiseworthy a determination, carried into effect inexorably, are already manifest to every one.

Another of the fundamental principles on which the financial policy of the government relies, has been and is the fixed resolution to introduce economy in the administrative expenses. This, however, is not the work of a few days. So far, considerable progress has been made in this respect, as the armed force of the republic, which at the termination of the war consisted of eighty thousand men, does not now reach twenty thousand. For some time, payment has had to be made to a considerable number of chiefs and officers, who had been withdrawn on account of their services being no longer required, in order to enable them to retire to their homes.

In the opinion of the government, there would be a great risk that our present financial situation might lose its equilibrium considerably, if we were to attempt to change the existing legislation in this respect, by adopting dangerous innovations. There is no doubt that our actual financial laws require many improvements, but government considers it to be its duty to make known to congress its conviction, that any innovation not duly reflected upon would produce fatal consequences to the revenue. It is the intention of the government to adopt or propose to congress all such reforms as experience may show to be needful; but it is believed that nothing of the existing system should be destroyed until that which is to supplant it shall be established. The government considers, therefore, that it ought to impress upon congress the convenience of not changing our rental system for the moment. In consequence of this idea, the government believes it to be an obligation to recommend to congress, not only that the laws that now form our system should not be abolished or modified for the present, but that the measures adopted by the legislatures of some of the States, in contravention to the federal laws, should be annulled. Upon this important point a representation will shortly be addressed to the chambers by this department.

Our system of taxation is, without doubt, open to much improvement. One sole, general direct tax, imposed upon real estate and actual capital, would be more equitable, and would produce a larger income to the public treasury, than those now exacted. The value of real estate in the City of Mexico is calculated by the general tax office of the district at thirty-nine millions of dollars, and that of the suburbs, in the districts of Tacubaya and Tlalpam, at about eight millions. The reports given in, as to actual capital, barely reach to about three millions of dollars. This insignificant amount can only represent a very trifling part of such capital. In case of adopting this tax, it would be necessary to take steps to oblige capitalists to make their representations rather more scrupulously.

Government trusts to be in a position before long to reduce the armed force of the republic to a peace footing, as it is of opinion that a reduced army, but well organized and disciplined, and provided with arms with all the improvements of modern inventions, would be more efficient in the preservation of public tranquillity, or in re-establishing order in case of disturbances, and even in defense of the country in case of a foreign invasion, than a more numerous army but badly organized, and not well armed. A military school for the creation of punctilious and capable officers would provide us with a number of instructed chiefs, who would be enabled to convert the masses of our population into regular troops in case of a foreign invasion. The sums which would be economized by making this reduction might be employed with great benefit to the country in protecting foreign immigration, in the construction of railroads, and in other public improvements, which would permit us to arrive quickly to that prosperity and welfare we all desire.

The orders for payment which I found pending in the general treasury, on taking office in this department, amounted to $163,296 99. In the few days that have transpired since the 16th instant up to date nearly a sixth part of these orders have been paid, without neglecting, on this account, the other public expenses.

With the view of re-establishing the credit of Mexico, by endeavoring to comply with the orders for payment with that punctuality which is required by decorum and public convenience, I have taken the determination of not sending any order to the general treasury, or of recognizing those emanating from other departments, unless there should be the necessary funds in that office to pay the amount on presentation.

It would not be possible to form an estimate of the national revenues, because unfortunately up to the present there have been no means of assuring their ingress to the public exchequer. It may be said, however, in a general way, that they consist of the income of the maritime custom-houses, the products of district imposts, and direct contributions, the rents of mints, the "conducta" dues, dues on the exportation of silver, stamp dues, and national property.

It has been a misfortune not to have succeeded up to the present in securing the entrance into the federal exchequer of the whole of the income from the maritime custom-houses of the Pacific.

The government is engaged in dictating the necessary measures to attain the desired object, and will shortly submit to congress its ideas with this view. A part of the income of these custom-houses has been devoted to the payment of the fourth division of the standing army.

In regard to the custom-houses of the Gulf, that of Vera Cruz is in full possession of the government, and with its income not only has the pay of the second division been covered, but remittances have also been made to the general treasury, without which it would not have been possible to pay the civil list, but even to have attended to the pay of the first division and that of the forces of the federal district. The custom-house at Tampico was, unfortunately, for some time in the possession of the insurrectionists of that port, who disacknowledged the authority of the national government, and who not only made use of all its proceeds, but also exacted loans from the merchants of that city, and contracted obligations for which pretended claims are made against the federal government. Government is in the hope that, now that its authority is re-established in Tampico, it can count upon the income of that custom-house. A considerable part of this income has been destined to pay the third division, and the same has happened in regard to the custom-house of Matamoros. This custom-house, as well as the others on the Gulf, has been making remittances to the general treasury, but the diminished mercantile transactions there have caused these remittances to be of but little consideration.

The revenue of the custom-house of the district produces generally, in fair times, from eighty to one hundred and twenty thousand dollars monthly; the direct taxes from the district, from forty to fifty thousand dollars; and the stamp duty, from eighty to a hundred thousand dollars per month. With the assistance of these revenues government has been enabled, thus far, to meet the estimates in the manner already mentioned. It is to be anticipated that, with the consolidation of peace and public order, the establishment of the federal authority and the supreme authority of the republic, the re-establishment of public confidence and the augmentation of mercantile transactions, these revenues, as well as those of the custom-houses, will increase very considerably.

Respecting mints, the system of renting them out to private individuals, carried on hitherto, has produced more inconveniences than benefits. For a certain amount, comparatively small, the government has had to bind itself not to permit the exportation of silver in bars. Urgent necessities of the moment for obtaining resources, obliged those in command to give permits for the exportation of silver, and these permits were given either by the military chiefs or the local authorities, and in consequence thereof the tenants of the mints presented claims for sums far exceeding the amounts received by the government for rent. Under these circumstances, and under the impression that it will be more favorable to the interests of the revenue that the mints should be under the immediate authority of the government, the executive is engaged in resolving what steps are to be taken in the matter. Propositions will shortly be presented to congress, believed to be sufficient to place this important branch of revenue upon a better footing than hitherto. Several of the leases of mints have already expired, and government has deemed fit not to renew them. When the new arrangements, in which the executive is now occupied, are concluded, this important matter, instead of being burdensome to the public exchequer, as has been the case recently, will give excellent results.

A large number of convoys (conductas) having left last year, exceeding that regulated by law, it is not to be expected that in the present year so large a number will leave, or that they will carry great amounts. It is not to be looked for, therefore, that any considerable revenue will be obtained from this source. When mining operations receive that impulse that they ought to receive, after some time of peace and the return of public confidence, the proceeds from this branch will be very abundant.

Nationalized properties would doubtless be a source of public wealth, notwithstanding little is left of them, if the exigencies of times past were not subject to innumerable complications. Government believes, however, that the necessities have now passed over which caused their transfer or sale at low prices in order to disarm an uncompromising enemy, and that with good administration they may hereafter be made to produce abundant resources, or that they will serve, at any rate, to liquidate a very considerable portion of our debt. Government is actively engaged in adopting the necessary measures to secure this object, and will soon submit to congress, if required, the steps that may be deemed convenient, both for the better organization of the department of nationalized property, and the arrangements for the collection and distribution of the proceeds. Neither would it be possible, just now, to form an estimate of the entire expenses required for public administration. Government has already intimated to congress, through myself, that not one single day shall be lost in forming this report. One of my first acts upon entering in the finance department, and even several days previous to congress making any indication to me with this object, was, with the consent of the President, to issue a circular requiring all the necessary data to form the same in a complete and exact manner. I can assure congress that the government has the firm determination to form the estimate, and only desires that the one thus made may deserve that name, and not be a dead letter, or a thing impracticable, as by misfortune has happened on other occasions. For the present, however, I can state to congress crudely, and in a general way, that the expenses of administration of which I have knowledge amount monthly to the following sums:

The pensions payable in the States are not included, on account of the estimates not having been received, notwithstanding the frequent demands addressed by the general treasury to the head offices with this object.

On the arrival of the national government at this city, in July of last year, the funds of the municipality were found to be so dilapidated, that it was entirely impossible to pay out of them the expenses of the government of the district and its armed force. It has been necessary, therefore, to concede certain subsidies, more or less considerable, in order to attend to the most urgent requirements. The municipality has also been assisted with a monthly sum for the opening of new streets to embellish the capital, and for indemnities to the owners of property which it has been necessary to demolish. Government has now regulated the revenues of the district, and considers that ere long they will be sufficient to cover all its expenses, and then the supplements which have been made up to the present will be at an end.

Government has also thought it its duty to maintain a considerable force of rural police for the custody of the road to Vera Cruz, and that to the interior, as far as Queretaro. The States ought to protect their own road, as it would be impossible for the general government to take them all under their custody. In attention, however, to the importance of those two now mentioned, government has not hesitated to organize forces for their protection until the States can comply with this obligation. This charge is all the more onerous, because the forces, badly discharging this service, receive higher pay than those of the regular army.

One of the most efficacious modes that exist, in the opinion of the government, not only for making the public revenues more productive, but also for facilitating the operations of merchants of good faith, and simplifying the present financial system, which has become exceedingly complicated, is the formation of a new custom tariff, based upon principles in accordance with the express precepts of the constitution. With the spirit of the age, and with the most trivial diatribes of political economy, according to which it is now obvious that the augmentation of revenue does not depend so much upon the increase of duties, which only serves as a pretext for smuggling, but in the development of mercantile transactions, which cannot avoid increasing very considerably under the impulse that will be afforded by the present system, and above all, taking care that the tariff now to be adopted shall be uniformly and invariably carried into effect in all the maritime custom-houses of the republic with the view of preventing merchandise being received in some ports at lower duties than at others, by which trade suffers, to the prejudice of merchants of good faith, and further inducements are offered for smuggling.

With the desire of carrying out this important reform, which is required both by the interests of the executive and those of the commerce of the republic, the government has named a commission composed of citizens of acknowledged ability, acquired by long experience both as employes and as merchants, which is charged with the formation of a project for the new tariff. The cardinal basis on which the same should rest is, in the conception of the government, the establishment of solely importation dues higher than those now existing, in order to reassume therein all the additional duties now collected; the raising of prohibitions, but putting duties on those articles now prohibited, in order to protect national industry; the adoption of the metro-decimal system, which should have ruled in the republic long since; the abolition of administrative litigations, in which the executive now acts as judge and plaintiff; and perhaps the establishment of a port of deposit on the Pacific, which it appears is required both by the special necessities of that coast and the interests of the government.

The public debt has, without dispute, been the principal difficulty with which former administrations have had to struggle hitherto, and it may be said, without exaggeration, that it served as a pretext for the French intervention which we have just overcame. This is not the moment to examine the origin, circumstances, and amount of the debt; it is sufficient to state that certain European nations, availing themselves of our want of experience, and more especially of our debility, of which we had a false idea, imposed upon us obligations the fulfillment of which was almost incompatible with our existence as an independent nation, in the understanding that they deprived us of the principal and most valuable part of our revenues, without which it was not possible for us to meet the most urgent expenses of administration. At the same time, and forming an essential part of their programme, they imposed upon us, as an international debt, that which by its origin, and in accordance with every principle of equity and justice, universally recognized by all nations, could not have any other character than that of a national debt, in which no foreign power ought to have any kind of interference. This false policy produced the results which were inevitably to follow: the national government found itself deprived of the indispensable resources for the preservation of public order, and without these, with the assignments made to foreign nations, it was impossible to pay even the interest on the debt. The exigencies of these powers arrived at a really intolerable point, and at last produced a misunderstanding fatal to them, but which has had for us the beneficial result of freeing ourselves from the tutelage under which we had been laboring, and of giving us the consciousness of our own strength, and the determination of defending our rights against every kind of influence and aggression, both abroad and at home.

The European nations that made war upon us, or lent their moral support to our invaders, by recognizing the order of things which the French intervention attempted to establish in the republic, broke by this act the treaties that bound them to us. Not on this account do we pretend to disacknowledge the obligation of paying the legitimate creditors of the republic, and we can assure them that their position has never been more favorable than at present, considering that there has never existed so great a probability on such well-founded hopes of consolidating the peace of Mexico as now.

Availing itself of the rights given by this new situation, and animates with a sincere desire to comply with all the legitimate obligations of the republic, the government has also decided upon the mode of paying off gradually, as the circumstances may permit, the national debt, whether consolidated or floating. A fund of not less than fifty thousand dollars per month has been dedicated to the redemption, at public auction, of the bonds of our consolidated debt. The government desires that within a few days the first sale should take place of the bonds of the extinguished Spanish and English conventions, from certain funds found in the possession of the former agents of these bond-holders, and which the government is engaged in recovering to distribute the same, in the way in which it is proposed to redeem its debt. Accounts will also be demanded from these agents, of the sums they received during the so-called empire, and of the coupons paid, so as to liquidate what may be owing. If, as may be expected, this plan should produce good results, within a few years we shall have redeemed much of our debt, and in this way we shall have radically removed the constant motives we have heretofore had for difficulties with European nations. If these powers should desire to renew their relations with us under different bases from those subsisting formerly, we shall have ceased to have cause for differences with Western Europe.

The republic neither can, nor ought, in any shape, recognize the obligations which the Emperor of the French attempted to force upon her by means of his intervention in our domestic affairs. The government cannot find language sufficiently strong to express the force of its determination in this respect; neither can it acknowledge any of the obligations contracted through the order of things which the Emperor of the French endeavored to establish in Mexico. Government has also declared that it will not recognize either, as a legitimate claim against the nation, the damages and losses occasioned to foreigners or natives by the invader or his allies in the war of intervention. But, on the other hand, it is considered to be very just to recognize to the citizens who have contributed with their property towards the continuation of the war against the foreign invader those claims they may have against the federal treasury, as also to the patriots who have been for all this period in the civil or military service of the government, the balances that may be due them for the time they did not receive their pay. If not being possible, however, to pay off all these obligations at once, government has dictated the measures by which they may be recognized, liquidated and paid. The decree of the 10th November regulates the mode in which such recognition and liquidation shall be effected. The offices intrusted with carrying these operations into practice have been already organized, and are now in actual exercise of their functions. When their labors are concluded, a general statement will be presented to congress comprehending those claims recognized and liquidated.

The decree of the 30th November of the same year ordains that from the month of May forward a fund shall be separated of not less than thirty thousand dollars, nor more than fifty thousand dollars, monthly, destined to the redemption of the interior debt, in which is of course included both the consolidated and floating debt. Government proposes to carry out these measures, dictated by itself, with all scrupulousness, and which, in its judgment, constitute the most equitable and efficacious means of redeeming the whole of the debt in the course of a few years.

Government is of opinion that it would be convenient to consolidate the floating debt of the nation upon an equitable basis. Promise has been made to effect this, and with this view attention is now being given to this important matter, which will have so much influence upon the national credit, and when these labors are concluded they will be submitted to congress for their determination. The completion of our financial system and of order in the revenues will be, in the opinion of the government, the suppression of special funds, and of assignments of a similar nature. We cannot have a system founded upon firm and solid bases, until we succeed in establishing an office that shall be the only one for distributions, and which shall keep accounts current with all branches.

There are, moreover, other reforms of a secondary nature, which may be classed as regulation orders, and which government will endeavor to establish in the offices of the federation according as it may be possible to do so, and which will be indicated by the regulations themselves. Among these will be comprehended the prohibition of receiving orders for payment, compensations and much less assignments in the collectors' offices. Also that the general treasury of the district and the financial agencies in the States shall make no other payments than those decreed by the estimate, and on all occasions by a previous order from the department of finance, whose care will be to limit the same to each separate case. On publishing the estimate, the department of finance will form, in accordance with the branches included therein, the system of accounts to be established in the general treasury, to combine clearness and simplicity with the security of the public interests and all responsibility of the employes. For the offices of financial agents a form of accounts will be adopted, which, besides uniting the preceding requisites, shall produce the result of that uniformity which is now wanting.

This is an abstract of the situation of our financial affairs. Up to the present, every thing possible has been done towards the improvements, and promising results have already been obtained. Government has the expectation of making further improvements hereafter, counting upon the efficacious and wise co-operation of congress, to whom the constitution has given the faculty of approving the estimate and decreeing contributions.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

City of Mexico, February 12, 1868.

SIR: As a matter of further information, I transmit to the department herewith translation of correspondence that has taken place between this government and the representatives here of the creditors under the Spanish convention debt. While the action taken by the Mexican government with reference to this debt is the same as that with regard to the English convention debt referred to in my dispatch No. 65, of the 13th ultimo, the correspondence now transmitted sets forth more fully the nature of the obligations asserted to exist by the creditors under those conventions.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

It has reached the knowledge of the President of the republic that there exists in your possession $38,000 proceeding from the Spanish convention, and which you propose to distribute. By his order you are prohibited from carrying into effect such distribution, and you are directed to hold the said sum at the disposition of the supreme government until it shall think proper to otherwise order.

No. 2.

[Translation.]

The undersigned, members of the permanent committee of the fund of the Spanish convention, before your excellency respectfully set forth :

That Mr. Miguel Buch has had the honor of receiving, and has passed to us, the note dated the 22d instant, in which you have been pleased to state that it has reached the knowledge of the President that there exists in the possession of the agent $38,000 proceeding from the Spanish convention, which it is proposed to distribute; and it is required that such distribution shall be suspended, and that the said sum shall be placed at the disposition of the supreme government. We have to believe that the said supreme disposition has been obtained by means of false or erroneous information. It is our duty to rectify the same, and for that purpose it will be permitted to us to state some antecedents of this affair, and to refer to the true facts as they have occurred.

By articles 3 and 4 of the convention, adjusted between the governments of Mexico and Spain on the 12th of November, 1853, ratified by the former government on the 22d of the same month, and by the latter on the 30th of May, 1854, the supreme government obliges itself to pay to the Spanish creditors the credits which they represented, allowing an interest of three per cent. per annum, payable half yearly, from the 14th of August, 1852, as stipulated in the convention of the 14th of November, 1851, and allowing also five per cent. per annum for the redemption of the principal. To cover these two sums the supreme government assigned eight per cent. of the product of the duties of importation caused in the custom-houses established in the ports of the republic. It was also stipulated that the general treasury should pay the said eight per cent., delivering its amount in drafts to the agents named by the creditors, without the necessity of any further orders, the one then given being sufficient, and of which a copy was passed to the representative of her Catholic Majesty that it form part of the convention. In virtue of this contract a general meeting of the creditors, presided over by the minister of her Catholic Majesty, established regulations, of which we inclose a copy, for the direction and administration of the fund; and some time afterwards Mr. Buch was appointed to discharge the duties of agents and the undersigned as member, of the permanent committee. This appointment was made in November, 1860, and it is therefore not true that the agent has been appointed by the government of the empire, as mistakenly or maliciously has been stated to the minister of treasury.

As stipulated in the convention, the agent and the permanent committee have limited themselves, in the years that have passed, solely by the receiving of the eight per cent. of the products of the maritime custom-houses, without making any innovation upon the terms of the convention, and without entering into any contract with the government of the empire.

The $34,184 86 which exist are the remainder of the sums received, which, it is proper to remark, have not been distributed, both because a part consists in drafts which, it has not been possible to collect, and because the amount is not sufficient to cover the one per cent. due on account of the sixteenth dividend, which coupon has been cut from the bonds and is held in the safe of the agency.

From what has been stated it will be seen that the said sum belongs in full property to the creditors, that it has been received by their agent in part payment of what is due to them from the nation, and that in consequence it does not belong to the treasury, as has been maliciously denounced to the department under your worthy charge. We are aware that the denouncer complains that the committee and the agent do not distribute the funds of the convention equally among the creditors. Such complaint, however, is without foundation, and only has for its object to obtain undue preferences, as it will be easy to demonstrate.

Convinced that the means that have been employed by the party interested, to obtain advantages to the prejudice of the majority of the creditors, will not exercise any influence in the just mind of the President, or in the integrity and intelligence of yourself, we beg you to have the goodness to entreat him to consent to withdraw the supreme order of the 22d instant.

In concluding this statement we have to make known to you that in the archives of the committee there exist paid coupons to the amount of over $1,000,000, which we have held, and are at the disposal of the constitutional government, trusting that it will be pleased to give its orders that they may be delivered in the general treasury in conformity with the convention. Wherefore we beg that you will be pleased to direct in conformity with what we have asked, in which we will receive favor and justice.

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 2.

The citizen President has well-founded motives for considering insubsistent the treaties which united Mexico with the powers who disowned the republican government of this country, and recognized the so-called imperial government which the French intervention pretended to establish, it being those powers who by such conduct broke said treaties.

As among those treaties figures the Spanish convention, it is in the same case as any of the others, and must, in consequence, be considered as insubsistent. The government, however, does not for this deny the obligation of the national treasury to pay the legitimate and recognized titles of this extinguished convention. All that it denies is that such obligation retains an international character, and that the terms of payment stipulated in a no longer existing arrangement should subsist.

In virtue of the liberty which it now has to fix these terms as may appear best, it has considered it convenient to determine that the redemption of the titles of the extinguished Spanish convention be proceeded with by public auctions. The first of these auctions will be held with the fund of $34,184 86, which is in the possession of yourselves or of Mr. Buch, being the balance of the sums received from the eight per cent. of the products of the maritime custom-houses, and which you will deliver immediately into the general treasury.

The subsequent auctions will be held with the funds which will be opportunely designated, there being only and exclusively admissible for this redemption the titles of the extinguished Spanish convention recognized as legitimate by the republican government, which protested against the Mon-Almonte treaty, and preferring for the redemption of those titles which are tendered by the most favorable bidder, i. e., those that are offered at the lowest price.

As in the communication which, on the 29th of October last, you addressed to this department, and to which the present serves as reply, you stated that in the archives which are under your charge there exist paid coupons to the value of more than a million of dollars, you will be pleased to deliver the same into the general treasury, together with the respective accounts of the principal and interest of the extinguished Spanish convention.

By direction of the President I communicate the same to you for your intelligence and the consequent ends.

CITIZEN MINISTER: At 12 o'clock to-day has been delivered to us the supreme order you have been pleased to address to us under date of the 21st instant, requiring of us that the agency of the Spanish convention deliver into the general treasury the $34,184 86, now on hand in cash and in drafts.

As such disposition is of grave importance to our constituents, we have not the authority to decide in the case, and it is indispensable to convoke a general meeting of the parties interested, in order to inform them of the said supreme order.

We therefore pray you to be pleased to suspend the execution of the said disposition, in order to afford us a proper time to call and hold a meeting of the creditors, as is our duty.

In the same we will receive favor and justice.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 2

I have given an account to the President of your petition of the 24th instant, in which you ask the suspension of the execution of the order of the 21st instant with reference to the delivery into the general treasury of the funds and liquidations belonging to the extinguished Spanish convention.

The President, in view of said petition, has directed me to say to you that, for the reasons expressed in the said order, the supreme government is resolved that what was therein determined must be complied with, and he expects that you, on your part, will be pleased to give due acquiescence in what pertains to you.

By his order I communicate the same to you for the consequent ends.

[Translation.]

In compliance with what we had the honor to state to the minister of the treasury in our memorial of the 24th of December last, and with what our regulations prescribe, we have called a general meeting of the creditors of the Spanish convention, in order to inform them of the resolution taken by the President, and they have unanimously agreed in authorizing us to employ all legal means for the purpose of demonstrating the justice that sustains us, at the same time with all respect to the supreme orders. As one of the means that is proper is that of representation, we may be permitted to set forth some reasons in defense of the interests committed to our charge.

His excellency the minister, in the supreme order of the 21st of December last, has been pleased to state that the President has well-founded motives for considering as insubsistent the treaties that unite Mexico with the powers who, after having recognized the government of the republic, recognized also the imperial government attempted to be established by the French intervention, it being those powers who broke the treaties, among which figures the Spanish convention.

It does not belong to us to discuss the conduct observed by our government in entering into relations with the imperial authorities, and much less to attempt to define the effects that this act may have produced, but we think we can assume that the Spanish convention of the 12th of November, 1853, ratified on the 30th of May, 1854, subsists and should be complied with.

It is well known that among the writers upon international law the question has been discussed whether the rule, that war puts an end to all treaties between the contracting powers, has not some exceptions, and the greater number agree that there are cases of exception, and even cite some examples.

We believe that there has not been war between Spain and Mexico, but only a suspension of relations, which we indulged the hope would be of short duration. But whether there may have been a state of war between the one nation and the other, or a suspension of relations that may be assumed to put an end to treaties, properly so-called as those of friendship, alliance, or commerce, which relate to general and permanent interests, the same cannot be the case with conventions like the Spanish, which only relate to the interests of private individuals, and which, if adjusted between the two governments of Spain and of Mexico, was only to assure more firmly what was stipulated with reference to such interests. The obligation contracted between the parties celebrating the convention did not remain dependent or subject to the political occurrences that might take place. The convention is nothing more than a contract between the government of the republic and that of her Catholic Majesty, by which the former performed an act of justice by assigning a part of the product of her maritime custom-houses during a term of years for the payment of the sums due to Spanish subjects, and the latter agreed that its subjects should accept the delay in payment in consideration of said assignment.

If the convention was at an end, the creditors would recover immediately the unquestionable right of asking the payment in full of their credits, as the arrangement would be at an end by which they agreed to wait and to accept annual payments. We make use of this circumstance to demonstrate the justice with which we claim that the convention is still in force, and that we do not in any manner admit that it has been terminated.

It must have been so understood by his excellency the minister, and for this reason, without doubt, in the said supreme order he was pleased to state that the republic recognizes the obligation of paying the sums due to the Spanish creditors, but that a sum would be assigned for the purchase of said credits at public auction. We believe, however, that the purchase of credits at public auction is legal only when it is so stipulated between creditor and debtor; but if the latter imposes the same by force he does not comply with his obligations, but pays less than what he owes, injures a right legitimately acquired, and attacks that of property in violation of the principles set forth in all of the constitutions which have ruled in this country from that of 1812 to that of 1857, and in all foreign legislation which have laid down the principle of the inviolability of private property. No law authorizes the debtor to fix the mode of payment of his obligation after the same have once been admitted and recognized.

In the present case, although the supreme government merits all respect and due consideration, it has the character of a contracting party, as the state in the matter of contracts individualizes itself and is subject to the civil law.

It is also equally certain that the public auction of credits can only take place when it is so agreed, and that in article 7 of the Spanish convention it is stipulated that of the eight per cent. assigned in article 3, there shall be paid first the three per cent. of interest accrued, and the remaining five per cent. shall be applied to the redemption of the capital, making this by public auction to the best bidder, and fixing as a minimum price the rate of one hundred dollars in coin for one hundred and thirty dollars in bonds.

In the present case, no auction for the redemption of capital could be proceeded with, because there remains unpaid the interest of more than seven years.

To the reasons already set forth we believe it convenient to add a fact, which should receive the respectable attention of the President and incline his just mind to direct the revocation of the said supreme order of the 21st of December, 1867.

By articles 3 and 4 of the convention of 1853, the Mexican government engaged to pay to the Spanish creditors three per cent. annually of interest, and five per cent. of redemption of the consolidated capital, assigning, for the purpose of meeting this obligation, eight per cent. of the duties of importation collected in the ports of the republic, and authorizing the agent of the convention to receive directly from the custom-houses the sum so assigned.

It was also stipulated that if the said eight per cent. should not be sufficient for the payment of the interest and redemption of principal, the general treasury, without the necessity of any further order, should annually cover the deficit with the first drafts received from the maritime custom-houses.

According to this stipulation there should to-day be covered all of the interest, and some of the principal redeemed. But neither has the interest been covered, nor has a single dollar of the capital been redeemed, nor has the general treasury covered any of the deficit.

Notwithstanding this, the creditors have not said a single word, nor have they addressed the slightest complaint to the government of the republic for the non-compliance with the stipulation of article 4, but they have taken into consideration the difficult circumstances in which the country has been placed, and have kept silent, to the prejudice of their interests.

The thirty thousand dollars and upwards that in coin and drafts exist in the agency, and that it has been ordered shall be returned, are applicable to the sixteenth coupon, which fell due in the month of February of 1860, and which debt is therefore of the epoch of the government of the republic.

The circumstance that our government held regulations with that of the empire should not operate to the prejudice of the creditors, who neither directly nor indirectly had any part in said relations, nor in the intervention. In receiving from the custom-houses the eight per cent. which the government of the republic assigned them, they exercised only a legitimate right, disposing of money which belonged to them in full property. By such act they have not committed any fault whatever, nor can they merit the penalty of returning the $34,184 86 applicable to the payment of overdue interest.

For the reasons that have been expressed, we have again to solicit that you will be pleased to appeal to the President to accord that the said order of the 21st of December may be revoked.

If, as we trust may not be the case, its revocation be denied, the committee and the agent believe it to be their imperative duty to protest before the supreme government, with all due respect, that in making the delivery of the $34,184 86, which, in money some time collected, and in drafts awaiting payment, they hold, destined to the payment of coupons due more than seven years back, they make such delivery under compulsion and pressure of the supreme authority.

SIR: Referring to my dispatches Nos. 65 and 77, and the correspondence inclosed therewith, I have now to transmit, for the information of the department, translations from the Diario Oficial, showing that the steps proposed to be taken by this government with regard to the funds in the hands of the agents of the bondholders, under the English and Spanish convention debts, have been carried into effect, and that the public sale therein referred to has taken place.

Translations of the final replies of the agents of the bondholders are also transmitted herewith.

I have not yet learned of any provision having been made for the payment of the principal of, or the interest upon, American claims.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 2.

By the communications which, under this date, I have addressed to Messrs. José María Bassoco, Raymundo Mora, and Casimiro Collado, and to Messrs. Barron, Forbes & Co., of which I inclosed to you a copy, you will be informed of what the President has determined with reference to the extinguished English and Spanish conventions.

In conformity with what is directed in said communications, you will proceed without delay to hold two public auctions, one of the titles of the extinguished English convention, and the other of the titles of the extinguished Spanish convention; the first, with the $29,649 80, which are to be delivered to you by Messrs. Barron, Forbes & Co., and the second, with the $34,184 86, which are to be delivered to you by Messrs. Bassoco, Mora, and Collado.

For the subsequent auctions there will be set apart, until the sovereign congress shall otherwise provide, a monthly sum, which shall not be less than $40,000 nor more than $60,000, which shall commence to be so set apart from the coming month of January, 1868, in the administration of sealed paper, from the product of the twenty per cent. of the federal contribution.

In case these products are not sufficient to furnish the sum designated, what is lacking will be supplied from the other funds of the treasury.

As the said sum is designed for the successive redemption of all of the titles of the foreign debt, recognized as valid and legitimate, this department will opportunely fix the partial sums to be taken from the general amount, for the redemption of the said titles, according to the categories into which they are divided.

With reference to the values and the accounts which are to be delivered to you, you will proceed to collect the same without delay, forming afterwards the respective liquidations, which you will remit to this department as soon as possible.

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 2.

Under date of the 21st of December last, this department transmitted to you copies of the communications addressed to the agents of the bondholders under the extinguished Spanish and English conventions, requiring them to deliver into the general treasury certain funds in their possession destined for the payment of interest and redemption of said bonds, in order that by the general treasury the same should be distributed in the manner directed by the President for the redemption of this debt. At the same time the necessary instructions were given to you to proceed to hold public auctions for the sale of said funds.

The agents of the extinguished conventions opposed some difficulties for the delivery of these funds; and the change which has lately taken place in the personnel of this department has occasioned that the funds are not yet delivered, and that none of the auctions which it was directed should be held have yet taken place.

The President having again taken this subject into consideration, in council of ministers, after having heard the motives alleged by the late agents for not making immediately the delivery that was required of them, has determined, with the concurrence of his cabinet, to proceed with what had previously been ordered.

In consequence thereof, you will proceed to notify this determination to the house of Messrs. Miguel, Burch & Co., which is where there exists $34,186 86 belonging to the fund of the extinguished Spanish convention, and to the house of Messrs. Barron, Forbes & Co., who have $29,649 08 belonging to the fund of the extinguished English convention.

Immediately that they make known to you their conformity for the delivery of these funds, you will proceed, without loss of time, to hold the auctions, augmenting them with such sum as the circumstances of the treasury may permit, to the end that these auctions may be for the largest possible sum.

It will not be necessary that the material delivery of these funds shall take place, as once that the depositories have manifested that they are disposed to deliver them they can remain in their hands as a deposit, in order to be delivered by them to whomsoever shall acquire them in the sale, and in whose favor the general treasury will issue the corresponding orders.

It appears unnecessary to recommend to you again that, in the auction for the bonds of the extinguished Spanish convention, only those that are legitimate can be received. The auctions will take place with all the formalities of law.

This department understands that a part of said funds are in drafts due but not collected. In order that the auction may take place as soon as possible, you will lend your most efficacious co-operation to the collection of the unpaid drafts, using, if it is necessary, the compulsory faculties possessed by your office.

By direction of the President you will also demand from the said houses, or from the persons in whose possession they may be, the paid coupons and redeemed bonds, in order that they may be canceled by the general treasury, and also a detailed account of the sums which, during the time of the so-called empire, were received as interest or for the redemption of capital of the bonds of the extinguished Spanish and English conventions.

You will also exact the same data from the persons who are or have been the agents of the bondholders under the extinguished French convention.

I communicate the same to you for your most punctual compliance.

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 2.

Although article 1 of the law of the 30th of November, 1867, provided that the auctions for the redemption of the interior debt of the nation should commence in the month of March proximo, the citizen President, desiring that the same shall commence even before the date fixed, in order to manifest in this manner his desire to pay the creditors of the treasury as early as possible, has been pleased to direct that the first of these auctions shall take place on the 12th instant, to which shall be assigned the sum of ten thousand dollars, and in which shall be received only certificates of an amount less than one thousand dollars, of those issued by the liquidating bureau of the national floating debt, in conformity with the provisions of article 16 of the law of the 19th of November, 1867.

The President also desires that, on the 10th instant, there shall take place the first auction for the redemption of the bonds of the extinguished English and Spanish conventions, to which the communication of this department of the 1st instant refers, assigning for this auction a fund of $90,000, including the $73,000 and a little over, which exist in the hands of the late agents of said bonds.

You will take care that this fund of $90,000 shall be divided between the bonds called Spanish and English, in proportion to the amount represented by the total of each one of those two classes of bonds.

In this way there will be applied in the present month $100,000 to the redemption of the public debt, and the President expects that in the subsequent months there can be applied to this object an equal or a greater sum.

In compliance with the supreme order which, under this date, you have been pleased to address to me, that on the 10th instant the first auction, with the fund of $90,000 for the redemption of the bonds of the extinguished English and Spanish conventions, shall take place, I have directed the printing and posting of the respective notices; but for the greater accuracy of this general treasury in the auctions, I beg that you will be pleased to ask from the department of foreign relations, and remit to this treasury, the marginal record which remains there of the bonds placed in circulation belonging to the said conventions, as without the same it will not be easy to distinguish the good from the false, that are, perhaps, in circulation.

I also beg that you will be pleased to resolve whether in the auction there is to be taken into account only the value of the principal of the bonds, or if the interest is to be calculated and added thereto; advising me of the date up to which the same is to be reckoned.

There has been received in this department your official note of this date, No. 48, in which you request that this department shall ask from that of foreign relations, and remit to the treasury, the marginal record which remains there of the bonds, which were placed in circulation under the extinguished English and Spanish conventions, in order to distinguish the legitimate from the illegal; and you inquire whether, in the auction of said bonds, which is ordered for the 10th instant, there shall be considered only the value of the capital which they represent, or if the interest shall be capitalized, and up to what date this shall be calculated.

I have to-day asked from the department of foreign relations the marginal records you desire, and immediately that they are received they will be sent to the treasury.

With respect to the inquiries that you make, I have to state that the President directs that the unpaid interest on the bonds sold shall be capitalized, computing the same up to the date of the auction.

In a supreme order of to-day the minister of treasury and public credit says to me, among other things, as follows:

"The President also desires that on the 10th instant there shall take place the first auction for the redemption of the bonds of the extinguished English and Spanish conventions, to which the communication of this department of the 1st instant refers, assigning for this auction a fund of ninety thousand dollars, including the seventy three thousand dollars and a little over, which exist in the hands of the late agents of said bonds.

"You will take care that this fund of ninety thousand dollars shall be divided between the bonds called Spanish and English in proportion to the amount represented by the total of each one of those two classes of bonds.

"In this way there will be applied in the present month one hundred thousand dollars to the redemption of the public debt, and the President expects that in the subsequent months there can be applied to this object an equal or a greater sum."

MEXICO, February 4, 1868.

SIR: By your communication of the 3d instant we are informed that, by virtue of the order of the minister of the treasury, which you insert, we have to make the delivery of the funds of the English convention, be the same in money or in drafts, as likewise the accounts of the convention.

From the literal tenor of the order it appears that our conformity has to be manifested, and that "it will not be necessary that the material delivery of the funds should take place, as once that the manifestation is made by the depositories of their being disposed to deliver them, they can remain in their possession."

But as, notwithstanding these terminant dispositions, your office understands that we are to proceed with the delivery, we have respectfully to indicate to you that, as determined in the meeting of the creditors, the owners of these funds consider themselves prejudiced by the delivery referred to, and they have instructed us to make it in their name only under the unavoidable necessity of obeying orders which the government of the republic has not been pleased to revoke, notwithstanding our repeated solicitations.

We have the honor to be your bedient servants,

BARRON, FORBES & CO.

The Treasurer General M. P. IZAGUIRRE.

The treasurer general has transcribed to Mr. Miguel Buch the supreme order of the 1st instant, relative to the delivery of the funds of the Spanish convention.

As the said supreme order has been published in the "Diario Oficial," and in it it is stated that immediately that the agents manifest their conformity for the delivery of the funds he will proceed to hold the auctions, we fear that the Spanish government and our constituents may believe that we have not fulfilled the duty imposed upon us by the trust which we have accepted.

That circumstance obliges us to reproduce the expositions in which we have sustained the subsistence of the Spanish convention, and endeavored to convince the supreme government that the fund which exists in the agency belongs, in full dominion, to the creditors who have received it, by means of their attorney, in part payment of interest due for nearly eight years.

For the same reasons it is proper for us to reproduce, also, the solemn protest which we made in the second memorial, dated the 4th of January last, that we had not been, and that we are not, conformable to the delivery of the fund, and that, if the committee submits to the disposition of the supreme government, it is under compulsion and the pressure of the several orders they have received, and in all cases holding in reserve the rights which they represent.

In order to cover at all times our responsibility, we beg that you will be pleased to direct that there be issued to us, from the department under your worthy charge, certified copies of the present and of our previous expositions.

We also beg that you will be pleased to direct that the said expositions be published, in order that in the publication that has been made the documents may appear complete.

Wherefore we beg that you will accede to our petition, in which we will receive justice.

In reply to your official note dated the 3d, in which you insert the supreme order of the 1st instant, relative to the delivery of the funds belonging to the creditors under the Spanish convention, I have to make known to you that the said funds are at your disposal, but not because there is a conformity to their delivery, as not only the permanent committee but the agency have protested before the supreme government that if the delivery is made it is only under the pressure and compulsion of the supreme orders that they have received.

The net sum which exists in my possession, deducting a trifling charge prior to the note of the 21st of last October, is $33,984 86, and I have to request that in disposing of the same you will do so in one sum, as for special reasons it will not be possible for me to make the several payments to which you refer

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches Nos. 70 and 72, of the 24th and 28th of January last, respectively, with reference to the foreign merchants of San Luis Potosi, imprisoned by the authorities of that State for refusing to pay a forced loan, and to their subsequent release.

I have to express satisfaction with the prudent action of the Mexican government in causing their liberation, and a hope that a recurrence of such measures as those adopted by the State government will not take place. Your proceedings in the matter are approved.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to the department herewith copy and translations of two communications in Spanish, under date of the 5th and 9th ultimo, which reached me on the 17th instant, from the consul at Merida, Mr. R. Juanes y Patrullo, and with which he incloses copy of a decree of which he complains, issued by the governor of the State of Yucatan, closing the port of Sisal in consequence of the reactionary movement which occurred at Merida on the 11th of December last.

I also transmit herewith copy and translation of the said decree, and a copy of my reply to Mr. Patrullo, which I trust will meet with your approval.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES AT MERIDA AND SISAL,
Merida, January 5, 1868.

hasten to address myself to you, informing you that by virtue of a political movement effected in this city on the 10th of December last, and which had for its result solely a personal change in the government of this State, the expelled governor has launched from the neighboring State of Campeche a decree which cannot but produce the gravest injury to the commerce and interests of the United States, if the supreme government of the republic does not speedily take the necessary measures to avert the evils which the tenor of the decree annexed hereto, already mentioned, is producing to foreign commerce.

The neighboring State of Campeche has taken part in favor of the expelled governor, and some days since there arrived in the waters of Sisal several small armed vessels of war to impede all mercantile movements.

The line of American steamers which for some time has been established between New York and Vera Cruz, touching at the port of Sisal, will be affected by this more sensibly than that of any other nation, as there is carried on by these vessels quite an active commerce between New York and Sisal.

Until instructions are communicated to me, that have to govern the conduct that I should pursue in these cases, I believe it to be my duty to pass to the port of Sisal, as the American steamer by which this letter will be sent, is momentarily expected, and to protest in due form in case the flotilla does not permit the steamer to enter.

The governors of the Mexican States having no faculties to decree laws of the tenor of the decree referred to, it is desirable that the American nation should not allow such abuses of authority to pass unnoticed whenever, as in the present case, they operate to the prejudice of the interests of our nation.

In this unfortunate country, where there is no other law than that of force, there have been imposed, more than once, forced loans upon American citizens established in it, and as no governor has ever been admonished to faithfully comply with the tenor of the treaties existing between the two republics, all, without exception, follow the same example of disregarding said treaties, the only protection that foreigners resident in this country have.

I beg you will take what I have said into consideration, and at the same time excuse me that I write to you in my native language, in violation of the circular of the 1st of June, 1853, issued by the Department of State.

I protest to you my consideration and respect.

R. JUANES Y PATRULLO,
United States Consul.

The Hon. MINISTER OF THE UNITED STATES, Mexico.

[Translation of decree.]

Manuel Cepeda Peraza, general of brigade, governor and military commandant of the State of Yucatan, to the inhabitants of the same maketh known: that in use of the ample faculties with which I am invested, I have thought proper to decree, and do decree, the following:

ARTICLE 1. The port of Sisal is hereby closed to the foreign and coasting trade, until it returns to obedience to the supreme government from which it has separated by the act of seconding the anti-national movement, which took place in Merida, on the morning of the 11th instant.

ART. 2. Vessels which have been dispatched, or which in future may be dispatched, for said port, will proceed to the adjacent port of Campeche, where their discharge and other custom-house operations will take place.

ART. 3. The duties which are paid on the importation or exportation of effects made in violation of this decree shall be considered as unpaid, and the violators will remain subject to the payment again of the duties caused without prejudice to such other penalties as are imposed in this case by the general ordinance relating thereto.

Wherefore, I order this to be printed, published, and circulated for its due compliance.

Dated at Jalacho, the 14th of December, 1867.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES AT MERIDA AND SISAL,
Merida, January 9, 1868.

MR. MINISTER: The American steamer, which in my preceding communication I stated was to arrive from New York, reached the port of Sisal on the 6th instant. Before arriving at the anchorage the flotilla of the State of Campeche sent a boat on board, and without any doubt informed the captain that he could not enter, as the port was declared closed, and, without communicating with the shore, he continued on his voyage to Vera Cruz.

To avoid the necessity of this vessel taking back to New York the cargo brought for the port of Sisal, I beg you, if you can do so, to order that a war vessel of our nation come to these waters to prevent the flotilla from placing any impediment in the way of American vessels. Only in this manner can the injuries be averted, which not only the steamers of this line but also the commerce of New York will suffer, unless a speedy determination is taken.

I repeat to you my profound respect and consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: Your two communications of the 5th and 9th of January reached me only on the 17th instant.

As the rebellion in Yucatan has now happily been suppressed by the commendable vigor of this government, it is unnecessary for me to enter into the questions relating thereto, raised in your letters.

It is very clear the interests of our commerce with this country will be promoted, if this government shall be able, as I trust will be the case hereafter, promptly to crush all attempts that may be made to subvert the constitutional order.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, February 24, 1868.

SIR: I have purposely, thus far since my arrival here, refrained from making any allusion in my communications to the department, to the many reports which from time to time are circulated in this country, and and are sent abroad, of reactionary movements, or of public disorders of more or less importance, in various parts of the republic.

In most cases these reports, are speedily proved to be fabrications, and such movements as may occur have no political importance, because they can attain no practical end.

The struggle this republic has just passed through has been too vital, and the principles involved in the triumph achieved by the cause of republican constitutional government too important, and necessarily deep seated, for there to be even a possibility for some considerable time, at least, of any serious political change originating within itself.

It would seem to have been demonstrated that no government is now possible here except the constitutional form of government, and it would therefore clearly appear to be for the interest not only of this country, but of all who may have relations with it, that that government should be maintained. Any reactionary or other anti-constitutional movement now, whether originating abroad or within the republic, must be simply an attack upon public order, and a direct injury to the creditors of this country, and all who seek to have commerce with it.

Upon the success of this people in maintaining order and security, and achieving progress under the form of government they have definitively adopted, depends not merely their national existence, but all immediate prospect of the payment of their obligations, and the possibility of any development of their commerce.

For the solution of this question of their capacity in this regard, which is being determined, it would also appear clearly desirable that a full, fair and free time of trial should be afforded without opposition, but rather with encouragement from all quarters. It would appear to be in the common interest that any attempted movement against the constitutional order should receive severe reprobation abroad, and that the constitutional authorities should be stimulated, and, so far as may be legitimately practicable, aided to vigorously repress all such movements.

The recent reactionary movement in Yucatan, which commenced on the 11th of December last, upon the landing there of a certain number of the imperialist refugees who have been congregated at Havana, appears to have had its only inspiration and support from that source.

Availing by surprise of the port of Sisal and the city of Merida, where the constitutional governor, Pedraza, had but an insignificant military force, they succeeded in driving him from the latter place, and in momentarily organizing there a simulated form of government.

The distance required to march troops to Vera Cruz, and the necessity of transporting them across the gulf, consumed some time before this government could bring its force to bear against the movement. But it has acted in this instance with most commendable vigor, and the forces it sent were no sooner landed at Campeche than they were marched at once upon Merida, and at the first onset crushed the insurrection entirely, killing in the actions that occurred the principal leaders of the hopeless movement.

This affair might pass without further notice were there not some reason to believe that in the plots originated at Havana, among the refugees who have asylum there, were ramifications which embraced the resort to assassination as a means of accomplishing their ends. The plot has been so crude, however, and has had so little practical shape, except perhaps the purpose of a few depraved and reckless individuals, that there has been little chance of its execution. Yet it reached the knowledge of this government some time since, and on the morning of the 17th instant four individuals were arrested in this city, three subordinate officers formerly in the so-called imperial service, and a colonel in the present service, who was the officer of the day; and evidence was discovered, I am informed, showing the existence of a conspiracy that was to have taken effect that night, to assassinate the President, the governor of the city, and several of the members of the cabinet, but with what fixed or settled political aim thereafter does not appear, although it is stated a prominent reactionary general was expected to reach the city simultaneously with this movement. The whole affair, however, appears to have had so limited extent here, and to have been of so doubtful accomplishment, except as any individual may find an opportunity to commit the crime of assassination, that it has rather a criminal character solely, than political importance.

The individuals arrested are now undergoing a military trial, by means of which, it is stated, the proofs will be made public.

Rumored movements that were to be attempted at Tampico and at other points, all having a common origin with the refugees congregated at Havana, were part of the schemes which, by the prompt suppression of the affair in Yucatan, and the arrest of the conspirators here, have now come entirely to an end.

There remain pending two movements of some magnitude, which are exclusively of domestic origin, and arise from local questions regarding the governorship, respectively, of the States of Sinaloa and of Guerrero.

The government, which is acting with energy, and appears to be actuated by the fixed determination to use all the military force and all the resources of the national authority to put an end to these attempts to resort to local revolution as a means of redress for local grievances, as also to all other attempts against the constitutional order, has already commenced the movement of troops to the State of Sinaloa, and is preparing to send a force to the State of Guerrero.

There is little doubt both these movements, as well as any others, should they occur, will be speedily put down, but these efforts cost time and money that should be only required for the work of reorganization and material development.

The people of this country long for peace and security. No new political flag can now be raised with any possible chance of success. Only a few refractory leaders who may have ranked with the liberals during the recent struggle, and the reactionary plotters abroad, remain as disturbers of the public order.

Within this limit are the practical difficulties of administration, which are quite sufficient for the attention of this government, and in which it needs the encouragement of all who believe that in the independent prosperity of this country lies the highest good of others as well as of itself.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

The supreme magistrate of the republic has thought proper to address to me the following decree:

The citizen Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same, maketh known:

That in use of the faculty conceded to me by fraction 14 of article 85 of the constitution, I have thought proper to decree the following sole article:

The port called Puerto Angel, situate in the Pacific, on the coast of the State of Oaxaca, is opened to foreign and coasting trade.

Wherefore, I order that this be printed, published, circulated, and due compliance given to it.

Dated in the palace of the federal government in Mexico, the 30th of January, 1868.

And I communicate the same to you for the corresponding effects.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, March 12, 1868.

SIR: With my dispatch No. 78, of the 14th ultimo, I transmitted to the department the official report of a public sale held by this government, at which, with funds taken from the agents of the English and Spanish convention bondholders, and a further sum from the national treasury, bonds of those two debts were bought up by this government at a depreciated value.

I have now to transmit copy and translation of an official order directing another similar public auction to be held with a certain sum of money assigned from the national treasury, and also copy and translation of the officially published result, in which, as before, the difference between the par of the said bonds and the depreciated price at which they are now bought up by the government, is set down as gain to the national treasury.

The public bonds of this government are depreciated because the interest upon them has not been paid for years. If there are funds at its disposal, it would seem that they should be first applied towards the payment of interest, and until that is paid cannot rightfully be used for the purchase of the depreciated principal.

But, aside from this question of morality and public good faith, there is a question of sound policy involved in these transactions.

Every dollar this government can raise, and more, is now required, and will be for some time to come, in the work, very far from being completed, of re-establishing and maintaining public order.

Until very great changes shall be introduced into its revenue system, commerce relieved of the present restrictions that retard it, and public order more firmly established, the means of this government will, in my judgment, be greatly inadequate to the mere expenses of its existence, and those more pressing demands which every government must liquidate in full.

If there are any funds after meeting these primal necessities, it would seem that such funds should then be applied, in the first instance, under the peculiar circumstances of the present case, to the payment of the claims of citizens of the United States.

As a general system, it appears necessary that all of the obligations of this government, both foreign and domestic, should be called in and revised, and then consolidated in one or two sole debts. The great effort then should be to regularly and promptly pay the interest thereon. In this way alone can the credit of this government ever be raised.

The use now of funds to buy in at a depreciated rate its own public securities, upon which the interest has been unpaid for years, appears to be a proceeding not only useless in itself, for, if let alone, the amount applied would not in twenty years effect the purpose, and now does not even equal the accruing interest, but also at variance with every dictate of sound policy and public good faith, and peculiarly unjust towards citizens of the United States, whose claims have been waived for a time as a means of special relief to Mexico.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

The citizen President of the republic, desiring that the auctions for the redemption of the national debt shall be continued in conformity with the directions that have been given, has thought proper to direct that on Saturday, the 7th instant, the third auction for the interior debt shall take place, in which thirty thousand dollars shall be assigned for the redemption of the same, admitting in it all the credits specified in the law of the 30th of November, 1867.

On Monday, the 9th instant, the second auction for the bonds of the extinguished Spanish convention shall take place, and the following day the second for the bonds of the extinguished English convention.

The President has directed that there shall be assigned at least the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars for each one of these two auctions.

The President also desiring that the benefits which result from these auctions shall be within the reach of all citizens, has thought proper to direct that the fund assigned for the auction of the 7th instant shall be divided in lots of five hundred to one thousand dollars, and that there be admitted in it credits of a less quantity.

SIR: In my dispatch No. 48, of the 13th of December last, I called the attention of the department to a decree issued by this government, establishing a separate tariff for this city upon national and foreign effects.

I have now to transmit to the department copy and translation of a decree issued under date of the 4th instant, by the legislature of the State of Guanajuato, establishing a separate tariff for that State.

It will be observed that, under the provisions of this decree, articles 2 and 5, foreign cotton goods and yarns consumed in that State will now have to pay a duty of five cents per pound, in addition to the duties on their importation established by the national tariff.

All other foreign effects, except those enumerated in the free list of the national tariff, are to pay, under this decree, five per cent. upon their value, appraised in that State.

It is not easy to see where the limit to the burdens imposed on commerce in this country is to be reached, if this system of local duties for every city and State is to be continued.

Decree establishing duties on foreign effects in the State of Guanajuato.

[Translation.]

The citizen General Florencio Antillon, constitutional governor of the free and sovereign State of Guanajuato, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known:

That the congress of the State has decreed the following:

The second constitutional congress of the free and sovereign State of Guanajuato, considering that the revenue upon which the State can now count is scarcely sufficient for the payment of half of its ordinary and necessary expenditures:

That in consequence of the law of classification of revenues of the 12th of September, 1857, the derogation of which this honorable congress has asked of the sovereign congress of the union, it is an absolute necessity, until such decision as may be proper is had, to provide resources to cover the deficiency, as otherwise it will be impossible to continue the public administration, and the State will cease to figure as a member of the Mexican Confederation, because without public revenue it cannot maintain its functions:

And that the State should contribute what is necessary for the expenses of its administration, decrees:

ARTICLE 1. Foreign effects introduced into the State shall pay a duty of five per cent. The basis for the collection of this impost shall be that which now serves for the collection of the half per cent. of the department of Fomento.

ART. 2. Cotton goods and yarns consumed in the State shall pay as excise duty, five cents per pound.

ART. 3. Cloths, cassimeres, and carpets of national manufacture, consumed in the State, shall pay ten per cent. upon appraised value, which shall be the current market price at wholesale of the place.

ART. 4. Once that the effects spoken of in the preceding articles shall have paid in the capital of the State the impost now decreed, they can proceed freely to any point within the same.

ART. 5. Foreign cotton goods and yarns shall pay solely the impost provided in article 2.

ART. 6. Quicksilver and other effects declared free in the tariff of maritime and frontier custom-houses will not be subject to the impost spoken of in article 1st of this decree.

Let the same be communicated to the governor of the State, who will cause it to be printed, published, and duly complied with.

Dated in Guanajuato, March 3, 1868.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, March 23, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to the department herewith, copy and translation of remarks made by the minister of treasury, Mr. Romero, in the Mexican congress on the 17th instant, on the subject of the payment of interest on their public debt.

The provisional fiscal estimates were under discussion, and the second article, as proposed by the committee, provided that the excess of the public revenues, after covering the amounts assigned to the different departments of the government, should be applied to the payment of the interest on the consolidated national debt and the cancellation of the floating debt.

This was opposed by Mr. Romero, in the name of the government, who urged that in place of paying the interest the government should be permitted to permanently continue the system of public auctions for the buying up of their bonds, such as have recently taken place, and to which I referred in my dispatch No. 87, of the 12th instant.

The fiscal estimates, I believe, go over to the next session before being finally acted upon, but this manifestation of the disposition of the executive may not be without importance both as regards the action of congress and the bearing it may have upon the foreign relations of this republic.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[From the congressional report published in the Diario Oficial, city of Mexico, March 20, 1868. Session of the 17th of March.—Translation.]

The Minister of Treasury, Mr. Romero. * * * * The government also believes that it is its duty to state, that the terms in which article 2 of the project of law (provisional fiscal estimates) is conceived, lend an ambiguity, which it would be convenient to explain and correct, before it has the force of law. According to the literal and more evident tenor of said article, it should be understood that the auctions for the cancellation of the public debt that have been decreed by the government, and that are taking place with such good results, cannot continue. The article states that the excess that there may be in the public revenues, after covering the portions assigned to each department of the government, shall be applied to the payment of the interest on the consolidated national debt and the cancellation of the floating debt. As the debt, called until now Spanish and English, is represented by bonds which bear interest, it appears natural to classify it as consolidated debt, and in this case nothing more could be done with it than to pay the interest, and for the same reason suspend the auctions for its cancellation, which have given so good result until now.

Nor will it be possible to assign any sum to the cancellation of the national floating debt, supposing that there has to be paid first the interest on the consolidated debt, and this, in which would be included, besides the debts represented by the bonds of the extinguished Spanish and English conventions, all the bonds of the debt called the interior debt, and those of the debt contracted in London, which alone amount to a very considerable sum, would not leave of course anything with which to attend to the cancellation of the floating debt, which would result in evident prejudice to the national creditors, and especially to those of a privileged character.

The government would consider it a grave evil if congress should direct the suspension of the auctions for the cancellation of the national debt. In the two months in which these have been tried, they have produced the most satisfactory results.

With great gain to the creditors, and evident benefit to the treasury, there has been cancelled up to now more than half a million a month of the public debt, and if this can be continued, at the end of a few years the debt will be seen very considerably reduced or entirely extinguished.

A member of the committee has stated informally to the executive, that, even if article 2 should be approved in the terms proposed, the auctions for the bonds of the extinguished Spanish and English conventions being terminated which consolidated them and gave them the character of an international debt, not having become again debts exclusively national, in the adjustment of the interest and cancellation of which the government does not propose to admit the intervention of any foreign power they have ceased to have the character of consolidated debt and have become again floating debt.

This interpretation appears to the government very forced, and exposed to very serious inconveniences, and for this reason it would prefer without hesitation, if such is the disposition of the committee, that another wording less ambiguous should be adopted, and in which the intention of the chamber might be more clearly seen.

Although these objections may be considered as directed against certain particular articles of the project of law, and not against the project in general, I have believed it convenient to make them now, with the reservation of amplifying them when the project of law is discussed in detail, in order that they might be had in view in deciding whether the said project should be admitted to discussion or not.

FOREIGNERS IN MEXICO.

We have no idea of any country in the world in which, with the character of such, there are a greater number of foreigners than in our young republic, notwithstanding its exaggerated backwardness, its revolutions, and its inconveniences.

Our independence scarcely consummated, our ports were opened to the commerce of all countries, and the rigorous monopoly established by the dominators having ceased, all in conformity with the new and liberal institutions adopted by the country, necessity and the eagerness for a fortune, which rarely and with a thousand anxieties can be realized in Europe, attracted to our soil large companies of individuals from all parts of the globe, animated by the not exaggerated riches and beauty of the new world, and which at another period had already led the Conquistadores to subjugate and sacrifice a free people; riches and beauty perhaps fatal to the young republic.

From this moment the monopoly ceased to be solely Spanish, in order that it might be availed of by foreign individuals, and of all nationalities, as the objection to which we had been condemned by a domination of three hundred years had left us impoverished, and without the fitness that justly should have been given to us for the exercise of the arts, of commerce, and the sciences.

The generous disposition which distinguishes us, the natural ignorance of an infant people, educated in darkness, and which almost in their cradle, as Hercules in the fable, had destroyed the serpents who threatened their existence; the noble sentiment of fraternity which animated us, and the consideration inspired by the illustration and progress of the old countries of Europe, led our country, which yet retained upon its shoulders the simple tunic of infancy, to extend, with the candor and lack of judgment inherent to its age, a generous hand to each one of those who, in the garb of a friend, arrived asking of it hospitality, which was conceded with all the effusion of its affection, and opening frankly its store, it placed them at the table, where they were waited upon as if treating of the absent brother returning to the hearth he had abandoned.

Conduct noble and just without doubt, whatever may have been the results it has produced, as it was what corresponded to a great and generous people, who having just destroyed the yoke of slavery, and free from the odiums of race, which might well have left in their heart a long and painful remembrance, and still wearing the laurel of victory, forgot past resentments and gave the beautiful example of this great idea of the century: liberty, equality, fraternity.

Under such favorable auspices our guests did not delay in finding convenient means not only of meeting the necessities of life, but of rendering it comfortable and easy, as their labors or their industry found in the sons of the country their most sincere and ardent protectors. If it were possible to make a calculation of the fortunes, and above all of the time in which they were improvised, it would be curious and surprising.

All the elements were in favor of the foreigners; even our fiscal laws were almost null, whenever any individual of European nationality protected by them when commencing and realizing his calculations and operations, appealed to his nationality to make light of them when from abuses or fraudulent transactions the authorities attempted to cause them to be respected, as was just, punishing the culpable.

The examples of this sort are too numerous and public to detain ourselves in citing them, and it is truly melancholy that ingratitude, calumny, and injustice has been the payment of our consideration and generosity.

We have sometimes heard it said that there are no debts of gratitude or of consideration that are due to a country in which, if it is true life has been passed, and more than sufficient has been acquired to provide for the future, it is equally true these advantages are acquired by means of labor and of industry.

Conceding that this is always so, which unfortunately is not exact, it is necessary to admit that there are many countries in which honesty, labor, and industry are not sufficient to save millions of men from hunger, from misery, and crime, and who with difficulty can leave their native land, their fathers, or their sons, and the advantages, conveniences, and inestimable benefits of tranquillity and peace that may be enjoyed in an established country, if these are within their reach, to launch out upon the eventualities and the cruel caprices of fortune.

What stupid folly that would lead a man to leave such precious and positive advantages, to go in pursuit of doubtful expectations, were it not from imperious necessity, or the desire to save themselves from the horrible yoke of servitude and misery!

We are very far from blaming any one; there are not wanting honorable exceptions among the foreigners; but in exchange, what deceptions, what bad faith, and what unjust ingratitude! All have been witnesses of the terrible movements, when a foreign nation, patronizing the greatest and worst of crimes, landed on our shores to rob an inoffensive people of their liberty, overthrow their institutions established through their blood, to realize infamous purposes, and elevate the intrusive, blind instrument of their criminal projects.

A cry of indignation resounded throughout all the limits of the republic; the name of France was pronounced with just maledictions, yet meanwhile the French colony, living tranquil and at ease among us, could sleep at night without fear. The good sense of the people and the vigilance of the authorities guarded their slumbers. Later the fortune of arms refused to the sons of Mexico its favors; our heroes, unfortunate in a hundred battles, succumbed, and the soldiers of the tyrant of France entering, proud of their work, by the streets of the capital, found them tapestried with silk and covered with flowers by the hand of their compatriots, aided also by the traitors. Neither the one nor the other attempted to conceal their pleasure, enjoying the misfortune of a country where they had found hospitality and affection, enjoying also the cruel and numerous executions which stained with blood all our soil, while, meanwhile, the executioners spoke of these same compatriots resident in Mexico with a strange intolerance, not failing to call them rubbish and canaille.

But the day of justice arrived; the chain of crimes drawn out by the executioners was to be destroyed by the hand of justice and of liberty; the French ships in fright and shame fled from our shores; the farce terminated in the midst of ridicule, and the victorious arms of the people inundated the capital.

What of the French colony? What of those who adorned their balconies with silk, showering flowers upon the streets to receive their conquering brothers? Not a cry, nor an insult, nor a complaint.

Where can such another example be found? What pride for Mexico! what honor for the authorities!

Shall we look for the example in any country in Europe and in analogous circumstances? Let the Mexicans answer who were resident in Paris at the arrival there of the news of the punishment and end of the intruder.

The foreigners among us have too many proofs that they can live tranquilly; abandoned in an unworthy manner in a difficult situation, the authority has watched over their security the same as over the native citizens, giving an example which should put its unjust enemies to the blush.

The supreme government which disregards unjust reproaches; that has placed itself so high in the universal esteem notwithstanding animosities and calumny, will continue being the guarantee of all honorable and pacific citizens, whatever may be their nationality; but we are sure it will cause itself to be respected for its character and energy, it being only the vicious and criminals who are menaced and punished by the law.

SIR: I have received your dispatch No. 81, of the 24th of February, which contains a very interesting review of the proceedings of the government for the restoration of permanent peace with law, order, and public credit in Mexico. We have been pained, though after our own experience we cannot say we were astonished, at the recent attempt to assassinate the President of that republic. In behalf of the President, you will express to President Juarez felicitations upon his escape from that imminent peril, and you may, at the same time, assure him that the government and people of the United States sincerely sympathize with him in his arduous and enlightened labors directed to the retrieval of the fortunes of the republic.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, March 28, 1868.

SIR: In the early part of this month, after the discovery of a reported conspiracy at Guadalajara, in which it was stated, with what foundation I am not informed, that some foreigners were engaged, the government here gave orders under which, since that time, many arrests of foreigners in various parts of the country have taken place.

The number in this capital alone has amounted, as I have been informed by Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, to twenty-eight, of whom, however, seven were speedily placed at liberty, it appearing there were no tenable grounds for their detention.

Soon after the fact of such arrests became known, I called upon Mr. Lerdo de Tejada to inquire what were the grounds for these proceedings, and to what extent the government proposed to go. He informed me that since the issuance of the commutation order of the 31st of October last, which required all foreigners who had been engaged in the civil or military service of the so-called imperial government to leave the country, many who were included in the terms of that order, and who had been soldiers, had remained in the country; that these, with deserters from the French army, of whom there were some numbers, were being seduced to join in movements to disturb the public order; and that there were also some bad Spaniards in the country who were involved in many of the grave crimes, as kidnapping, &c., now so prevalent.

That for these reasons the government had determined to arrest such persons and send them out of the country; but that, as he had assured me several months before, it was not the intention to arrest those who were engaged in pacific pursuits and could show a good character, of those who might at one time have been engaged in the intervention, many of whom have married here, and, with others, are occupied in useful employments; nor was it the intention of the government to disturb in any way the foreigners settled in the country who have in no way been engaged in political affairs.

Later I was informed of several arrests of those not included in that order, one of whom, a Frenchman, had only a few months since arrived in the country.

On stating these facts to Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, these persons were released, as were also others included in the number before referred to as having been released, their friends having made representations to the government in their behalf.

Yet, in the execution of the orders that have been given by the government in this matter, there has been a degree of irresponsible and arbitrary action, by the governor of this city, which is in the highest degree reprehensible, and at one moment considerable alarm was produced among the pacific foreign residents.

With regard to this action, and the arrests above mentioned, I have, under the position taken by this government, only been able to use my private good offices; but I have felt it my duty to speak strongly to Mr. Lerdo de Tejada with regard to the necessity of including in such action as might now be taken by the government, only those against whom there were clear proofs of improper conduct.

That, with reference to any who were now engaging in movements against the public order, or in crimes of the kind he had referred to, the government would be perfectly justified in proceeding with the utmost rigor, but that it was better many such guilty persons should escape than that one innocent person should be arrested, especially in the case of those who had not taken any part in the intervention.

The observations I have made, I have reason to believe, have led the government to be more careful with regard to the action of its subordinates.

So far as the cases herein referred to are concerned, in whose behalf my good offices have been appealed to, all are now terminated satisfactorily with one exception—the case of a Spanish subject, against whom the government insists it has good ground for proceeding.

The number of foreigners remaining in the country, however, of those compromised with the late intervention, appears to me entirely too small to require that, for the safety of the government now, any revival at this late day of measures of rigor against them should be necessary.

PROJECT OF LAW REGARDING FOREIGNERS.

[From the Siglo XIX, city of Mexico, March 17, 1868.—Translation.]

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT—SESSION OF MARCH 16.

Mr. Gudiño y Gomez presented the following project of law, which was read the first time:

ARTICLE 1. Foreigners domicilated, or that in future may be domicilated in the republic, by this sole act shall be considered as Mexicans, and subject to the obligations of the latter, without the necessity of naturalization.

ART. 2. Foreigners, natives of the countries with which the republic now has uninterrupted treaties, are excepted from the dispositions of the preceding article, and will continue enjoying the privileges of their nationality authorized in the respective treaties so long as these remain in force.

ART. 3. Foreigners not comprehended in article 2 are not excepted from the provisions of article 1, even if they place themselves under the flag of friendly nations.

ART. 4. The executive will make the declarations required for the compliance with this law.

SIR: On the 27th instant an amendment to the federal constitution was introduced in the Mexican congress, by the majority of the deputation from the State of Queretaro, the purpose of which is to permit the re-establishment of prohibitions in commerce with this country, on the ground, alleged in the preamble, that, since the free introduction of all foreign effects into the republic has been permitted, the industry of the country has commenced to decay, and the restoration of restrictions is urged as the remedy.

Mr. Montes, one of the members who presented this proposition, has been ranked among the most liberal and enlightened of the public men of Mexico.

PROPOSITION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION SO AS TO PERMIT PROHIBITIONS.

[From the Siglo XIX, city of Mexico, March 28, 1868.—Translation.]

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT—SESSION OF MARCH 27, 1868.

Messrs. Montes and Gudiño y Gómez, the majority of the deputation from Queretaro, presented the following project of law:

“Since there has been permitted in the republic the free introduction of all foreign effects without any limitation whatever, our industry commenced to decay, and to-day it is found in such prostration that our people lack employment and our merchants are now nothing more than faithful resellers of foreign manufactures, with the cheapness of which our own cannot compete.”

“The remedy is efficacious, but a little late. It consists in a constitutional amendment, which we initiate in the following proposition, which we respectfully beg the chamber will be pleased to admit, and refer to the corresponding committee, viz: the clause in article 28 of the federal constitution which says, ‘Nor prohibitions in the character of so-called protections to industry’ shall be suppressed.”

Referred to the committee on constitutional points.

Article 28 of the federal constitution.

“Monopolies shall not be established, nor places for the sale of privileged goods, nor prohibitions in the character of so-called protections to industry, excepting solely those relative to the coining of money, to the mails, and to those privileges which, for a limited time, are conceded by the law to the inventors or perfectors of any improvement.”

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith translation of the discourses pronounced by the President of the republic and the president of congress at the closing of the first period of the sessions of that body, which took place yesterday.

The expectations that have been entertained of the adoption of important measures during the session now closed do not appear to have been realized.

Congress meets again in a further session, limited by the constitution to sixty days, on the 1st proximo.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[From the Diario Oficial, city of Mexico, March 29, 1868.—Translation.]

CONGRESS.

At the solemn act of the closing of the sessions of congress, which took place to-day, the President of the republic pronounced the following discourse:

CITIZEN DEPUTIES: You now terminate the first period of your sessions, to return again to dedicate yourselves to your important labors within a few days. I come with great satisfaction to felicitate you in these acts, which present a high testimony of the regular march of the public powers.

It is pleasing to observe that, the conflicts of war scarcely passed, the normal regimen of our institutions has been established anew with but few difficulties.

The people who combatted without rest to defend these institutions are now enjoying their benefits, for they assure to all their rights, and will procure the highest good, being faithfully respected.

Of the disturbances which have occurred in some places, some have been rapidly terminated, and we have to trust that the others will be soon suffocated.

The republic desires to enjoy peace under the protection of the constitution and the laws. To repress those who attempt to override them the government does not, and ought not, to doubt that it can count upon the opinion and the aid of the immense majority of the citizens.

A prolonged war left an inevitable legacy of elements that for some time will strive to disturb society. We can congratulate ourselves that these are not many, nor have they so far caused any grave peril. However, the lessons of the past should serve to place us on our guard, that they do not occasion greater evils in the future.

The government will exert itself to comply with the first of its duties, which is to maintain the public peace with all the energy of the means of action that it has in its hands, and all the confidence that should be inspired by the desire and the right of the people that their agents should give them perfect security in all their social interests.

The first pledge of peace is the harmony of the public powers.

The government is full of gratitude for the confidence that has been given to it by congress, and it will always endeavor to merit it respecting the decisions which, with their patriotism and wisdom, may be taken by the representatives of the people.

The president of congress, Mr. Iglesias, said:

Congress, in closing to-day its sessions to return to open them again within three days, proves by this single coincidence how sincere and how intense is the desire with which it is animated, to fully comply with the arduous duties which have been imposed upon it by the confidence of the people.

When congress voted the prorogation of the first period of its sessions, notwithstanding the inconvenience of joining it with the second, to form a total of more than half a year, it manifested by this unequivocal proof that it did not wish to avoid either labor or fatigue in order to expedite the dispatch of the affairs intrusted to its hands.

Notwithstanding this good will, the result of the legislative labors has not been as satisfactory as could have been desired. But neither can this be considered as an evil of grave consequences, nor still less can it be attributed to indolence or the negligence of the national representation.

In what relates to the latter we have well-founded motives for congratulation.

The meeting of congress has been of itself an event of the greatest importance.

The representative system, interrupted by the unjust war of intervention by France, and afterwards by the grave peril in which the independence of Mexico and its cherished institutions were placed, the re-establishment of constitutional order demonstrates that our society has returned to its support.

Placed again in the way of consolidating itself, it will be sufficient now if the inestimable benefit of peace is not again lost, in order that the germs of prosperity should be developed, which virgin and unfruitful are borne in its bosom, opening thus the doors to the grand future that is reserved for it.

For what congress has yet to do there are already prepared abundant materials.

With reference to various affairs of great public interest, the respective committees have already prepared reports; others are in course of preparation, and will soon be presented in order that with the first they may be discussed by this assembly, and determined as shall be deemed best for the interests of the nation.

Among these affairs, that relative to the preservation of the public peace will occupy a preferential place, in virtue of the necessity which exists to repress with all energy the disturbances which affect the security of social interests.

The harmony of the public powers, so indispensable for the well-being of society, will be securely preserved, because they are animated with the most fervent desires to comply with the obligations imposed upon them. Thus it will be realized that the Mexican republic lives under the protection of the constitution and laws.

The disturbances which have occurred in some localities must speedily terminate, because they do not arise from defects in our political or social organization, which might give them a permanent character. The accidental causes of these passing disturbances removed, the republic will realize the abundant fruits of the definitive triumph obtained in the struggle which Mexico, as all the peoples of the world, has had the necessity to undertake in order to open its way in the path of progress and of civilization.

SIR: I have to transmit herewith translation of the discourses pronounced by President Juarez and the newly-elected president of congress, at the opening of the second period of sessions, which took place yesterday.

These discourses as well as those delivered at the close of the late session on the 29th ultimo, transmitted with my dispatch No. 97, should receive your perusal, as, while they announce no new points of policy, they throw some light upon the present situation.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[From the Diario Oficial, city of Mexico, April 1, 1868.—Translation.]

OPENING OF THE SESSIONS.

To-day has taken place the installation of congress, to commence its labors in the second period of sessions.

The President of the republic pronounced the following discourse:

CITIZEN DEPUTIES: Very just is the precept of the constitution by which the second period of the sessions of congress, which commences to day, is destined in preference to the examination and the voting of the fiscal estimates.

It belongs to the executive to form them and to propose them, on account of the greater knowledge it should have of the facts and the data which it has with reference to the necessities of the administration; but it belongs to the people, by means of their representatives, to examine them and to approve them.

It is in the essence of the interests and of the most inalienable rights of the people to determine what they shall contribute, and how it shall be invested in the public expenses.

War has prevented this being done before, as for long periods it impeded the meeting of congress, and when this has taken place the disorganized state of society has not permitted the regular collection of the revenue, nor the expenses to be systematized.

Since the promulgation of the constitution this is the first time that congress is proceeding to exercise one of its most important prerogatives.

In the preceding period of sessions, however, a provisional estimate was voted upon the project presented by the government, which hastened to give its opinion in order that the decree might be issued. The labors of the committee of congress with reference to the project of the definitive estimates presented by the government are also well advanced. It is satisfactory to the government to have been able to show, in affairs pertaining to the public finances, its zeal in the compliance with its duties.

In the nine months that have passed since it returned to this city, the payments have been made with exactitude in all the branches of the administration, attending at the same time, so far as possible, to the payment of the public debt.

We have commenced in this manner to enjoy the benefits produced by peace.

Let us trust that, uniting our efforts, we shall succeed in maintaining it. It depends upon the union of the Mexicans who with good will desire the good of the country.

Be pleased to receive, citizen deputies, my felicitations upon seeing you again assembled to discharge your august functions.

The president of congress, Mr. Juan C. Doria, said:

Congress opens to-day the second period of its ordinary sessions, which in preference is to be occupied with the important affairs of the fiscal estimates.

To that it will dedicate all of its attention, from the intimate conviction which it has that the proper adjustment of the public finances is indispensable for the success of the public administration.

The congress of 1867 congratulates itself that it has fallen to it to be the first to give compliance to one of the precepts of the fundamental code, and by this sole act it can be seen that in the republic, after the war which it has had to sustain against its invaders, the constitutional order has been re-established without controversy or opposition whatever.

The provisional estimate being already voted, congress will not delay in directing its labors to the discussion of the permanent estimate for the expenditures of the federation. It will treat this affair with all the calmness and circumspection which its gravity requires; and its decisions, if not as perfect as may be desired, will not have been dictated by any other motive than a sincere desire for the well being and the prosperity of the country.

It has been very satisfactory to congress to see that, notwithstanding the increased expenses that the government has had to meet in the discharge of a great part of the army, the employes in all branches of the administration have been paid with regularity, and at the same time some sums have been dedicated to the payment of the national debt; and this is so much the more satisfactory to congress, as for this it has not been necessary to celebrate contracts ruinous for the interests of the republic.

The greatest good that a people can enjoy is peace; and the first and the principal obligation of those who govern is to consolidate it, guaranteeing the institutions, and, above all, respecting individual rights.

Congress well knows that the government is animated by the best ideas in this regard, that it will make whatever efforts may be necessary that the public order and peace shall not be disturbed, and that it will take care that the constitution shall be faithfully and strictly observed.

The government, on its part, can rest assured of the efficacious co-operation of the representatives of the people.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

SIR: In dispatch No. 92, of the 23d ultimo, I referred to the opposition made by the minister of treasury in the name of the government, in congress, to the second article of the provisional appropriation bill, which provided that the excess in the public revenues, after meeting the sums assigned to the different departments of the government, should be applied to the payment of the interest on the national debt; the government desiring that such excess should be applied to the buying in of the debt, and not to the payment of interest upon it.

I have now to transmit herewith translation of the appropriation bill which was finally adopted by congress, and which, as will be seen, was modified in article 2 to conform to the wishes of the executive.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 13, 1868.

SIR: In your dispatch No. 87, elsewhere acknowledged, you have alluded to the financial proceedings, called by the name of auctions, which have been adopted by the Mexican government for the purpose of purchasing in portions of the consolidated foreign debt of that country. However objectionable the policy of these measures may be, it does not appear that the United States are specially called upon to protest against it, inasmuch as no portion of the consolidated debt thus dealt with was contracted to this government or citizens of the United States. In view of this fact, you raise the question whether the proceeding is not unequal, by giving preference, so far as the consolidated debt is concerned, to other foreign creditors over United States creditors, whose claims have not yet been established. Such a position would seem ungracious, and it could hardly be assumed without bringing into the question the friendly feelings of the United States towards the republic of Mexico. We are looking forward to a time, not distant, when we can propose a convention for the mutual adjustment and settlement of claims between citizens of the United States and citizens of Mexico. It has not yet been thought expedient to press the subject hitherto, inasmuch as the United States themselves, in view of the derangement of political and financial affairs which was produced by our late civil war, have until now declined to enter into negotiations with any foreign states for adjusting claims for indemnity of their subjects growing out of the transactions of the war.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

No. 110.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, April 16, 1868.

SIR: On the 21st of last month a conducta, carrying about two millions of dollars, left this city for Vera Cruz.

By an order, issued on the 17th of the month, by the minister of treasury, it was required that federal circulation and export duties should be paid upon the whole sum, in this capital, before leaving, with exception of seven per cent. of the total amount sent, upon which the federal and circulation duties alone would be charged.

The existing export duty is five per cent., circulation duty two per cent., and the federal duty one and three-quarters per cent. As all import duties are now required to be paid in coin, or its equivalent, at the ports, the requirement of the payment of export duties upon coin sent from here to Vera Cruz, whether the same was designed to be exported or not, with the exception of the small amount of seven per cent. of the sums forwarded, occasioned a great deal of unfavorable remark, but was submitted to by the merchants because there was no remedy available.

Coin cannot be sent from here to Vera Cruz by the merchants, except by a government conducta, and in any case federal and circulation duties have to be paid.

On the arrival of the conducta at Puebla, the merchants of that place and correspondents of houses here placed in it further sums of money for remission to Vera Cruz.

On the 21st of March, before the arrival of the conducta at Puebla, the governor of that State telegraphed to the minister of treasury for instructions as to what duties he should collect upon sums placed in the conducta at that city, with the specification of what would belong to the general government, and what to the State.

The minister replied the following day, the 22d, in these words: "All the duties of conductas belong to the general government, and are to be paid at the ports, in conformity with the law.—Romero."

It will be noted that on the 17th, only five days before, an order had been issued requiring the duties on the funds leaving here to be paid in this capital.

On the same date, the 22d, the minister of treasury instructed the collector of customs at Vera Cruz to collect full duties on funds placed in the conducta at Puebla.

The governor of Puebla, it appears, did not obey the order of the minister of treasury, but required the merchants placing funds in the conducta at that place to pay there the federal and circulation duties, amounting to three and three-quarters per cent.

On the arrival of the conducta at Vera Cruz, the merchants, to whom these orders were unknown, were astonished to find the funds placed in the conducta at Puebla a large portion of which was in small coin and not suitable for export, charged not only again with federal and circulation duties, but also with export duty.

After remonstrances made by the merchants at Vera Cruz, and at this place, the government finally relinquished the charge of export duty upon the small coin and sums not designed for export, of the funds that had come from Puebla, but insisted that, as the governor had been instructed not to collect the circulation and federal duties at Puebla, the merchants must pay those duties over again at Vera Cruz, and collect them back from the governor at Puebla, who would be instructed to return them; thus making the merchants, who had no discretion in the premises, responsible, and the sufferers for the failure of the government to exact obedience from its own officer.

And in this manner the matter has rested.

As this affair very clearly illustrates the utter uncertainty and the embarrassment under which commerce labors in this country, and as the injustice manifested in this and other similar acts is alienating from the government its best friends among the merchants, I have thought it desirable to make this reference to the transaction, and to transmit it to the department herewith translations of the orders referred to.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Order for payment of duties by conducta.

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.

The citizen President has thought proper to order that the treasure to leave on the 20th instant by conducta, for the port of Vera Cruz, shall pay in this capital the respective duties of exportation, circulation, and federal contribution, with exception of seven per cent. of the total amount that may be sent, upon which shall be exacted solely the circulation and federal duty, to the end that the commerce may dispose of that amount in said port as may be most convenient.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, March 17, 1868.

ROMERO.

To the AUDITOR charged with the administration of the revenue of the district.

By telegraph the governor of the State of Puebla states to this department, under date of the 21st of March, 1868, the following:

CITIZEN MINISTER: I beg you will have the goodness to state to me what duties are to be collected upon the treasurer that may be placed by the merchants of this place in the conducta, which is shortly to pass by this city, specifying what belong to the general government and what to the State.

R. J. GARCIA.

By telegraph it is stated to the governor of the State of Puebla as follows:

All the duties of conductas belong to the general government, and are to be paid at the ports, in conformity with the law.

ROMERO.

MARCH 22, 1868.

[Telegram.]

To the Collector of the Maritime Custom-house of Vera Cruz :

You will collect upon the treasure placed in the conducta at Puebla full duties, and retain the same at the disposition of this department, giving advice of the amount.

ROMERO.

MARCH 22, 1868.

The collector of the maritime custom-house of Vera Cruz states to this department, under date of the 24th of March, 1868, as follows:

CITIZEN MINISTER: I do not know what are the duties you place upon the treasurer from Puebla, under your telegram of yesterday.

I therefore ask that you will advise me in due time, so that I may be able to comply with your order.

J. A. GAMBOA.

To the collector of the maritime custom-house of Vera Cruz it is stated as follows:

MEXICO, March 24, 1868.

Upon the treasure leaving Puebla, and that collected by the conducta at other points in its transit from here to your port, you will collect eight and three-quarters per cent., being the duties of five per cent. of exportation, two per cent. of circulation, and one and three-quarters per cent. of federal contribution.

ROMERO.

In a telegraphic dispatch to this department the collector of the maritime custom-house of Vera Cruz, under date of the 25th of March, states as follows:

I will comply with your telegraphic order to collect all of the duties upon the treasure placed in the conducta in its transit from Puebla, which collection, I understand, is to take place, although the permits may show that it has been paid at the point of departure, at least unless you direct otherwise.

J. A. GAMBOA.

By telegraph to this department the collector of the maritime custom-house of Vera Cruz, under date of the 5th of April, 1868, states as follows:

CITIZEN MINISTER: The conducta has arrived, and this custom-house will dispatch it to-morrow. According to the order of the department of the 24th of March, full duties are to be collected here upon the treasure received in the transit of the conducta from the capital to this port; but as in the permits it is stated that the two per cent. of circulation and the federal contribution is already paid, the collection having been made by the officers dispatching the same, acting perhaps under the provisions of the regulations for conductas, I beg that you will be pleased to state to me if, notwithstanding this, I am to exact again the two per cent. and the federal contribution.

J. A. GAMBOA.

To the collector of the custom-house of Vera Cruz it is stated by telegraph as follows:

MEXICO, April 6, 1868.

As was opportunely stated to you, you are to collect all the duties upon the treasure placed in the conducta on its transit from here to your port, even though the permits state that the duty of circulation, which ought not to be collected at these points, has been paid.

The proper orders have been given that what has been so collected shall be returned.

ROMERO.

By telegraph it is stated to the governor of Puebla as follows:

It has reached the knowledge of this department that in that State there has been collected upon the treasure which left by the last conducta for Vera Cruz the duty of circulation and the federal contribution; and as these revenues belong to the general government, in conformity with the law of classification of revenues now in force, in virtue of which I timely directed that these duties should be collected in the ports, the citizen President directs me to state to you that you will be pleased to order the respective officers to return what they have collected under the two per cent. of circulation, and the federal contribution, as it has been determined that the said treasure shall pay all of the duties Vera Cruz.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, April 6, 1868.

ROMERO.

The governor of the State of Puebla, under date of the 6th of April, states to this department as follows:

The duties of circulation and the federal contribution collected upon the treasure which left here in the conducta have been collected, as has been the case with all the preceding, for the federal treasury, as I have taken special care that nothing that belongs to it shall enter the State chest.

The federal contribution just caused will go into the office of stamped paper, and the duty of circulation is in vigorous deposit at the disposition of treasury bureau, to which notice has been given.

The collection was made in punctual compliance with the decrees of the 23d of May, 1853, 11th of July of the same year, articles 12, 13, and 15 of the 12th of September, 1857, and the circular of the 4th of December last, without the employes of the State having used a single cent of the same, nor done more than observe the said supreme dispositions. If, notwithstanding this, and the provisions contained in article 15 of the said decree of the 11th of July, 1853, the citizen President insists that the return of the duties shall be made, I beg that you will be pleased to so state to me.

R. J. GARCIA.

In a telegraphic dispatch to the governor of Puebla it is stated as follows:

MEXICO, April 6, 1868.

From the 15th of October, last year, it was ordered that all the duties of conductas should be paid at the ports, and it has so been taking place; finally, on the 22d of last month, I stated to you by telegraph that the duties of the last conducta which left this city were to be paid entirely at Vera Cruz.

For these reasons, and as the order of October annulled any anterior disposition, it is necessary that you should direct that the duties spoken of in your telegram of to-day shall be returned.

ROMERO.

The governor of Puebla, in a telegram dated the 7th of April, states as follows:

I have no knowledge, nor do I believe that in this government there has been, of the order of the 14th of October, to which your telegram refers. I have, notwithstanding, at once given orders to the administrador of the revenues to make the return of duties that you order, and I will advise you when that operation is concluded.

R. J. GARCIA.

In answer to your telegram relating thereto, dated to-day, and by direction of the President, I remit to you copy of the order of the 14th of October of last year, by which it is provided that all duties caused by the treasure taken by conductas to the ports shall be paid at the ports.

ROMERO.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, April 7, 1868.

The GOVERNOR of the State of Puebla.

The collector of the custom-house at Vera Cruz, in a telegram dated the 7th of April, 1868, states to this department as follows:

CITIZEN MINISTER: The order of the department of yesterday, that I have received to-day, relating to the collection of the entire duties upon the last conducta, will be duly complied with.

My inquiry of the 5th was occasioned by the resistance made by the parties interested to the double payment of duties, that is so far as relates to those of circulation and the federal contribution, which have been paid in the places of the transit where the treasure was entered, it being urged that, having already paid those duties, they could not be comprehended in the previous disposition of your department.

To-day, with the resolution which you have answered, I will oblige them to pay, as there can be no doubt they should, under the understanding that, if they refuse, I will order the treasure upon which the duties are exacted to be deposited in the custom-house, and will not permit its extraction until the duties are satisfied.

The parties interested pretend that there should be extended to them the same grace that was obtained from the government by the commerce of the capital, of the deduction of seven per cent. from the sum which each one receives, and that there shall not be collected upon this the export duty; and they also solicit that this duty shall not be charged upon small coin which cannot be exported.

As this is not within my faculties to decide, I submit it to the decision of the department, stating at the same time that in some of the permits issued from the capital which contained small coin, it appears that the export was collected.

J. A. GAMBOA.

By telegraph it is stated to the collector of the custom-house of Vera Cruz as follows:

MEXICO, April 7, 1868.

Several merchants of your port have represented to this department that a great part of the sums taken by the conducta, in its transit from Puebla to Vera Cruz, consists in small coin that cannot be exported, and the rest is destined to remain in that port for the payment there of duties caused at the custom-house.

In virtue of this the citizen President directs that you do not collect export duties upon the small coin, nor upon the funds which in the permits are stated to be destined only for that port and not for exportation.

The duties of circulation and the federal contribution collected in Puebla have been ordered to be returned, and the governor of the State advises that he has ordered the same to be returned to the parties interested.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, April 20, 1868.

SIR: On the receipt of your dispatch No. 47, of the 25th ultimo, instructing me to express to President Juarez, in behalf of the President of the United States, felicitations upon his escape from the peril of the recent conspiracy to assassinate the President and other members of this government, I sought an interview with the President for that purpose, which has to-day taken place, in company with Mr. Lerdo de Tejada.

I have now the honor to transmit to the department, herewith, a translation of my remarks, which were in Spanish, and from memory, on that occasion.

President Juarez, in a few words in reply, expressed his deep acknowledgments for this mark of attention and of friendly interest on the part of the government of the United States, and his desire that the relations between the two countries might in every way be strengthened and rendered more intimate, towards which end his efforts would always be directed.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PRESIDENT: When I received information of the wicked conspiracy which threatened, perhaps, the life of your excellency, and of other members of the government, and that was so opportunely frustrated by the vigilance of the authorities, I passed immediately to the department of relations, and to visit your excellency, to express my felicitations, and in anticipation those of my government, upon the fortunate escape from this danger.

Afterwards I communicated this information to the government of the United States, by whom it was received with pain, though, after our own experience, not with surprise.

I have now received the orders of the President of the United States to express in his behalf to your excellency his felicitations upon the escape of your excellency from this imminent peril; and I am authorized, at the same time, to assure your excellency that the government and people of the United States sincerely sympathize with your excellency in your arduous and enlightened labors directed to the retrieval of the fortunes of the republic.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, April 20, 1868.

SIR: In the rebellions that have taken place in the State of Yucatan, the State of Guerrero, and the State of Sinaloa, local questions had been urged as the only motives for revolt, and the leaders in each movement have protested that they still respected the existing federal government.

Now, however, the flag of another revolution has been raised in this State, and the leader puts forward the name of Jesus Gonzales Ortega, formerly chief justice of the supreme court, whom he claims is now the legitimate President of the republic.

The nominal leader of this movement, General Negrete, is a man who has belonged to all parties, and was for a time, during the intervention, minister of war of President Juarez. He has as yet apparently only a few hundred men, while his chief, Gonzales Ortega, is held a prisoner by the government, at Monterey.

With proper energy the movement should instantly be suppressed; but what danger there is lies in the fact that in the present state of discontent all of the disaffected are ready to rally under any plausible flag of revolt, and it is believed there are those even now occupying seats in congress who would be willing to support Ortega for the purpose of opposing President Juarez and his present cabinet.

I transmit to the department herewith translation of communications published in the Diario Oficial, addressed to the minister of war, giving an account of two reported actions with Negrete's forces, and of the proposed plan of this movement.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

PRONUNCIAMIENTO OF NEGRETE IN FAVOR OF GONZALES ORTEGA.

[From the Diario Oficial, city of Mexico, April 12, 1868.—Translation.]

We publish the following official communication from Colonel Contreras, and also a private letter from that officer to the minister of war.

The government had before sent forces to pursue the bands which Negrete has united, and on learning the present occurrences it has immediately taken the proper measures.

General Velez left this city to-day with additional forces, which, united with those sent before, will make the pursuit effective.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, CORPS OF LANCERS OF TOLUCA—COLONEL-IN-CHIEF.

As I announced to you in my private communication of this morning, I made my entry into this place at two o'clock in the afternoon. At three, in union with General Galvan, we went out to reconnoiter the suburbs, and outside of the town, in the direction of San Antonio, towards the east, we discovered a body of cavalry to the number of two hundred and fifty men, under the command of General Negrete, (as we were afterwards informed,) marching upon the place. In the act we countermarched and arrived in the midst of them at the quartel.

The enemy made his principal attack upon this point. Violently organizing a column of thirty men on foot, under my immediate orders, I charged and they were repulsed. Once this was attained, the heights were occupied, and the enemy in his flight occupied the hill of Tezontle, which has been fortified since the time of the empire.

The attack lasted from the hour mentioned until dark.

In our force we have to lament the death of Colonel Manuel Robles, and four wounded and three dead of the troops.

I do not know the loss of the enemy, as he availed of the darkness to retire, leaving in our hands four horses and five muskets.

Independence and liberty! Tulancingo, April 9, 1868.

GERMAN CONTRERAS.

To the MINISTER OF WAR, Mexico.

RESPECTED SIR: I have reported to you officially what occurred in the passage of arms which took place to-day, and I have now to refer to the information I have obtained from a captain and a sergeant who were made prisoners by the enemy on Monday last, and placed at liberty in the night of yesterday by General Negrete.

The latter formed all his force on the plains of San Antonio, and, haranguing them, proclaimed for Jesus Gonzales Ortega as legitimate President of the republic, for the true constitution of 1857, and death to the tyrant Juarez and the bandits who surround him.

He placed at liberty the officers, prisoners, telling them not to sustain the usurpers or they would afterwards regret it, as he had more than sufficient elements with which to make war upon the government.

I am informed by the same officers that he is occupied in organizing a battalion in the barancas of San Antonio, Buena Vista, some twelve leagues from this place, and that he is already in considerable force. It is said among them that they expect General Gutierrez, with forty officers, for the complete organization of their forces, and also that they expect a battalion from this capital will join them.

I have this moment learned that they drew off to feed their animals, and they will renew the attack. I have already taken the necessary precautions to frustrate their further attempts.

Without anything more for the present, I repeat that I am, &c.,

GERMAN CONTRERAS.

FORCE OPERATING AGAINST THE INSURGENTS.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, NATIONAL ARMY—GENERAL-IN-CHIEF.

Under date of the 15th instant Colonel German Contreras reports to me as follows:

"I place in your knowledge that at three o'clock of the afternoon of to-day, this place, garrisoned by the corps under my orders, was attacked by the united bands under the command of Negrete, led by Luis Leon, Soto Mayor, Roz, Noriega, and Antonio C., to the number of two hundred and fifty cavalry and seventy infantry, taking possession of the hill of Tezontle, a point fortified since the time of the so-called empire. After three hours of firing the enemy drew off in the direction of Acasuchitlan. Notwithstanding, until this moment I have remained awaiting his movements, and disposed to resist whatever attempt they may again make upon the place.

"The loss of the enemy I cannot state to you at this moment with due detail, but by the marks of blood left in the place they occupied, it must be considerable.

"As soon as I get the data I will give you the full details.

"On our part we have had no loss whatever."

And I transcribe the same to you for your information, having the honor to state to you that no other incident has occurred.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, April 21, 1868.

SIR: With my dispatch No. 47, of the 13th of December, I transmitted to the department a copy of the decree issued by this government on the 27th of November last, revalidating the rights of the company engaged in the construction of the railroad from Vera Cruz to this capital, which, it was alleged, had been impaired by the obtaining of a prior concession from the so-called imperial government, and I remarked that the greatest public importance of this decree was in showing that capital invested in the vitally important work of railroad building in this country would be respected under all the changes of government that could possibly occur.

Referring to that decree, I have now to state that on the 18th instant, in the Mexican congress, by a vote of seventy-four against forty, a report of a special committee appointed to consider that concession was adopted, which report is accompanied by a resolution declaring the said decree suspended until it shall be revised by congress.

This action, which is the most important that has been taken by the Mexican congress since it assembled, cannot but be attended with serious consequences, both at home and abroad.

The discussion of the report consumed nearly two weeks of the time of congress, of which only about another month remains of the present session, and was very bitter, both against foreigners and against the government.

One prominent speaker concluded his remarks by offering a project of law that the concession should not only be declared null, but that the government should take possession of the road already completed, and that the parties interested be prohibited from applying for this or any other concession whatever.

A prominent journal of this capital, also, since this vote was declared, in eulogizing congress for its action urges that hereafter no contract of any kind be made with foreigners.

Thus a work that is of more practical importance to this country than any political question that can now be agitated is paralyzed, capital is frightened from the country, irritating foreign questions are raised, and steps are taken backward rather than forward by this people.

The action that has been taken by congress with reference to this decree resolves in the affirmative a question that had been supposed to have been fully decided in the negative, that is, as to whether the acts of the government of President Juarez during the exercise of his extraordinary powers were open to revision by congress or not.

The uncertainty to which this will give rise cannot but be unfortunate for this country.

SIR: As an authoritative statement of the present situation of this country I transmit herewith translation of remarks made by a government member in the Mexican congress, on the 22d instant, in the discussion of a project of law to suspend certain constitutional guarantees, and to give certain powers to the executive, in order to enable it to act more effectively in the punishment of conspiracies and other offenses against the public tranquillity; of a report with reference to the situation in the State of Guerrero, made by the minister of government to congress on the same day; and of a decree passed by the legislature of

SITUATION OF THE COUNTRY.

[From the Siglo XIX, city of Mexico, April 23, 1868.—Translation.]

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT—SESSION OF THE 22D OF APRIL, 1868.

The report of the committee of government upon the suspension of certain constitutional guarantees being under discussion, Mr. Joaquin Baranda, a member of the committee, said:

No one will deny, sir, that peace and internal tranquillity are the first necessities of society, for without peace no government is possible, without tranquillity there can be no constitution.

And are we in full peace? Has Mexican society completely recovered its normal condition? Is the republic living tranquilly under the shade of its laurels, enjoying the advantages of its late victory? Let us see.

There is Yucatan, where certain bad Mexicans, coming from Cuba, disowned the legitimately constituted authorities, inducing the garrison of the capital to rebel, and overturning completely public order in all the State; and order has not yet been re-established, if we may judge by the last measure taken by the provisional executive suspending the elections.

There is Sinaloa, where Mexican blood is being profusely shed in a fratricidal war.

There is Puebla, where there have been various attempts at insurrection, occasioned by the election for governor.

There is Tabasco, where in less than three months two revolutions have been discovered and happily suppressed, without counting the invasion of the petty leader Juan José Juárez, who, commissioned by the mysterious conspirators of this capital, entered the State after having surprised the island of Carmen and seized the money in the custom house and some material of war.

There is Tamaulipas, where the hydra of revolution threatens to raise its deformed head.

There is Quiroga, seeking to overturn public order in Nueva Leon.

There is Negrete, who invades the state of Mexico with the flag of rebellion in his hand. There are the highways full of kidnappers, thieves, and assassins.

There is the capital itself of the nation, in whose bosom has been discovered, not long since, a wicked plan which had for its object to assassinate the President and other public functionaries, and in whose principal streets are perpetrated frequent and abominable crimes.

There is, finally, Jesus Gonzales Ortega, who has not yet lost the illusion of being the president of the republic, impeaching him who now worthily fills that charge, and publishing his impeachment in various papers, an impeachment which is a voice that says to the discontented, rise in insurrection, you have still an apparent motive for doing so.

Sir, is this peace, is this tranquillity? Evidently, no. What shall be done to obtain that precious good?

Will it be observing strictly the constitution and respecting all the guarantees which it authorizes? No. No one has been punished in Yucatan; Juan José Juárez has not been, nor the conspirators in this capital.

A law is necessary, not so severe in its penalties as swift in its proceedings, that will cause its action quickly to be felt by the culpable.

Society does not punish for the pleasure of punishing; it punishes to restrain, and this justifiable end cannot be attained by delaying the application of the penalty.

These are the powerful reasons, in my judgment, which have obliged the committee to declare in force, for conspirators only, the law of the 25th of January, 1862, suspending as a previous and indispensable measure one of the constitutional guarantees, that of not being tried by special laws or tribunals.

With respect to other offenses, we ask that they shall be tried in conformity with the laws of June, 1861, and December, 1856, as has been provided in resolutions that congress has taken on other occasions of a similar nature.

We have defended amnesty and pardon for past offenses; but without doing violence to our conscience we cannot counsel impunity for crimes that are committed to-day, and that encourage further crimes in the future.

We have believed, and still believe, that the French intervention and the farce of the empire were to be the final admonition to our political enemies, and that overcome, and overcome absolutely on every field, they would now merit rather the clemency of a pardon than the rigor of punishment.

Since the independence, our unfortunate country has traced a tortuous and bloody road.

What is the cause of the present state of our agriculture, our commerce, and our industry? Revolution. What is the reason our country is so unfortunate when it should be so happy? Revolution. What is the pretext of which our enemies at home have availed to beg foreign intervention? Revolution. What is the apparent motive upon which foreign nations have pretended to intervene in our political questions and to subjugate us? Revolution. Always revolution.

And now, when we have so happily terminated our second war of independence, can we not free ourselves from this terrible situation, that causes us to appear before the world as a country incapable of government itself?

Sir, can we not have peace? Peace, the aspiration of all peoples and of all men!

In one of the papers of this city an article is published to-day which refers to the report we are discussing, and says: "Those only can think with liberty who have a special privilege. Awake, democrats, this law recalls Santa Anna."

This is a gross imposture, for in article 6 of our project of law it is clearly stated "offenses of the press are not included in this law." All Mexicans, therefore, can freely think and write what they think, and print it and circulate it everywhere, without fear of being included in the law of the 25th of January.

So far as jurisdiction, we have referred to constitutional jurisdiction; and it excites surprise that a blind constitutionalist, so to speak, believes that what is conceded by the constitution of 1857 can recall the abominable dictatorship of Santa Anna.

We did not expect to be accused of lack of constitutionalism in counseling repressive measures against conspirators, kidnappers, thieves, and assassins.

We love the constitution; it is the glass in which we see ourselves, for it is the will of the people, written by the hand of their representatives; but we do not profess that pharisaical constitutionalism which some parade. We do not wish the constitution to be an arm of party; we do not wish it to be a mantle with which criminals are to be covered. We desire that it shall be preserved pure and without spot, as the sacred charter of the rights of the people.

We beg that the chamber, without fear of being wanting to its principles, or of violating its convictions, will be pleased to vote the project of law that we have discussed, because, voting the law, they will vote the punishment of the disturbers of public order; and with this peace, which is what the republic most requires to assure its triumphs, will develop its elements of greatness, and it will be completely free and happy.

CONDITION OF THE STATE OF GUERRERO.

[From the Siglo XIX, April 23, 1868.—Translation.]

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT—SESSION OF APRIL 22, 1868.

Mr. DORIA, president. The minister of government has the floor, to give information with reference to events in the State of Guerrero.

Mr. VALLARTA, minister of government. The government regrets to have to announce to congress that the situation in the State of Guerrero is very far from being satisfactory.

General Arce has reported that in the town of Tlapa General Pinzon had shot the Prefect Cano, who obeys Jimenez; that when this general was disposed to come to the capital, as well as General Alvarez, the latter, when General Jimenez had separated from his forces, renewed hostilities against them.

It is not known if the act of Pinzon was committed in ignorance of the agreement of Alvarez with Jimenez.

The government has dictated such measures as it believes necessary; it has asked reports from General Alvarez, and it hopes they will be of such a character as to hasten the return of that State to the constitutional order.

Mr. DORIA, president. The session is adjourned.

EXTRAORDINARY FACULTIES CONCEDED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF TABASCO TO THE GOVERNOR OF THAT STATE.

[From the Siglo XIX, city of Mexico, April 17, 1868.—Translation.]

Felipe J. Serra, constitutional governor of the free and sovereign State of Tabasco, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known: That by the honorable legislature of the State there has been addressed to me the following decree:

The legislature of the free and sovereign State of Tabasco, considering the absence of any result from the lenitude with which until now the executive has treated all those who, without any political principles, have launched themselves upon the arena of insurrection, that the country is again threatened by a vandalic rebellion which it is necessary to restrain with a strong hand, in use of its faculties, decrees:

ARTICLE 1. The executive is authorized immediately, and under his most strict responsibility, to proceed, at his discretion, against the disturbers of the public repose until peace is restored to the State.

ART. 2. He can, in consequence, first, organize and place under arms all the national guard of the State, and in such force as is sufficient for the object. Second, procure pecuniary resources in such manner as he may judge most convenient, pledging therefor the revenues of the State. Third, arrest and imprison and expel from the State all secret conspirators. Fourth, severely punish all conspirators discovered, and proceeding, at his discretion, in all relating to the public tranquillity.

ART. 3. The executive is eminently responsible before congress for the public tranquillity of the State and the use he may make of the faculties conceded to him, of which he will give an account to the legislature, as well as that the peace of the State shall be a reality.

The executive will be informed of the same, and will direct its compliance.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, April 28, 1868.

SIR: Advices have been received by this government, which have been confirmed through private channels, that a decisive battle took place on the 8th instant, between the government forces and those of the insurgents in the State of Sinaloa, in which the latter were completely routed and a considerable number taken prisoners.

It is also stated that on the 9th instant the town of Mazatlan was reoccupied by the constitutional forces under Governor Rubi.

The recent decree closing the port of Mazatlan, transmitted with my dispatch No. 117, of the 23d instant, may therefore, I presume, from its tenor, be considered as no longer operative.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, May 12, 1868.

SIR: One of the embarrassments to which commerce is subjected in this country is the exaction of local duties upon merchandise passing from the ports, or place of its introduction, through the different States to its destination in the interior.

This is especially felt at the points as at this capital, where the means of transportation are changed and merchandise is delayed by the necessary arrangements for its further conveyance, or other reasons, for periods of greater or less duration.

On the 1st instant a law was passed by the Mexican congress which should obviate this difficulty, as it provides that no duties shall be collected by any State upon the simple transit of merchandise through its territory.

On the same day, however, an executive order was issued through the department of treasury, which prescribes that the period for which merchandise passing through this capital, and being delayed, shall be entitled to exemption from local duties, shall be limited to ten days; and that, passing that period, those duties shall be collected upon such merchandise, although the same may not be destined for consumption at this place, and will have again to pay similar charges at the place of its final destination.

I have the honor to transmit to the department, herewith, translations of the law of congress, and the executive order referred to.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 1.

Under this date the citizen President of the republic has been pleased to address to me the following decree:

Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known that the sovereign congress of the Union has thought proper to decree the following:

The congress of the Union decrees:

Sole article. No State can collect duties for the simple transit of merchandise, nor impose under any denomination, upon the products of other States, greater contributions than those exacted upon its own products.

Having been taken into consideration the reasons manifested first by Mendoza and Sobasino, and afterwards by Kauffman, Grane & Co., merchants of this place, in soliciting that upon merchandise introduced into this capital, in transit for points in the interior, there shall not be exacted the duties known as local duties, when neither the whole nor a part of the same are caused; and taking into consideration also certain reports that the supreme government has thought proper to ask with reference to the affair to aid in forming its judgment, the citizen President of the republic has thought proper to determine, in conformity with the provisions of article 12 of the law of the 16th of December, 1861, when treating of the place where the duty of counter register shall be caused, that upon effects introduced into this city in transit there shall not be collected any duties except upon the effects that may remain here, permitting that the whole or the part continue on to its destination, with only the corresponding note upon the respective passes; but with the understanding that the time conceded for such effects as are to continue on, to remain in deposit here, shall be ten days, counted from the date of their entrance, and that they shall remain in the custom-house warehouses; and that passing that term it shall be considered that duties become due, and that in such case the effects may be taken out or left, under the obligation of paying the local duties and storage established or that may be established.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, May 20, 1868.

SIR: On the 5th, 8th, and 11th instants, respectively, I received from Mr. Ulrich, consul at Monterey, the letters and inclosure of which I transmit copies and translation herewith, communicating the details of an outrage inflicted upon six American citizens at that place on the 22d ultimo, by order of the secretary of the government of the State of Nuevo Leon.

The character of this outrage is such that it can with difficulty be treated with calmness, and I should have felt it my duty immediately to address to this government a strong communication upon the subject, but for the fact, stated by Mr. Ulrich, that he had already written to the department giving information of the occurrence, and it appearing, therefore, to be my proper course to await your instructions before taking any action in the premises. For this reason I have made no allusion to the affair, as yet, with this government.

I had expected, however, that it would voluntarily have made some reference to it, and would have sought occasion to express regret that such an occurrence to citizens of the United States residing in Mexico should have taken place; but although the outrage was alluded to in the papers of this city on the 7th instant, and on the 9th the government published, in the Diario Oficial, the communication from the minister for foreign affairs to the governor of Nuevo Leon, of which I inclose translation herewith, no manifestation whatever has been made to me as to the sentiments of the government with reference to the affair.

It is perhaps my duty to add, as I do with disappointment and regret, that the conviction is being forced upon my mind, by my observations here, that, whatever may be the official action of this government, or however enlightened and friendly may be the sentiments personally of President Juarez and his cabinet, there is a feeling existing in this country towards foreigners in general, to which the citizens of the United States do not form an exception, that is the occasion of the commission of such acts as that which has occurred at Monterey, and which affords grounds for serious apprehensions as to the future.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Ulrich to Mr. Plumb.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monterey, April 24, 1868.

SIR: A very disagreeable occurrence has taken place here, which will probably come to your notice through the newspapers, and I have thought it best to give the facts of the case, both to yourself and the State Department, that you may have a better idea as to what has happened than you could form from newspaper statements, which are always more or less highly colored.

A few nights ago, two Americans resident here, merchants, became slightly intoxicated, and were taken in charge by four other American citizens, their friends, (respectable, well-behaved men,) to take them to their homes. While on the way the whole party were arrested by the police, and put into the common jail with the condemned criminals of the State, contrary to usage here, as temporary delinquents are usually placed in an outside room under guard. The next morning they were ordered to clean the movable privies of the jail and to perform other degrading duties, to do which some of them refused, when two of them were very severely beaten by the jailor, the marks of which are still upon their persons, and all this before they had been examined by the authorities as to their culpability.

When they were examined by the alcalde 1st, next morning, he, without any investigation of the case, ordered the whole party to pay a fine of ten dollars each, but on being remonstrated with by some of them that such a decision was very unjust, as four of them were entirely innocent of any offense, he remitted the fine as to the four, fining merely the two who admitted that they had been intoxicated, and afterwards remitted also the fine of these two, as, on examination of the case, he found it very doubtful if any of them had been guilty of creating disorder in the street.

The party who was most severely beaten was one of the four who were not drunk. The case is creating considerable excitement here, and is now on the way for trial before the tribunal supreme of the State.

Above you have the facts, of which I am personally cognizant, and you, better than myself, can, from your knowledge of these people, decide how much of this treatment of these Americans arises from the general unkind feeling towards foreigners. The tone of the papers since the close of the intervention, and the legislation in congress as regards "estranjeros," notwithstanding the fact that Americans are not intended to be included in them, still have the tendency to array anything but a kindly feeling towards us, as the great mass of ignorant Mexicans include in their animosity all classes of foreigners, Americans not excepted.

As I said before, I merely write to yourself and the department the facts above, that you may clearly understand the case. The persons maltreated are quite respectable men, and men, too, who will not let the matter rest. If anything further occurs, and the legal tribunals fail to do justice, I will write you again on the subject.

I think it is but justice to the people here to state, that they are generally indignant at the proceeding, a great deal of which feeling, however, I am satisfied arises from their hostility to some of the "oficiales" implicated, who are generally unpopular, more than from any regard for the persons injured.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. ULRICH, Consul.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monterey, Mexico, April 26, 1868.

SIR: Referring you to my dispatch dated 24th instant, I beg to call your attention to an article on the same subject in the Atalaya newspaper published in this city, which I inclose herewith.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

J. ULRICH, Consul.

Hon. E. L. PLUMB,
Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, Mexico.

Mr. Ulrich to Mr. Plumb.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monterey, April 29, 1868.

SIR: On the 24th and 26th instant, I had the honor to send you two communications regarding the recent case of ill treatment of several Americans in this city.

I now inclose copy of an extra published in Brownsville, Texas, the statements therein being as nearly in accordance with the facts of the case as is possible.

As reference is made in the extra, and in the Atalaya newspaper sent you 26th instant, to Señor Narciso Davila, secretary to Governor Treviño, I consider that it is no more than proper for me to state that when the arrest was made by his order given from the balcony of the palace the policeman, finding four of the Americans entirely sober, went to him and represented the fact, notwithstanding which he ordered them to be arrested, and gave orders also that they should be placed in the common jail, instead of being treated merely as detenidos; at the same time he was waited on by a very respectable young Mexican gentleman, who was with the party of Americans, who stated to him also that the most of the party were sober, and none of them making a disturbance, which was also of no avail.

The general belief here is that Señor Davila will resign his secretaryship, and go to Mexico as a member of congress, to which he was elected at the last election.

The examination of the case is still going on before the "Juez de Letras," and although much delay may result, still there seems every effort will be made by the authorities to right the matter, and the probability is that everything necessary will be done.

I am your obedient servant,

J. ULRICH, Consul.

Hon. E. L. PLUMB,
United States Chargé d'Affaires, Mexico.

[From El Atalaya, a newspaper published at Monterey, Mexico, No. 51, issue of April 26, 1868.—Translation.]

SCANDALOUS OCCURRENCE—ATTACK UPON INDIVIDUAL GUARANTEES.

On Wednesday last, between ten and eleven o'clock in the evening, six American citizens were arrested by order of the secretary of the governor when passing beneath the balcony of the palace, upon the frivolous pretext that some of the gentlemen were talking in a loud voice, on account of being somewhat excited in consequence of a reunion at which they had been present, celebrating the arrival of one of their friends. Arriving at the prison, all that they had upon their persons, except their watches, was taken from them, and they were thrust in among all the common criminals, this also being done by express order of the secretary, as was declared by the police who made the arrest. After having served as the objects of the jeers and scoffs of the criminals during the whole night, two of the Americans, Messrs. Liechardt and Potter, were ordered to mover el caballo (as the barrel is called in which are accumulated the urine and excrements of the prisoners) from one part of the court-yard to another, and having refused at first to perform this humiliating and degrading work, they were lashed with a cow-hide, and four of the gentlemen were obliged to sweep the court-yard, one of them also being beaten on the pretext that he did not sweep well.

This is a simple narrative of the facts, as we have heard them from the lips of one of the outraged party; and it gives rise to serious and very grave reflections.

In the first place, what authority has the secretary of the governor to send to prison peaceable merchants and mechanics? We believe he has none. What law is there by which persons temporarily arrested are obliged to be put in with the condemned prisoners, and, what is still more serious, that such persons can be punished in an outrageous and unparalleled manner, when it is not yet known whether they are delinquents or not? This is one of those outrages of which we have had no example in this country, and that has produced, and justly so, a general indignation among all our population, as well among the natives as among the foreigners, who are more directly affected by this occurrence, and there is a universal demand that prompt and full justice shall be administered, punishing the culpable parties in this affair in an exemplary manner.

The susceptibility of the American government, when treating of the protection of its citizens, is well known, and this occurrence may bring serious consequences, and give rise to international reclamations, which is all the more to be regretted when, up to now, the relations between the Mexican government and the United States have been so cordial. Considering the affair, therefore, under this point of view, it is indispensable that the culpable parties, whoever they may be, shall be punished in an exemplary manner, as well to avoid such reclamations as also to tranquilize the public, which is greatly alarmed, as no one can rest secure that he may not be exposed to similar or greater outrages. We should mention that one of the injured parties, Mr. Potter, has been here more than a year endeavoring to recover the amount of some arms sold by him in the time of the war against the French, and which have been of good service to the national cause. Besides, this gentleman had not taken anything that night, and only accompanied the others. We have made this statement for the purpose that the facts may be known, and as it is probable that the affair will be treated in the foreign press, which is only too ready to magnify such occurrences, describing the country as in a state of complete anarchy, without any security for foreigners, we wish to record the indignation of all the sensible people of this capital in reference to the affair referred to. In conclusion, it is necessary to state that the day following, the gentlemen above mentioned were placed at liberty by the first alcalde; that an examination is being prosecuted, as we are informed, with much activity, by the 1st Juez de Letras, and we are sure that prompt justice will be administered.

[From the Diario Oficial, of May 9, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

In the newspaper the Atalaya, of Monterey, it is stated that by a governmental order there were arrested in that city six American citizens, and that in prison they suffered ill treatment; adding, however, that they were immediately placed at liberty, and that the first alcalde of that city was actively making an examination into the facts in order to administer prompt justice.

In view of this information the President of the republic has directed that I should address to you this communication, in order that you may be pleased to inform this department regarding the occurrence referred to, and in order that, if true, you may be pleased to address to whom it may correspond, an excitative to prompt and strict justice, asking that the judge or tribunal that has cognizance of the case opportunely communicate what may be resolved in the same.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 23, 1868.

SIR: During the last two weeks the press has published telegraphic dispatches, which seem to have come from Monterey, in Mexico, and which give information of gross indignities alleged to have been practiced at that place upon several citizens of the United States residing or sojourning there. Our first official and authentic information upon the subject was received this morning in three written dispatches from the United States consul at Monterey, of the dates respectively of the 23d and 26th of April, and the 6th of May.

By those papers I learn that the proceedings complained of have been made the subject of investigation by the judicial authorities of Monterey, and further, that full accounts of the transactions in question were furnished to you immediately after their occurrence.

Presuming that you have already taken proper measures concerning the transactions complained of, I await with considerable solicitude your report thereupon.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, May 23, 1868.

SIR: It will be with unfeigned regret, I well know, that the government and people of the United States will learn that the era of pronunciamientos is apparently again returning to this country.

As I have said before, no political movement to erect any other in the place of the constitutional government is now possible. That government is to be maintained, or none can be.

So, all movements to take up arms now are simply attacks upon public order and upon property. Yet such movements have commenced, and there are armed forces in resistance to the government in various parts of the republic.

The latest of these movements are pronunciamientos that have taken place, first, in the mountain range that separates this valley from that of Cuernavaca, under the leadership of Aureliano Rivera; and secondly, in the mountainous district in the State of Queretaro, known as the Sierra Gorda, which was for many years the impregnable retreat of the Indian general, Mejia, who was shot with Maximilian.

This movement is under the nominal leadership of a Colonel Velasquez, who it is stated was formerly an adjutant of General Mejia.

The mountain range of Ajusco, within sight of this city, where Aureliano Rivera has pronounced, was his former refuge when serving, as he did effectively as a partisan leader, in the liberal cause against Miramon, and afterwards against the French; and the latter alone have been able to dislodge him from it.

Neither of these movements embraces more than a few hundred men, and this number is perhaps likely rather to be diminished than increased; but, like the roving bands of kidnappers now infesting the country, they may be sufficient to remain as festering sores.

While such movements can neither overthrow the government nor build up another, they are capable of much mischief, and their greatest danger is in the aid they render to a general process of disorganization.

But the feature of the pronunciamiento of Aureliano Rivera that bears chief importance is the presence, attached to his manifesto, of a number of names, some of them of persons of prominence and influence, who are known to be disaffected to the government of President Juarez, but who as yet have taken no active or open part, and regarding whom it is uncertain whether they are really committed or not.

Three of the persons whose names were so attached have published denials that they had authorized such use of their names; but up to the present time that is the total number of denials that has appeared.

It is also asserted, but denied by him from his prison at Monterey, that this movement, as well as that previously made by Negrete, has the sanction and is in the interest of General Gonzalez Ortega.

Whether the names attached to the proclamation of Rivera have been used with authority or not, there is a probability that if the States become generally disaffected—and there is great opposition to several of the governors, who it is claimed are too much under federal influence—some of the generals mentioned may take an active and influential part against the government.

All of these facts leave an anxious feeling in the public mind.

It is undeniable that there is a great deal of discontent throughout the country, and that the state of insecurity and of commercial and industrial prostration has reached a degree that detracts very greatly from the influence and prestige of the general government, and that if continued may produce serious results.

All the disaffected, also, act against a common opponent. If some relief had been given to the material interests of the country, the present situation might have been different.

Inclosed herewith, I transmit to the department full translations of the proclamations, &c., herein referred to, among which I beg to call attention to certain expressions in that issued in the State of Queretaro.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

PRONUNCIAMIENTO OF AURELIANO RIVERA.

[From the Diario Oficial, May 14, 1868.—Translation.]

AURELIANA RIVERA.

Some of the papers of this capital having asked for information as to what has occurred with respect to the pronunciamento of Aureliano Rivera, we proceed to satisfy the public curiosity, stating what we know:

Until recently that individual was in this capital, without giving ostensible proofs of distrust to the government, which has always extended to him favors and distinctions; and although the authorities had information that he was conspiring in connection with others, it did not desire to proceed against him, in order not to act too hastily, or to lead it to be said that it has violated individual rights; for all of which reasons it was thought prudent to wait until the data should be sufficient to justify a determination of that character, and with this our esteemed colleague, the Siglo XIX, will find explained the conduct of the government.

Escaping the vigilance of the authorities, Rivera lately disappeared, and proceeding to Ajusco there pronounced against the constitutional order, founding the motives of his disobedience in certain reasons that do not merit being taken into serious consideration, and which have already served as a pretext to others for the maintenance of anarchy and the neutralization of the efforts that are being made to complete the organization of the country.

It is stated that some few disaffected persons have gone with him, but the movement, according to our information, is entirely without importance, and the necessary measures have already been taken to restore to its normal state the order disturbed in the locality where Aureliano Rivera desires to impose his authority, and to light the torch of discord.

A printed proclamation has reached our hands, which we insert below, and by it will be seen the plan which Aureliano Rivera proposes to follow.

In this document there is nothing which specially calls attention, except the singular fact that it mentions certain individuals, of whom some are discharging public trusts, and who we trust will state that it is not true that they are complicated in the insurrection that Aureliano Rivera has instigated.

The following is the proclamation to which we refer :

TO THE NATION.

When, a few months ago, the heroic Mexican people struggled against the French invasion, to assure their independence, and against the insensate pretensions of the criminal empire, to guarantee the republican principles proclaimed since the era of our first emancipation, 1810; when, a few months ago, they generously shed in torrents their blood upon the altar of the country to reconquer by this means the precious rights that an insolent foreigner had usurped, we believed in the triumph and we had full faith in the victory of the people.

But with pain we have seen that later it would be necessary to continue the struggle against domestic oppressors, who have pretended to repel the European tyrants in order to supplant them themselves.

With pain we have seen that the constitution and the laws we have applauded are already mortally wounded by those who owe to them their titles, their consideration, and the fullness of their authority.

Don Benito Juarez, who, by an incalculable misfortune, came into the exercise of power at a time of disturbance and of revolution; who has governed always with dictatorial powers, and who for a long series of years has held the supreme power in his hands without check, without giving an account of its exercise, and without other limits than his will or his ambition; Don Benito Juarez was the man most fit to snatch from the worthy Mexican people their guarantees, and those faculties that the politicians call inalienable and imprescriptible; Juarez was the man most fit to break to pieces the constitution that has always been our hope and our salvation, and to plunge us into a sea of evils and of infinite calamities.

And so, in fact, it has been. Who does not know the history of events in Mexico during the past two years? Juarez usurped the authority that terminated in his hands, and declared that he would continue to be President, sometimes denominated provisional, at others national, at others simply depositary of the powers of the republic. He himself could not determine, for in reality he was nothing, or, if anything, he was an usurper.

Juarez, in abuse of the power he did not have, and with which he had invested himself, continued to command the people without authority from the people, without legality, without election, the source of all legitimate power, making the republic his patrimony and the Mexicans his slaves.

Juarez, the enemy already of the constitution he had broken, resorted to every means that aided his ambition to continue in the triumphal chair of the presidency, setting at naught the other constitutional powers, and to the humiliation of the free men of this land.

Juarez issued the election convocatorio; prophetic convocatorio! When he had no right to issue it; when he was not the constitutional President of the republic; when he had oppressed and deprived of liberty those to whom by law that function belonged, and while premeditating frauds, violence, and all the exercise of a tyrannical power in order to insure his re-election, and to be a weight for fifteen years on the patience of the good people of Mexico.

Juarez has intervened directly and criminally in the elections, and corrupted them to his advantage; he has deprived the people of their suffrages, and of those whom they elected, and he has instituted a congress, vicious in its origin, in order that its majority might protect and give absolution to his outrages against the national sovereignty.

Thus, many States are to-day without the governors of their election; but in exchange they have those imposed by Don Benito.

The people do not see in the seats of congress the men of their choice, but those who were ordered to be elected by the usurper of the public power.

The constitution is violated, justice is offended, and the sanctity of the rights of the people is outraged. We are not free, Mexicans, for a dictator commands us; we are not a republic, for the fundamental law does not exist, but the caprice of a man who has made himself a despot to our reproach.

Such grave considerations, whose truth is patent, and whose transcendence reaches those least accustomed to reflect upon them, impel us to take arms for the purpose of vindicating our justice, and to redeem our rights.

We are not ambitious of anything for ourselves; we do not wish to be presidents, nor ministers, nor deputies, nor governors.

Sons of the people, having shed our blood for liberty, we seek nothing but that the law shall rule, and that its decrees shall be complied with; that there shall be placed in the palace the magistrate called by the constitution, be he whom he may; and that it shall be he that shall convoke the people to hold their elections.

That in all the bounds of the republic there shall be free elections, without the interference of power, without its violating them, without its corrupting them, and without their being forced in its favor.

That the vote shall be sacred, and that then the public order shall proceed with the President that the people shall have given, be this whomsoever it may.

We protest that if Don Benito Juarez shall be the elected of the people, we will obey him sincerely; we will love him as the man invested with the legal power; we will sustain him as the first magistrate of the nation, and the arms we raise to-day to overthrow him we will then employ to defend him.

The question with us is not one of persons as is seen; it is of principles; and if we reject Juarez, it is because legal justice, public opinion, and constitutional right reject him. We are certain that our belief is the belief of the people, our judgment the judgment of the republic.

Our support is therefore everywhere, and the heroes who have shed their blood to lay the foundation in this dear country of the rule of the law, and of political morality, will place themselves, we do not doubt, at our side, and will hasten to swell our ranks, making the last effort in favor of liberty and of peace.

Viva the constitution of 1857! Viva the holy respect for the law! Viva the people who are the only sovereigns!

LETTER FROM GENERAL JUAN N. CORTINA.

[From the Diario Oficial, May 15, 1868.—Translation.]

MEXICO, May 15, 1868.

Messrs. Editors of the Diario Oficial:

DEAR SIR: In the number of yesterday there has been published in the paper you worthily edit the so-called manifesto to the nation, signed by Don Aureliano Rivera, disowning the supreme powers of the republic.

In this manifesto I have seen, with great surprise, that use is made of my name; and, although my conduct and my loyalty to the person of the actual President of the republic would be the most solemn protest against that unjustifiable abuse, I am under the necessity of requesting you to publish the most solemn denial that can be given to that gratuitous and evil-intentioned supposition.

I am now at the head of the brigade of Tamaulipas, which has been intrusted to me by the supreme government, and these forces will be one of its firmest supports against all anarchical or revolutionary movements, whoever may be their authors or whatever may be their tendencies.

Neither with Don Aureliano Rivera, nor with any other leader who attempts to disturb the legal order, am I connected, nor am I bound by compromises of any kind to combat the constitutional flag, the sole principle that I propose to sustain.

Far from my friends, I believe it necessary to make known to them this determination, in order that they may not be surprised by the reprehensible abuse of Don Aureliano Rivera in using my name as one of his partisans, in the stupid enterprise of overturning the order that the people have freely established.

Those who, like myself, have defended the independence and the constitution of 1857, have a right not to be judged by their countrymen as miserable leaders in personal contests without flag, like that just proclaimed by Don Aureliano Rivera, who has so badly corresponded to the considerations that have been extended to him by the kindness of the actual President of the republic.

In order that public opinion may not be led astray, and my friends and compatriots of Tamaulipas, and of the frontier in general, may rectify their judgment with respect to myself, I beg that you will be pleased to publish this communication, assuring you of the thanks of your friend and obedient servant,

JUAN N. CORTINA.

LETTER FROM GENERAL CHAVARRIA.

[From the Siglo XIX, May 15, 1868.—Translation.]

Señor Don Feliciano Chavarria sends to us the following letter :

Editor of the Ligo :

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I will thank you to publish in your paper the following lines, which have for their object to state to my fellow-citizens that I reside in this capital, that I am discharging the trust of deputy to the congress of the union, and serving at the same time in the municipality, and that, consequently, my signature to the revolutionary proclamation of General Aureliano Rivera, published yesterday afternoon by the Diario Oficial, is apocryphal.

There is nothing that authorizes said chief to use my name in the way he has, for far from being in accord with him, I am always disposed to maintain and defend the legal order.

I am, very truly, your friend and servant,

F. CHAVARRIA.

TETELA DE OCAMPO, May 16, 1868.

Mr. Editor of the Diario Oficial, Mexico :

DEAR SIR: In number 135 of the paper which you edit, corresponding to the 14th of the present month, I have seen a document bearing the names of various chiefs.

As among these names I find my own, and as I have not signed the said document, I beg of you that you will be pleased to make this known to the public by inserting the present letter in your paper, which favor will be duly recognized by your obedient servant,

ORDER FROM THE MINISTER OF WAR AGAINST NEGRETE AND AURELIANO RIVERA.

[From the Diario Oficial, May 18, 1868.—Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE AND OF THE DEPARTMENT OF WAR AND MARINE—SECTION FIRST—CIRCULAR.

The ex-General Don Miguel Negrete, after having deserted the defense of the national independence, withdrawing to foreign parts became a traitor to his country, placing himself at the service of Maximilian.

As a consequence of his evil conduct he had no place in the army. When the latter acquired its glorious triumph, and saved the independence and the republican institutions of the country, he remained a fugitive; and humiliated by his bad conduct, and awaiting only to find in a disturbance of the public order the means by which his crimes should remain without punishment, he sought proselytes in order to raise whatever flag if it was only the flag of rebellion. The only aid upon which he has been able to count, after a year of continuous effort, has been the public robbers of the highway. Of these he has made himself a chief, and leading a company of bandits, as has appeared in the official reports that have been published, he has been already twice attacked and beaten by the forces of the government, and completely put to rout.

The citizen President of the republic, animated by the desire to re-establish peace and the public order, and to extend to society the security that it merits, and which is so necessary to repair the great suffering it has experienced during the war, has thought proper to direct that all the authorities and the forces of the nation be required to apprehend Miguel Negrete and his accomplices wherever they may present themselves, in the understanding that any dissimulation or tolerance that may be used in this connection will make said authorities or forces responsible as co-operators and protectors of the crime of rebellion.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, May 17, 1868.

The GOVERNOR of the State of ———.

MINISTRY OF STATE AND OF THE DEPARTMENT OF WAR AND MARINE—SECTION FIRST—CIRCULAR.

The citizen general of brigade, Don Aureliano Rivera, having disappeared from this capital without the permission of the government, and afterwards having seduced the guard in charge of the road from Tlalpam to Cuernavaca, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Abraham Plata, as also that of Ajusco, commanded by Captain Miguel Romero, declaring themselves rebels against the authorities, and taking whatever pretext to cover their true object, which is that of robbing the villages and estates, and of living without other check than that of their own will, the citizen President of the republic has thought proper to direct that, in conformity with the laws, the said General Rivera, Lieutenant Colonel Plata, and Captain Romero, shall be dismissed from the army as unworthy to belong to it by reason of their desertion and crime, publishing this resolution and issuing it in the general order of the day, in order that they may be apprehended and punished as corresponds to their offense.

BENEFITS OF PRONUNCIAMENTOS.

Effects coming from Cuernavaca have been already detained in the road by the forces of Aureliano Rivera.

In this capital, since the pronunciamento of Ajusco, there has been an increase in the price of many articles of first necessity.

AURELIANO RIVERA.—This individual was in Milpa Alta on the 17th, and harangued the people, saying that his plan was limited solely to driving Juarez from the presidency, as that gentleman had never borne arms as he had, and had only acquired his position by his pen. He added that he had exposed his life and his property without any recompense, and that he should not lay down his arms until Juarez had been driven from the presidency. He recommended that they should not obey the authorities of the district, and declared that he would exercise the functions of prefect. He has decreed a forced loan of $3,000. While in Milpa Alta he supplied the force that accompanied him, giving a dollar to the soldiers and two to those who served as officers.

[From the Siglo XIX, of May 20.—Translation.]

According to the Monitor, Aureliano Rivera has decreed a forced loan of $50,000 on the manufactories of Tlalpam and San Angel.

It is stated that the constitutional army has taken the direction of Ameca.

It is reported that Colonel Manuel Inclan has joined the rebels, and that he was received with salutes and appointed chief of staff.

PRONUNCIAMENTOS IN THE STATE OF QUERETARO.

Editors of the Siglo XIX:

At daylight of to-day the second squadron of public security left for Rio Verde, in consequence of the invasion of that place by insurgent forces, who assassinated the political chief.

The squadron that was in Matehuala arrived to-day.

From Guadalajara there are adverse reports with reference to the troops from this State that are now at that place.

(Deposited at Queretaro May 14, 1868; received at Mexico May 14, 1868.)

Editors of the Siglo XIX:

The peace has been broken in this State. The district of Jalpan has been invaded by an insurgent force, who proclaim "Marquez and the regency." It is necessary that energetic and active measures should be taken by the general government, that of the State, and those of Mexico, Potosi, and Guanajuato.

(By telegraph line from the interior; deposited at Queretaro May 18, 1868; received at Mexico May 19, 1868.)

Editors Siglo XIX:

The political situation of the State becomes more and more complicated.

All the sierra is rising in insurrection, and the ranks of the insurgents are augmenting. San Juan del Rio has been invaded by an organized force, which exacted money and horses, and obliged the town authorities to pronounce.

There is no disturbance, as yet, in the capital of the State, nor in the district of Amealco. The business community has been called upon to arrange measures for its own protection, as the smallness of the garrison renders this step necessary.

Application has been made to the general government, in conformity with article 116 of the constitution, for its protection. If this is not given speedily, the consequences will fall where they belong.

(Deposited at Queretaro May 19, 1868; received at Mexico May 19, 1868.)

Editors Siglo XIX:

The insurgents, to the number of five hundred men, have modified their plan as proclaimed at Jalpan on the 8th instant, and now proclaim Santa Anna as dictator for five years, after which the republic is to be reconstituted by an election.

The revolution extends from Jililita to Tolimanejo, and appears also to have ramifications in Rio Verde.

This city still remains tranquil.

PLAN PROCLAIMED BY THE INSURGENTS OF THE STATE OF QUERETARO

[From the Siglo XIX, city of Mexico, May 22, 1868.—Translation.]

At the town of Jalpan, in the Sierra Gorda, this 8th day of the month of May, 1868, the chiefs and officers who are undersigned, being met for the purpose of concerting a plan which shall put an end to a system commenced with scaffolds erected for heroes, after having taken into consideration the iniquitous cruelty with which Don Benito Juarez and the leaders of his party have forced themselves into power; the organization of the authority they exercise, founded in laws such as that of the 25th of January, which has resuscitated in the midst of the nineteenth century the age of barbarity and of the most infamous feudalism; that in the name of that same law has sacrificed noble victims, who, in place of a scaffold, merited an altar raised to their civic virtues and to their heroism; that among those victims vilely immolated is found his Excellency General Thomas Mejia, who has gloriously associated his name with this sierra; considering that a government such as the present, which, on being conquered and in defeat, sought, as in the year 1859, a refuge and aid in the folds of the North American flag, offers no guarantees for the future, but, on the contrary, threatens the sacrifice in a scandalous manner of our territory and our nationality for the benefit of our common enemies, the Anglo-Saxons; that, before a day so unfortunate for our country shall arrive, it is necessary to intrust its interests to the worthy hands that will save it, as on another unfortunate occasion—after having taken all this into consideration, we have agreed, in the most solemn manner, upon the following plan:

ARTICLE 1. The sanguinary government of Don Benito Juarez is disowned, as well as all the authorities, general or local, emanating from the late elections held under the convencionaria of the 14th of August last.

ART. 2. The system which shall rule in the nation shall be the republican, and its chief shall be the well-deserving of his country, his excellency the general of division Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna.

ART. 3. Colonel José Velasquez is hereby recognized as the chief of the forces of the Sierra Gorda.

ART. 4. Copies of the present act shall be remitted where it shall correspond.

KIDNAPPING.

[From the Siglo XIX, city of Mexico, May 19, 1868.]

From Toluca, State of Mexico, the following is written to our colleague, the Monitor:

"Some twenty days ago Mr. Anuzaga, when returning with his wife from the village of Tarasquillo, where they had been to mass, to his manufactory, distant a thousand yards from the village, was set upon in the road and attempted to be kidnapped, but saved himself by a vigorous defense, killing one of the bandits. The same week Mr. Sebastian Silva was kidnapped on his estate of Nigini by six bandits, who demanded $20,000 from him. A Mr. Tovies, a drover, was also kidnapped on going to see a lot of animals that were at a village near by, and $8,000 were demanded for his release.

"On the 7th a party of thirty kidnappers entered the village of Colimaya and carried off from the public square, on market day, a Mr. José Albarán, exacting for him $4,000.

"Yesterday, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, the same band went to the estate of Zacango, distant half a league from Colimaya, and carried off Mr. Juan García and his employés, leaving the estate abandoned, and exacting for them $5,000.

"Last week three unfortunate muleteers were carried off from the road leading from here to Temango, and $300 each exacted for their release.

"In the direction of Zinacatepec two persons have been kidnapped, but the particulars are not yet known."

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, May 25, 1868.

SIR: In dispatch No. 119, of the 24th ultimo, I referred to the discussion, in the Mexican congress, of a project of law to suspend certain guarantees of the constitution, and to give to the executive certain powers to enable it more effectually to suppress conspiracies and punish offenses against the public tranquillity; and I transmitted to the department translation of a speech made by one of the government members upon that subject.

This discussion was originated by the presentation to congress, on the 21st of January last, of an initiative of the government, recommending the adoption now, on account of the situation of the country, of articles 4 to 11 and 27 to 31, inclusive, of the law of the 25th of January, 1862, which is the law under which Maximilian was executed, and which has been characterized by Mr. Montes, in a very able speech in the Mexican congress on the 8th of February last, on amnesty, as a law which to all offenses imposes the penalty of death.

The introduction of such an initiative, at a time when the reactionary party, finally defeated in 1860, having sunk yet lower by appealing to that last resort of defeated faction, foreign intervention, has now no longer any existence in the country, and when that foreign intervention has entirely passed away, and by the triumph so lately achieved the whole republic was placed unreservedly in the hands of the constitutional government, has started public sentiment and occasioned a prolonged and heated discussion, not only in congress but also in the public press, for it is felt that such a measure now can be necessary only as against the liberals themselves, by one portion of that party against another, and that it is the strongest evidence that permanent tranquillity is yet of doubtful realization.

While the debate has continued, the situation, which in January led the government to ask for these additional powers, has become worse; but the opposition to the measure has been so strong, that after the initiative of the executive had been several times modified, and the death penalty stricken out, an entirely new law was finally framed, much more moderate, yet still unpopular, which passed congress on the 6th instant, and of which I transmit translation herewith.

In dispatch No. 119 I also mentioned the granting of extraordinary powers by the legislature of the State of Tobasco to the governor of that State.

Since that time similar powers have been conferred upon their governors by the legislatures of the States of Puebla and of Queretaro, and now the faculties contained in the present law have been conferred upon the general government by the congress of the Union, all because it is urged that tranquillity cannot be maintained under the normal action of the State and federal authorities.

This is in addition to special measures touching the rebellions which have occurred, and have been suppressed, in the States of Yucatan and Sinaloa, and that which cannot correctly be said yet to have terminated in the State of Guerrero.

It is scarcely ten months since the constitutional government re-entered this capital, and without an element of resistance left against it, and with greater sources of prestige and strength than ever before, had the destinies of the republic entirely in its hands, and there was, apparently, no reason why permanent peace, order, and security should not be attained.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

LAW FOR THE SUSPENSION OF GUARANTEES AND THE PUNISHMENT OF CONSPIRATORS.

[From the Diario Oficial, May 9, 1868.—Translation.]

SECRETARYSHIP OF STATE AND OF THE DEPARTMENT OF GOVERNMENT—SECTION I.

The citizen President of the Mexican republic has been pleased to address to me the following decree:

Benito Juárez, the constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known:

That the congress of the Union has thought proper to decree the following:

ARTICLE 1. The guarantee conceded in the first part of article thirteen of the constitution is suspended.*

ART. 2. The guarantee contained in article twenty-one is also suspended † and the general government can impose executive penalties for political offenses not exceeding one year of reclusion, confinement, or banishment, and can use this authorization before the offenders are consigned to the judicial authority.

ART. 3. The crime of conspiracy shall be judged in conformity with the provisions of this law, and punished with the penalty of five to ten years of imprisonment, banishment, or confinement.

ART. 4. For the trial there shall be observed the following rules:

1st. Immediately that the respective military authority has information that a conspiracy is in progress, whether by public report, denouncement, accusation, or whatever other manner, it shall proceed to make the corresponding examination in conformity with the general ordinance of the army and of the law of the 15th September, 1857, and the cause when ready shall be heard before an ordinary court-martial, whatever may be the category, employment, or commission of the accused. In places where there are no military commandants or generals-in-chief, the governors of the States shall act in their stead.

2d. The process up to placing the cause in the state of defense shall be terminated by the prosecutor within sixty hours, and the defense shall be concluded within the following twenty-four; the court-martial shall immediately thereafter be ordered to assemble.

3d. Whenever a sentence of the court-martial shall be confirmed by the respective military commandant, general-in-chief, or governor acting in their stead, it shall be executed without any other recourse than that of pardon.

4th. Military advocates, named by the supreme government, shall necessarily be present at the ordinary court-martials, as is provided in the law of the 15th of September, 1857, to enlighten with their opinion the members of said court. The legal opinions that they may give to the military commandants, generals-in-chief, or governors, shall be rendered in conformity with the circular of the 6th of October, 1860, as, being necessary accessories, they are responsible for such opinions.

5th. The generals-in-chief, military commandants, or governors upon whom the exact compliance with this law is incumbent, and the military advocates, shall be personally responsible for whatever omission they may make, it being the federal service that is treated of.

ART. 5. There shall not be comprehended in the dispositions of this law offenses of the press, nor can there be tried in conformity with it functionaries who enjoy a constitutional exemption of the federation or of the States.

ART. 6. The suspension of guarantees established by this law shall continue until the 31st of December of this year, and shall have effect only for the crime of conspiracy and others which disturb the public peace.

ART. 7. When these faculties cease, the executive shall give an account before congress of the use that has been made of them.

Hall of sessions, Mexico, May 6th, 1868.

FRANCISCO ZARCO,
President.

GUILLERMO VALLE, Secretary.
JOAQUIN M. ALCALDE, Secretary.

Wherefore, and with the accord of the council of ministers, I order that it be printed, published, and circulated.

Dated in the national palace of Mexico, May 8th, 1868.

The Citizen J. L. VALLARTA, Minister of Government.

BENITO JUAREZ.

And I communicate the same to you for your intelligence and compliance.

VALLARTA.

* [Article thirteen of the constitution, first part, is as follows: "In the Mexican republic no one shall be judged by special laws nor by special tribunals."]

† [Article twenty-one of the constitution is as follows: "The application of punishment, properly such, belongs to the judicial authority. Political or administrative authorities can only impose as corrections fines not exceeding five hundred dollars, and confinement not exceeding one month, in cases and manner expressly determined by law."]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, May 27, 1868.

SIR: An important debate took place in the Mexican Congress on the 20th instant, upon the subject of the payment of interest on their foreign debt.

The appropriation bill was under consideration, and the discussion was upon the question whether the appropriation relating to the foreign debt should be applied to the payment of interest or be used for the buying in of the depreciated principal. The latter course was determined upon by a vote of one hundred to twenty-one.

The debate was participated in by Mr. Iglesias, late minister of treasury, Mr. Romero, the actual minister, and Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, the minister for foreign affairs, who urged the policy that was adopted. The ground was taken on the part of the government, that with regard not only to the English and Spanish convention debts, but also the London bondholders' debt, Mexico was not at present under obligation to pay interest, the conventions being at an end, as claimed, and the bondholders having treated with Maximilian.

Reference was also made in the debate to the debt lately contracted by Mexico in the United States.

In my dispatches No. 92 of the 23d of March and No. 103 of the 3d ultimo, I informed the department of the similar action that took place when the provisional appropriation bill was under consideration in the last session.

The present action of congress may therefore be considered as final.

The gravity of the questions involved in the action that has thus been taken, leads me to call the special attention of the department to the views expressed in this debate. A translation in full of the published report is inclosed herewith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEBATE IN THE MEXICAN CONGRESS UPON THE PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON THE FOREIGN DEBT.

[From the Siglo XIX, city of Mexico, May 21, 1868.—Translation.]

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT.

Session of the 20th of May, 1868. Mr. Zarco presiding.

Mr. AVILA, secretary. The discussion of the appropriation bill will be resumed.

The appropriations relating to the public debt being read, were placed in discussion.

Mr. FERNANDEZ AGUIRRE. I rise solely to ask the committee to state whether the debt contracted in the United States has been liquidated and approved by congress.

Mr. MEJIA. The committee has not only approved all the appropriations proposed by the government under this head, but it has augmented them by the sum of $169,432 for auctions. With respect to whether the debts contracted in the United States have been approved, the minister of treasury can best give this information to Mr. Aguirre.

The MINISTER OF TREASURY. The debt treated of in the appropriation bill has previously been liquidated and approved, and the interest that it bears having to be paid in New York is the reason why the exchange and the expenses of commission that have to be paid to the person charged with its payment in that city are inserted. There is also another debt that is not approved nor liquidated, and for this reason it has been excluded from the appropriation bill.

Mr. AGUIRRE. I have called attention to this debt because I believe it was contracted during the war, in use of the extraordinary powers with which the executive was then invested: and as all of the acts of the government, emanating from those powers, are subject to revision, it appears to me that the debt referred to requires to be approved by congress.

Mr. ZAMACONA. Before the monarchical intervention came to disturb the march of affairs in the republic, laws had been decreed adjusting the public debt, and the conventions with foreign governments were then in the process of arrangement and payment.

Afterwards the holders of the foreign debt concluded other arrangements with the usurper, by which the amount of these debts was augmented. Both of these circumstances now make a new arrangement indispensable.

But this cannot be carried into effect except by congress, as it is one of its exclusive attributes, and to leave to the executive the initiative in so grave an affair is, in a certain manner, to abdicate its most august functions.

Congress cannot, I repeat, without abdicating its sovereignty, decree a gross sum for this object, without knowing, at least, if the bases are desirable that are to enter into a new arrangement, and if the manner of payment that is to be adopted is expedient. To vote the expenditure of three millions of dollars in a vague manner, without definitively expressing how it is to be employed, is not only to yield what constitutes the most sacred duty of congress, but may produce the greatest evils for the country.

With reference to the debt contracted in London, the government was authorized by the law of the 14th of October, 1850, to purchase that debt at the price it might have in the market. But it should be observed, that by the arrangements that the holders concluded with the usurper, the amount has been augmented in such a manner that this government cannot recognize it without a previous adjustment that shall clearly show what are the legitimate claims against the republic; and these are antecedents that render it indispensable that congress shall not yield the faculty that is conceded to it by the constitution.

The same should be said with reference to the diplomatic conventions, but this is still more clearly seen with reference to the interior debt.

The law of the 30th November, 1850, arranged definitively the questions relative to that debt, and in harmony with the law of the 14th of October of that year. I therefore ask the committee, are these laws still in force, or not? and is it proposed to repeal them, in the article of the appropriation bill now under discussion?

It is necessary to give to our financial system a regular and definitive arrangement; and if the power is left to the executive to dictate special and exceptional measures, each one of them will constitute an additional embarrassment in the way of the attainment of that important object.

The question being involved in these considerations, it is seen that the existing laws are opposed to the initiative of the government.

Mr. F. MEJIA. The majority of the committee on appropriations had to differ, with regret, from the opinion of one of their esteemed members, Mr. Mata, in treating of the appropriation with reference to the cancellation of the public debt, as that gentleman desired that the sum of three millions of dollars that had been appropriated should be applied solely to the payment of the interest on the debt, when the committee desired that it should be applied to the buying up of the debt, by means of the systems of auctions decreed on the 30th of November last.

Besides, the special report of Mr. Mata added the sum of $219,987 to the three millions already agreed upon, in order to make up the precise amount of the interest on the said debts, including the convention debts and the floating debt. The reasons that have influenced the majority of the committee to ask that the three millions of dollars shall be dedicated to the payment of interest and the buying in of the debt at the same time, are the following:

- That if, as is to be expected, and as our experience thus far in the few auctions that have been held has shown, the holders of the debts take part voluntarily in these sales, at the end of a few years we shall have cancelled a great part of our debt, with satisfaction to the creditors and with very great relief to the nation, and an end will consequently be put to the constant motives of difference with the nations of Western Europe, and to the pretext for new reclamations and invasions.

In the judgment of the committee our government is not obliged to now pay in preference the interest upon the convention debts, because the treaties that united Mexico with the powers that recognized the intervention, and disowned the republican government, are to be considered as insubsistent.

Consequently the obligation that rested upon the national treasury does not retain an international character, nor can the terms of payment continue to subsist that were stipulated in an arrangement that has been terminated in consequence of that recognition. The government, therefore, is at liberty to fix the terms of payment as it shall think proper.

Why should we concede to the foreign creditors and holders of bonds of the English debt the subsistence of the contract embraced in the law of the 14th of October, 1850, when the same bondholders themselves have infringed that contract, treating of it and reforming it with the government of the usurper ?

And this is so true that the English government itself has thought it dangerous to make any reclamation against the republic. Mr. T. Baring asked the minister of foreign affairs, in the House of Commons, on the 21st of February last, what were the relations with Mexico; and if any existed, what measures the government had taken to carry into effect the conventions.

The minister replied that no relations existed, in consequence of the act of the government of Mexico; but that the question of exacting a compliance with the conventions was of a very grave character, and one in which a hasty determination should not be taken.

For these considerations, and also the well-founded reasons which, in support of the modification proposed by the committee on appropriations, have been urged by Mr. Iglesias and other distinguished and able speakers who have preceded me in the debate, I insist in asking that the chamber will be pleased to approve the said modification, expressing the appropriation in one gross sum, in order not to leave place for the subsistence of a basis of capital and interest of each debt at a time when the republic is under the best of circumstances to secure great advantages in the future arrangements that it may have to make.

Mr. ZAMACONA: I ask the secretary to be pleased to read the laws of the 14th of October and 30th of November, 1850. Mr. Alcalde read them.

The minister of treasury, Mr. ROMERO. Mr. Zamacona has made two inquiries which I will answer. But, first, I may be permitted to call the attention of the chamber to another matter of much interest. Besides the appropriations relating to the payment of the public debt, the government proposed others in its first initiative, and with the permission of the chamber I will read the communication which accompanied them.

It was read.

It was proposed, therefore, that a sum should remain at the disposal of the government for the payment of orders already drawn against the treasury, and that have not yet been paid for want of funds, and of others which it will be necessary to draw in favor of creditors who are found in special circumstances, and for that reason have to be attended to by the government.

The government believes that some liberty should be left to it to make such payments, first, because it would be unjust to deprive the holders of the orders that have been issued of the right that they have to their payment; and, secondly, because in many cases it is absolutely necessary to attend with a certain preference to one claimant rather than to another for the reasons that I have already indicated.

With respect to what has been stated by Mr. Zamacona, I have to say that it is in accord with the ideas of the government.

But setting that aside, the committee assigned a million and eighty thousand dollars for the payment of the debt contracted in London, for it is unquestionably better to buy in the debt than to pay interest upon it. Mr. Mata, in his special report, assigned certain appropriations for the payment of the interest. The government would accept that idea; but the question of the debt being subject to new negotiations, it would prejudice their result. It is known that by arrangements made with the usurper that debt was augmented, and without a definitive arrangement the payment of interest would inevitably be upon what was due by the republic, and upon what it cannot recognize.

The English bondholders, recognizing the error that they committed, have had two meetings in London, and at the last they appointed a permanent committee, which has addressed to the government the communication I will read. The said communication is as follows:

"MEXICAN BONDHOLDERS' COMMITTEE,

"1 Copthall court, Throgmorton street, London, E. C., April 14, 1868.

"SIR: I beg reference to the letter which on the 24th December last I had the honor of addressing to the foreign department of your government, and to inform your excellency that since that date an important step has been taken by the bondholders in the appointment of a permanent committee, charged with the supervision of their interests and furnished with authority to negotiate terms for the adjustment of their claims.

"In the accompanying report of the proceedings of the public meeting at which this appointment took place, (copies of which I transmit for the information of President Juarez, your excellency, and the other members of the cabinet,) you will observe that the committee then selected comprises among its number members of the British Parliament, and other gentlemen of position and influence, and you will gather from this fact the weight and significance to be attached to the confidence and hope in Mexico expressed at the meeting; and I would specially call your excellency's attention to the cordiality with which the observations the chairman made with reference to President Juarez and the members of his cabinet were received on that occasion.

"The good will of the bondholders has not, however, as you will perceive by the provisional committee's report, presented at that meeting, (copy of which is also transmitted,) restricted itself to words alone, a memorial having been prepared by them for presentation to our government, praying her Majesty's ministers to resume official intercourse with your country, and thus recognize the national character of the administration of which your excellency forms a part.

"While, however, it is with gratification that I bring these evidences of friendship for Mexico and esteem for yourself and the other members of President Juarez's cabinet to your excellency's notice, it is, I regret to say, also my duty to refer to the serious and wide-spread inconvenience, and, indeed, distress which the entire cessation of any payments of interest has brought upon the less affluent of the bondholders. And I am expressly directed to convey, on behalf of the committee, the expression of the hope that it may be in the power of your excellency shortly to afford some measure of relief to a body of men who have given such material proofs of their confidence in the honor of Mexico and her government.

"With the view of aiding the attainment of so desirable a result, the committee are prepared at once to open negotiations with your excellency, either in this country, through an accredited agent of your own, or in Mexico, through the instrumentality of a delegate sent by them from this country.

"Trusting that, for the information of the committee, I may be favored on an early occasion with your excellency's views,

"I have the honor to remain your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

"WM. W. HOLMES, Secretary.

"His Excellency Señor Don C. MATIAS ROMERO,

"Minister of Finance, Mexico."

It is seen, therefore, that the holders of the debt are disposed to enter into arrangements, and if the chamber should declare that it is about to pay the interest, it would prejudice the question, and would nullify the advantages the government has a right to expect.

The opinion of the executive is that in no manner should the payment of interest be agreed to.

With reference to the debt in the United States, there would be no inconvenience in suppressing the appropriation relating to interest; and in so far as relates to the others they might remain the same as the English.

The government is also conformable to the stipulation of eight hundred thousand dollars for the floating debt, under the understanding that it is not to be obliged to pay interest.

Mr. Zamacona has said that the executive has sought to abrogate the faculties of Congress. This is not so.

Before resigning its extraordinary powers the government ordered these public auctions. Congress can annul that disposition, but until that is done the right is legitimate under which they are held.

The executive has desired that congress would take up the subject of the public debt, and would dictate regulations that should serve as its guide, as in this manner the executive would be relieved from a grave responsibility; but the time that remains to the chamber in which to terminate its labors is so limited, that although it should be dedicated exclusively to that subject no result could be attained.

With respect to the auctions that have been held, the government experiences satisfaction; more than a million of dollars of the debt has been canceled, and the debt has risen in price in the market, as before it was only quoted at twenty-five per cent., while now it is sold at forty.

Mr. MEJIA. The committee assents to the appropriations proposed, but it does not believe that any sum should be fixed for the payment of interest, because it would prejudice pending arrangements.

In consequence it amends the article in the following form:

"For the cancellation and interest of the public debt, interior and foreign, $3,500,000."

Mr. Zamacona stated that the object of his observations was not to place difficulties in the way of the patriotic arrangements proposed by the government. He then repeated his preceding remarks, and asked the minister of treasury if he believed that the laws of the 14th of October and the 30th November, 1850, were still in force, repeating also the reasons which led him to desire to have this inquiry answered.

The minister of treasury replied that it was in no sense prudent to make any declaration with reference to whether those laws were in force or not, because it would establish a very bad basis for future arrangements with regard to the public debt.

Mr. PRIETO. In the observations of Mr. Zamacona there are two points to consider: The prerogative of congress to intervene exclusively in the adjustment of the public debt, and the establishment of a right, that of consolidating a debt and its interest.

After some remarks with regard to the English debt to prove that there is no good reason for its bearing that name, the debt being a national debt, and some observations with reference to there being no consolidated debt, he concluded, asking that the approval of the chamber should be given to the special report of Mr. Mata, in so far as relates to the appropriations now under discussion.

Mr. MEJIA said that the committee had abstained from specifying any sum for the payment of interest, because such assignment would prejudice the arrangements that are had in view.

Mr. IGLESIAS. There is no doubt that it is the privilege of congress to attend to the adjustment of the public debt, as also it is a duty for it, as well as for the executive, to comply strictly with existing engagements; but in the present case, it is not possible to apply any determined sum to the payment of interest.

It cannot be said that the laws of the 14th of October and the 30th of November, 1850, are in force, and they are not because the holders of the English debt celebrated new arrangements with the usurper, and by that act itself prejudiced the legality of their credits.

It would be dangerous, on the other hand, to declare the validity of those laws, because in consequence of such declaration the English creditors would refuse to enter into arrangements that they are now disposed to accept.

With reference to the conventions, it is an undeniable fact that they do not exist, because in disowning the government of the republic, and treating with the usurper, those conventions were de facto terminated.

But the government recognizes the debt, and the manner of its payment will depend upon the new arrangements that may be made.

With reference to the manner of canceling it by means of auctions, it is asked whether, the payment of interest having been stipulated, the purchase at auction is not inconvenient. I believe that far from offering any inconvenience these auctions are very acceptable in every respect.

First, because in the auctions there is no compulsion; those attend who may believe it convenient to realize their credits, and the others do not; so that there is an advantage for the one who sells, because he realizes a sum that it is convenient for him to realize, and there is also for those who do not attend, because by the reduction of the amount of the debt that is upon the market, the higher will be its value, the proof of which is in the fact stated by the minister of treasury.

The MINISTER OF TREASURY. Mr. Zamacona has said that the payment that has been made of some of the floating debt, has been made through favoritism. I protest that neither the citizen President nor myself have issued an order in favor of any person, that could have the character of favoritism.

The minister of relations, Mr. LERDO DE TEJADA. The payment of the interest cannot be made, because it would be lacking even in justice. I say justice, because with reference to the debt contracted in London it cannot be exacted that the law of the 14th of October should be declared in force, for the holders of that debt in treating with the usurper have incurred a grave prejudice, which requires a new arrangement.

There were but few of the debts under the conventions that bore interest previous to the conventions; all derive it from these, and the conventions being broken, the debts cease to bear interest also.

With reference to the form of payment of the Spanish debt, that now being made is the same that was stipulated in the convention for its payment, and consequently there is in this no offense on the part of the government.

Mr. FRIAS Y SOTO. If, as has been stated, with evident reason, an assignment for the payment of interest would prejudice future arrangements, what should we do? Why make this appropriation? I believe it will have the same result as if the payment of interest was agreed to. I ask, therefore, that the committee will withdraw it, or that it be voted down, and that the special report of Mr. Mata be approved.

Mr. MEJIA. With respect to interest the amount is not known, nor is its payment binding. With regard to the capital it is a debt recognized, and which is subject to cancellation. On the other hand there are some items among the appropriations, the amount of which is known, and others not. With this I believe I have answered Mr. Frias y Soto.

Mr. PRIETO insisted on his previous arguments.

Mr. AVILA, secretary. Are there any others who desire to speak? Is it sufficiently discussed? It is.

Mr. FRIAS Y SOTO. I demand the ayes and nays.

Mr. AVILA, secretary, read the amended article, and added, shall it be adopted?

The vote being taken, the article was adopted by one hundred votes against twenty-one.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 29, 1868.

SIR: The department has been informed by Mr. Black, the consul at Mexico, in a dispatch of the 29th ultimo, of the death of Mr. John Braniff, a citizen of the United States, from wounds inflicted by a band of robbers at a bridge on the Puella branch of the Mexico and Vera Cruz railway. Although such events may and do happen in every country, they are unfortunately common in Mexico, and their frequency is no doubt owing to the comparative impunity of the offenders. All that can be expected in such cases, when no officer of the government may be concerned in the act, is that the foreign government shall in good faith exert all its authority to bring the aggressors to justice.

You will make an application to the Mexican government to this effect in the case of Mr. Braniff.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

EDWARD L. PLUMB, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, June 2, 1868.

SIR: The closing of the second period of the sessions of the Mexican congress took place on Sunday the 31st ultimo.

I have the honor to transmit herewith translation of the addresses of President Juarez and of the president of congress, Mr. Zarco, on that occasion.

The succeeding session will commence, according to the constitution, on the 16th of September next.

By the Mexican constitution it is provided that during the recess of congress there shall be a permanent deputation composed of one member from each State and Territory, to be chosen by congress just before the close of the session.

The deputation so chosen met and organized yesterday, and will remain in session at this capital.

The faculties of the permanent deputation are prescribed in the extracts from the constitution of which I inclose translation herewith.

It will be observed that among them is the power to call congress together in extra session, and to grant leave of absence to the President of the republic.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SPEECH OF PRESIDENT JUAREZ AT THE CLOSING OF CONGRESS, MAY 31, 1868.

[From the Diario Oficial, May 31.—Translation.]

CITIZEN DEPUTIES: With patriotic zeal for the fulfilment of your high duties, you have been assembled for the long term of six months of sessions. On their termination now, you can retire with the satisfaction of having dedicated your deliberations with an enlightened spirit to objects of importance for the public welfare.

A liberal law for the press has been invested with the character of an organic law, securing that ample liberty of thought so indispensable for the subsistence and prosperity of all the liberties acquired by the constitution and reform.

The establishment of colonies on our northern frontiers will be an efficacious means of protection against the incursions of the Indians, at the same time fostering and securing the welfare of those States by increasing their population and developing all their sources of wealth.

Freedom of commerce among the States has been protected, and the hinderances which might have prevented it have been removed.

The attention and care of congress has also been taken up with the subject of public improvements and means of communication, which so greatly favor the movement of commerce and industry, so beneficial to society.

Congress has exercised one of its most important prerogatives by classifying the revenues, and decreeing the estimates of income and expenditure of the federation.

These labors having been performed for the first time since the prolonged civil and foreign war which the republic has suffered, congress will be able in future to weigh in its enlightened consideration the improvements which may be suitable, if experience should show that they may be required by the necessities of the administration.

Such public disturbances as had any serious character have terminated favorably, and it is to be hoped that the inestimable blessing of peace will be secured. Peace has been re-established first in the States of Yucatan and Guerrero, and afterwards the disorders in Sinaloa have been suppressed.

Small bands still exist in some districts of the States of Mexico and Queretaro. The nature of the ground in which they maraud has facilitated their escape from the forces the governor has sent to pursue them, but they are daily more actively pursued, in order that the roads and towns may be freed from this plague.

The government, which has given so many proofs of clemency and generosity, is also strictly bound to employ, in cases of necessity, the means of repression authorized by the last decree of congress, against such parties as should still pretend to speculate in revolutions, by attacking the dearest interests of society.

Nevertheless, the general opinion of the republic should inspire us with confidence respecting the future, as it disapproves energetically of the use of force under any pretext, for placing itself above the laws. Liberty and peace will be consolidated by a faithful observance of our institutions. Accept, citizen deputies, the wishes I make that we may be able to congratulate ourselves on the condition of the republic, when you reassemble in the coming term of your sessions.

Reply of the President of Congress, Mr. Zarco.

CITIZEN PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC: In fulfillment of a constitutional precept the congress of the union this day suspends the labors to which it has been dedicated for six months. Its deliberations during that term have had for their object the securing to the Mexican people the benefits of legal order, and of that political liberty which, with such bravery, it knew how to recover on saving its independence.

The first result of the triumph of the republic over the misguided who wished to extinguish its autonomy and subvert its institutions, was the assembling of a congress freely elected by the people.

The national representation met just after the calamities of the foreign war had terminated, and when the intervention and the so-called empire had everywhere left the odious marks of blood, ruin, and disorganization. The labors of congress, in such a state of things, should tend to reconstruct, reorganize and tranquilize a community which had been deeply affected, and which had not halted in the face of any sacrifice, provided it could save its independence. In so difficult a task the congress with pleasure perceives it has reckoned on the support of the good sense of the people, who, in the clearest manner, have for years past been manifesting their sincere adhesion to democratic institutions, and who, in the midst of misfortunes and the ordeals they have had to go through, only base their hopes on legal order.

Congress, as soon as it was installed, took care to compute the votes emitted in the last elections, and declared who were the citizens called by the people to exercise the executive power and the magistracies of the supreme court of justice, and thus hastened the regular reorganization of the public powers. Afterwards, a vacancy having occurred in the supreme court, and some districts being without representatives in congress, the latter convoked the people for new elections, in order that the supreme powers should exist and perform their functions in a regular manner.

Constitutional order having been fully re-established, congress has consolidated it, making it effective and giving it respectability and prestige.

Obstacles have yet been encountered in endeavoring completely to pacify the country. When any serious disorder has taken place, congress, true to the spirit of the institutions, and without sacrificing liberty to transient circumstances, has strengthened the action and power of the executive as far as necessity required it. It was thus that the revolution in Yucatan was suppressed and that people were enabled to get rid of anarchy and enter on constitutional order.

Subsequently, congress, with the view of re-establishing peace and security which are threatened by disorganizing bands who have no political tendencies, has given the government the faculties necessary for restoring to the country that repose it so much desires, and which has to be the basis of its prosperity. Congress leaves the executive armed with the law to preserve society from fresh disturbances, and it is sure that law will suffice for the attainment of so important an object.

The necessity is being felt for those organic laws which are to be the complement of the constitution, and are to secure public liberty. Congress has not been idle on this point which it leaves well advanced: It has already issued the organic law of the liberty of the press, removing all obstacles for the expression of thought, and so regulating it that the press may be the guardian of all rights and liberties.

Congress, not allowing itself to be carried away by angry feelings, engendered during long civil wars, nor by the odium inspired by treason to the country, has taken care to honor the memory of eminent patriots, thus offering emulation to republican virtue.

Congress, following the spirit of the times, and comprehending the necessities and aspirations of peoples, in as far as circumstances have permitted, have given preference to material improvements, and has decreed the opening of means of communication; but the time has not sufficed for concluding all the business relating to so important a matter.

The establishment of military colonies in the northern frontier States, and in those of Yucatan and Campeche, is a proof of the solicitude of the union in favor of the districts at a distance from the center, and that it is now possible to attend to the wants of all the States. Endeavors are being made for the defense of towns on the frontier against the incursions of the savages, and also for the foundations of new towns, so that in the course of time what is now a desert may become a center of prosperity and civilization.

In several legislative measures the object has been kept in view of favoring the development of industry and commerce, and in general the interests of the working classes—interests which, in order to prosper, must be in harmony and not run into the error of reciprocal hostility. The most important of these measures is that which removes obstacles to the transport of national products and protects the liberty of traffic among all the States of the union.

In the second period of sessions, which ends to-day, congress, in compliance with the constitution, has given preference to financial affairs, and, after arduous deliberations, has revised the estimate of expenses and has issued the law of classification of rents and the estimate of income. For the first time since the promulgation of the constitution has congress been able to attend to these labors, which are one of the principal objects of the representative system.

Very far is it from believing that perfection has been arrived at, but it certainly feels satisfaction in having taken the first step in the path that ought to lead us to order, economy, and security in the management of finances.

It has had for its object to give to the country a good administration, to attend to its necessities, particularly in the branch of material improvements, to introduce economy and alleviate contributors.

Time and experience will perfect these labors, which in future will become easy and simple, and then the administration may be made still more simple and the taxes considerably diminished, so that the people may enjoy a cheap government, and know that all that they contribute to the treasury is employed for the good of the country.

Congress has had to exercise the high judicial functions intrusted to it by the constitution, and the sentences which it has pronounced have come to corroborate great political principles. They have demonstrated that the responsibility of high functionaries is not a vain or empty promise, that there is legal recourse against arbitrary measures, and against the usurpation of power, and they have at the same time made manifest that the supremacy of the Union should be respected in every country, that individual guarantees cannot be trampled under foot with impunity, and that the general powers do not restrain the sovereignty of the states in their internal regime.

Congress believes that it has fulfilled its duty, and that all its labors have tended to the reorganization of the republic, and to increasing in the people the adhesion they profess for the institutions.

On retiring into recess the national representation has confidence in you, citizen President, that you will be, as ever, the zealous guardian of the constitution, laws, and honor of the republic. It hopes that, with the authorizations it has conceded to you, you will advance in the work of pacifying the country, applying the law with salutary energy.

The national representation has, above all, confidence in the good sense of the people, and hopes that by the efforts of the citizens, particularly those invested with authority, in the strict fulfillment of the law, they will arrive at consolidating the institutions, and that the republic will march serenely and majestically in the path of its prosperity and aggrandizement.

The representatives of the people entertain no other ambition, and they hope when they reassemble to find the condition of the republic improved.

If unforeseen circumstances or public necessities should call for legislative action before the constitutional period, the representatives of the people will attend, anxious to fulfill their duty, with no other view than the welfare of the people, and the securing of legal order and liberty.

Extracts from the Mexican constitution, paragraph IV, of the permanent deputation.

ARTICLE 73. During the recess of the congress of the Union there shall be a permanent deputation, composed of one deputy from each State and Territory, who shall be named by congress on the evening of the last day of its sessions.

ART. 74. The powers of the permanent deputation are the following :

1. To give its consent to the use of the national guard in the cases spoken of in article 72, clause 20.

[Article 72, clause 20, is as follows : "Of giving its consent that the executive may order the national guard without their respective States or Territories, fixing the amount of the force necessary to be so used."]

2. To determine by itself alone, or at the petition of the executive, the convocation of the congress in extraordinary session.

3. To approve in the case of appointments, as referred to in article 85, clause 3.

[Article 85, clause 3, is as follows : "To appoint ministers, diplomatic agents, and consul general, with the approbation of congress, or, in its recess, of the permanent deputation."]

4. To receive the oath of the President of the republic, and of the ministers of the supreme court of justice, in the cases provided by this constitution.

5. To report upon all the business not disposed of, in order that the session which follows may immediately take up such unfinished business.

ART. 29. In cases of invasion, grave disturbances of the public peace, or whatever cause which may put society in great peril or conflict, solely the President of the republic, in concurrence with the council of ministers, and with the approbation of the congress of the Union, and, in the recess of this, of the permanent deputation, may suspend the guarantees established by this constitution, with exception of those that assume the life of man; but such suspension shall be only for a limited time by means of general provisions, and of such a character as not to favor a determined individual purpose. If the suspension take place during the session of congress, this shall grant such authorization as they shall deem necessary to enable the executive to confront the circumstances. If it shall take place during recess the permanent deputation shall, without delay, convoke the congress for its advice and action.

ART. 95. The duties of members of the supreme court of justice can only be resigned for grave reason, approved by congress, to whom the resignation shall be presented; in the recess of congress, before the permanent deputation.

ART. 84. The President cannot leave the residence of the federal powers, nor the exercise of his functions, without grave motive, approved by congress, or, in its recess, by the permanent deputation.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, June 4, 1868.

SIR : Among the laws passed at the session of the Mexican congress just closed, was one establishing a system of military colonies in the frontier States, for the purpose, as stated, of defending the frontier of the republic against incursions of the Indians.

These colonies are to be thirty in number, and are to be located seven in the state of Sonora, seven in Chihuahua, four in Nuevo Leon, six in Coahuila, four in Durango, and two in Lower California.

A law was also passed establishing two similar colonies in the States of Yucatan and Campeche.

Translations of the two decrees are transmitted herewith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DECREE ESTABLISHING MILITARY COLONIES IN THE FRONTIER STATES.

[From the Diario Oficial, May 1, 1868.—Translation.]

The citizen President of the republic has been pleased to communicate to me the following decree:

Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known:

That the congress of the Union has decreed as follows:

The congress of the Union decrees:

ARTICLE 1. In order to defend the frontiers of the republic against the incursions of the wild Indians, thirty military colonies, distributed in the following manner, shall be established: In the State of Sonora, seven; in that of Chihuahua, seven; in that of Nuevo Leon, four; in that of Coahuila, six; in that of Durango, four; and in the territory of Lower California, two. The headquarters of the colonies shall be fixed by the common accord of the citizen governors of the respective States.

ART. 2. Each colony shall be composed of one hundred men, mounted, armed and equipped in the manner most suitable to the service.

ART. 3. The veteran standing of these companies shall consist of fifteen hundred men of the army—preference being given to the corps raised in the frontier States. For the completion of the three thousand men, enlisting offices shall be opened in the towns nearest the place designed for a colony.

ART. 4. The enlistment shall be made under the following conditions: 1. Those citizens who may wish to enlist in any company shall bind themselves to pass at once with their families to the place fixed on for their residence, and remain there for six years. 2. The executive shall give the colonists, according to their class, one or more lots of land, materials for construction, and all the necessaries for agriculture, with the seeds necessary for the crop of one year, and moreover the corresponding monthly salary.

ART. 5. The executive shall have the power, for the purpose of public utility, to take from the owners of any uninhabited lands those which may be occupied by the colonies.

ART. 6. The land occupied shall be divided into lots, of which one shall belong to each soldier, and two or more to the chiefs and officers. Each lot shall have ground for a house, and three and a half hectares (or seven acres) for sowing.

ART. 7. In case the colonist should die before the end of the six years of his enlistment this property shall go to his heirs.

ART. 8. After the distribution of the lots among the colonists has been made, the governors of the respective States shall distribute the surplus land among individuals with family, who without belonging to the colonists may wish to live with them.

ART. 9. Any colonist who shall desert within the stipulated term, disregarding military discipline and his engagements of enlistment, shall be condemned to the penalty of two or four years of forced labor, which he shall complete in any one of the colonies, and he shall lose all right to the lot, and to the improvements thereon introduced.

ART. 10. The executive shall forthwith appoint an inspector general, who shall have in charge the direction of all the colonies; it shall also appoint a sub-inspector for each State, recommended by the governors of the respective States.

ART. 11. The faculties of these employés shall be determined by the department they belong to, in the regulations it shall issue for that purpose, enjoining, as an essential point, activity and efficacy in the persecution of the wild Indians, and order and morality in the colonies.

ART. 12. In each colony a rudimentary school shall be established.

ART. 13. The inspector general or sub-inspectors authorized by him shall be able to conclude peace with the tribes of savage Indians, acting in concert with the governors of the respective States. After the terms have been adjusted, the supreme executive power shall be informed of the same, for its approbation, and in order that it may supply the necessary means for obtaining and maintaining it.

ART. 14. No authority shall divert the soldiers dedicated to the service of the colonies from their object.

Hall of sessions of the congress of the Union, Mexico, April 27, 1868,

J. C. DORIA, President.

F. DIAZ COVARRUBIAS, Secretary.

ELENTARIO AVILA, Secretary.

I therefore order it to be printed and circulated for its due observance.

Palace of the national government, Mexico, April 28, 1868.

BENITO JUAREZ.

The Minister of War, Citizen General IGNACIO MEJIA, Present.

I communicate the same to you for your information and the consequent ends.

[Translation.]

The citizen President of the republic has been pleased to communicate to me the following decree:

“Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same be it known, that the congress of the Union has decreed as follows:

“The congress of the Union decrees:

“ARTICLE 1. In the States of Yucatan and Campeche there shall be established two military colonies of five hundred men each, the duty of regulating them remaining with the executive, without interfering with the taking of any other measures which may be conducive to the pacification of the said States.”

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

City of Mexico, June 9, 1868.

SIR: An incident of great gravity has taken place here, within the past few days, which has occasioned much excitement, and may be attended with important political results. In my dispatch No. 56, of the 26th of December last, I announced the election of Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, the minister of foreign affairs, to the position of chief justice of the supreme court, vice-president of the republic. His term of office in that position commenced on the 1st instant. On the 4th instant he appeared before the permanent deputation of congress, and took the oath of office.

On the following day a request was addressed by President Juarez to the supreme court, asking leave for Mr. Lerdo de Tejada to continue acting as minister for foreign affairs. This request was taken immediately into consideration, and by a vote of seven to five was refused.

It has been the custom in this country for appointments to cabinet positions frequently to be made, if the President so elects, from members of congress, and even judges of the supreme court.

President Juarez, when chief justice in 1857, was appointed minister of government by President Comonfort, and Mr. Lerdo de Tejada and Mr. Balcarcel, two of the present ministers, were elected members of congress. But for such officials to act under these appointments, instead of their resignation, the permission of congress, or of the supreme court, as the case may be, has been asked and obtained.

So now the request has been made by President Juarez, of the supreme court, for leave for Mr. Lerdo de Tejada to continue in the cabinet, but in this instance it has been refused. The grounds of the refusal are variously stated. By some, it is claimed that the decision of the court has been based solely upon the belief that the position of judge upon the supreme bench is incompatible with any connection with political affairs. By others, it is asserted that the court itself has intervened in the political issues of the day, and that the refusal of leave to Mr. Lerdo de Tejada is influenced solely by opposition to the policy of the cabinet of which he has so long been the head.

The tone of public sentiment here, upon this incident, is shown in the article of which I inclose translation herewith, from the paper of Mr. Zarco, the late president of congress, who, it is rumored, is the principal aspirant for Mr. Lerdo de Tejada's place.

The opposition to Mr. Lerdo has for some time been very strong, but it will be difficult to find another man of his ability, or who can give to the government the same prestige, character, and positive strength. The result of this crisis, and what the final action of the President will be, is not yet determined.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE CABINET.

[From the Siglo XIX, June 6, 1868.—Translation.]

The note in which the executive requested leave for Mr. Lerdo de Tejada to continue in the cabinet, was signed by Mr. Aspiroz, the chief clerk of the department of relations.

It was received just as the court was terminating the business of the day.

The affair was immediately taken into consideration, and after a brief discussion, was put to vote. There were in favor of granting leave, Messrs. Garcia Ramirez, Zavala, Velazquez, Lafragua, and Ordaz; and for refusing it, Messrs. Ogazon, Cardoso, Riva Palacio, Simon Guzman, Leon Guzman, Castello Velasco, and Altamirano. This result was communicated immediately to the executive, and produced a great sensation in all political circles.

A thousand rumors are in circulation, of the authenticity of which we are not certain.

It is said that the President has resolved to insist in asking the leave, urging the free prerogative given him by the constitution to select his ministers.

It is said that in the cabinet there are those who know that this step will be entirely unavailing. It is also said that the remaining ministers will present their resignations, for the purpose of leaving the President entirely free to form a new cabinet.

To the decision of the court different interpretations are given. There are some who believe that it was dictated by the political consideration that the functionary who would be called upon to exercise the executive power in default of the President, should have no part in the acts of the latter, in order not to compromise his responsibility; and there are those who state that the court has desired to reprove the policy of the chief of the cabinet, and to bring about a ministerial crisis.

In so far as the vote of Justice Ogazon, it is explained by some as being dictated by motives of personal delicacy, as, if Mr. Lerdo should continue in the cabinet, Mr. Ogazon would remain exercising the presidency of the court, and enjoying an increase of two thousand dollars of salary.

The Globe applauds the decision of the court, and considers it as a reprobation of the policy of the cabinet, but it doubts that a ministerial crisis will occur.

The Monitor announces the refusal of the leave, under the head of "Fall of the Lerdo cabinet," and states that in the discussion of the affair in the court, one of the justices said: "Providence or chance has placed in our hands the indirect judgment of the policy of the country, and that policy is false, feeble, and untoward, in every point of view. In our sphere, and in conformity with our legal attributes, we may point out the obstacle that renders sterile the victory of Mexico, and that divides the great liberal party."

The Monitor manifests great satisfaction at what has taken place, and urges the President to appoint a new cabinet in harmony with the inspiration of the public opinion, and recommends for that purpose his worthy minister, Vallarta, the only one who merits the confidence of the constitutional party.

This article of the Monitor is signed by Mr. Guillermo Prieto. The same paper announces that Mr. Martinez de Castro, after the occurrences of yesterday, has resolved not to return to the cabinet.

The Constitution Social, without comments, gives the notice of the leave having been refused.

The Opinion Nationale states what has occurred, and awaits full information before expressing its opinions.

The other papers give the news without remark.

It cannot be denied that the incident of yesterday is very grave, and that, in fact, it restricts the liberty of the President freely to select the members of his cabinet.

It is also very serious for the judicial power to intervene in politics, whether it may be taking part in practical questions or in deciding those that are purely abstract.

But, as in fact the liberty of selecting ministers, so far as relates to members of congress, or magistrates of the supreme court, has the restriction of the permission of congress, or of the court, it cannot be said that in this instance the supreme court of justice has exceeded its attributes, or has proceeded beyond its rights.

We can understand very well that the enforced separation of Mr. Lerdo must be extremely painful for the President of the republic, who, in the most critical, perilous, and solemn moments, has relied upon the patriotism and the abnegation of his minister of relations.

But so long as what takes place is not outside the legal order, it has to be accepted, and to be put up with.

We do not believe it prudent to insist upon obtaining leave for Mr. Lerdo, because from that step will only result a slight to the executive. We remember, that when some time ago congress refused leave to Mr. Berdusco to enter into the treasury department, although the presidential prerogative was wounded, Mr. Juarez had the calmness and the prudence to look for another minister.

In the present situation, when it is so urgent to re-establish peace, and to reorganize the public administration, it is not in any manner desirable that the march of the government should be paralyzed, or that difficulties should be raised that may embarrass its action. The moral responsibility of a change of cabinet will not rest upon the President of the republic. This consideration should decide him to proceed to organize a new cabinet, whose programme should be strict compliance with the law, and the union of the liberal party.

With reference to Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, who remains in the second position in the republic, there is nothing in these occurrences that impairs his great merits, or that can lead to a forgetfulness of the distinguished services which he has rendered to the country in an epoch of trial, and when the statesman has required something more than talent and ability to persevere in the fulfillment of his duty.

The President of the republic is in a situation that permits him to overcome every difficulty, and to not pause in the work of the reorganization of the country. The antecedents of his public life, his self-denial and disinterestedness, are a guarantee that in the present moment he will have the prudence and the tact that are indispensable to continue governing in conformity with the constitution, and in accord with public opinion.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, June 12, 1868.

SIR: With dispatch No. 133, of the 25th ultimo, I transmitted to the department translation of a law passed by the Mexican congress on the 6th of that month, suspending certain constitutional guarantees and giving to the executive certain powers for the maintenance of public order; and I alluded to the prolonged debate that had taken place upon the subject, both in congress and in the public press.

While the debate was in progress, the government, not content with its first initiative, recommending the readoption of a portion of the law of the 25th of January, 1862, availing of or under the spur of a conspiracy discovered in Guadalajara, made a further initiative to congress, and recommended the declaring in force of the whole of that law, as originally decreed.

The communication making this latter initiative on the part of the government was addressed to congress by the minister of foreign affairs, Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, then acting also as minister of government, and the initiative was followed up by a series of editorial articles in the Diario Oficial, the official organ of this government, which is as entirely under its control as is the Moniteur of Paris under that of the government of France.

The importance of the communication thus addressed by the government to the congress of the Union, and of some of the editorial articles referred to, as presenting an authentic statement of the situation of the country, and of the desires and policy of the government, has led me to deem it desirable to transmit translations of the same to the department, which I now accompany herewith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

INITIATIVE OF THE GOVERNMENT ASKING THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF THE LAW OF THE 25TH OF JANUARY, 1862.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, March 6, 1868.—Translation.]

I had the honor to-day to read to congress a communication dated the 2d instant, of which I inclose a copy, addressed to me by telegraph by the governor of the State of Jalisco, with reference to arrest en flagrante delicto, and with documents proving their guilt, of some conspirators against the general institutions of the nation, and against the legitimate authorities of the same, and those of the State.

The governor inquired if he should proceed, as they have continued to proceed in the State, in cases of like nature, in conformity with the law of the 25th of January, 1862, or in conformity with that of the 6th of December, 1856; urging the necessity of proceeding against the authors of the conspiracy with the greatest activity, and with all the rigor that the laws permit.

I have verbally explained to congress to-day the grave considerations which lead the government to believe that the congress of the Union should be pleased to declare in force for some time the law of the 25th of January, in order that the crimes that are repeated against order and the public peace, and against individual guarantees, may be repressed.

When the military operations of a prolonged war, which has profoundly moved all society, are but just terminated, it is inevitable that for some time it should be sought to place in action divers elements to disturb it.

We are sufficiently fortunate in enjoying more order and peace than under other similar circumstances; but the germs of revolution not being completely extinguished, it is necessary to direct all our foresight and energy to their extirpation, and to impede the return of the grave evils we all deplore.

Besides what has occurred in Yucatan, Guerrero, and Sinaloa, civil war is beginning to show itself in Puebla and Jalisco, at the same time that the kidnappings that are taking place paralyze and terrify society. As much or more than any other time the government hastens to the points of danger; the principal roads are guarded and made safe, and the police of the cities is being improved so far as is possible.

Nevertheless, it is impossible to guard every place, where crimes plotted by the incentive of great interests may be perpetrated; and the criminals are encouraged by the hope that if apprehended an imperfect administration of justice may afford them impunity. After so great disturbances it is not to be expected that the regular and efficacious action of the tribunals should be improvised in all parts of the country.

Nothing is further from the intention of the government than a desire to establish a system of bloodshed, which besides being iniquitous would be impolitic. On the contrary, when it was armed with all the power of a dictatorship, it put in practice a very lenient system, limiting the severe application of the laws to a very small number of the principal culprits. Otherwise, every class of society would have been left without guarantees, as has often happened among us, through the desire of conceding excessive guarantees to great criminals. The experience of more than fifty years teaches us what we arrive at by that means.

The vote of a great majority of the chamber on the proposition which was to-day presented to it, by some of its members, indicates that it may be the will of congress to declare the law referred to to be in force; and for this reason the government has thought that it should suspend its answer to the governor of Jalisco for the few days necessary for congress to declare its determination.

The citizen President of the republic has therefore directed, in unanimous accord with his ministers, that I address, as I have now the honor to address to congress, the following initiative:

PROJECT OF LAW.

Sole article.—The law of the 25th of January, 1862, respecting crimes against the nation, order, the public peace, and individual guarantees, is declared to be in force until it be repealed by the congress of the Union.

Independence and Liberty! Mexico, March 4, 1868.

S. LERDO DE TEJADA.

The Citizens DEPUTIES SECRETARIES of the Congress of the Union.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, March 10, 1868.—Translation.]

[Editorial.]

THE LAW OF THE 25TH OF JANUARY, 1862.

The first obligation of every government and people is to uphold the constitution they may have accepted, and therefore the essential duty of the government, and of the people governed, is to preserve the public peace, in order that the constitution may subsist, because without the one the other cannot be established, and, on the contrary, what should be put into practice always remains a theory. A constitution sanctioned by a majority of the votes, or the unanimous will of the nation, must be obeyed and respected, and the constitution itself determines, or ought to determine, what shall be done with the infractor of its principles; or, in other words, being the supreme law of the land, it must be respected either by will or force, and whoever seeks to make war against it should receive the corresponding punishment.

Constitutionalism consists in carrying the constitution into practical effect, without using either leniency or vigor, but by enforcing obedience to the law in accordance with what the law itself prescribes. But to defend rights by words against an enemy who avails himself of actions is not reasonable, nor has the legislator so thought, for it does not lead to the end proposed, which cannot be any other than that of making an effective reality of the constituted order.

The citizen contracts a moral and legal obligation with society and the tribunals, not only not to commit infractions against the fundamental code, but to fulfill all its precepts; and his obligations extend to contributing with his efforts to cause it to be respected by all other men.

Whoever places himself without the constitution places himself beyond the pale of the law, and he cannot claim the same treatment as one who remains within it; or, admitting that he be not considered as without the pale of the law, he at least remains subject to the penalties which the latter may have assigned against the disturbers of the public order.

To preserve the constitution it is necessary to make it effective, and there is no other way except that of enforcing the obedience of those who by their conduct do not permit its strict observance; as, in order that there should be a constitution, it is indispensable that there should be order, this precious gift has to be sought not only by the means of preventative measures, but also by those that are repressive, because the first necessity is the common welfare, and this would not be possible if the prerogatives of individual liberties were not guaranteed against the attacks of the despotism of discontented minorities, who have recourse to arms to prevent the masses from enjoying their rights.

Judicial proceedings are open to the good and the bad without distinction, so long as the public peace is not disturbed and the constitution is not attacked by force; but from the moment that resort is had to disorder and to combat, and for this military bands are organized, it is altogether unquestionable that such proceedings are to be militarily dealt with, as an attitude of war against the nation is assumed.

Modern enlightenment often recommends moderation in the action of the law in cases of common crimes, and even in serious ones when it is not feared that their consequences may endanger the safety of the state; but whenever great risks exist that public and private interests may be compromised, as what is most urgent is the preservation of peace and order, good sense and the law impel governments of every kind to punish severely such parties as take a pleasure in impeding the progress and prosperity of the honest portion of society.

Highway robbery by armed bands is a crime which by its own character merits the greatest penalty the law assigns, because, besides being wanting in all that humanity instinctively inspires, it introduces iniquities and torments which martyrize and impoverish individuals, which carry ruin and bloodshed into the towns, and which degrade the nation. Universal law condemns to the penalty of death all who rob and murder in towns and inhabited places, after a proper trial, according to the process peculiar to each country; but to rob and kill on highways and uninhabited parts in bands, and to carry their boldness even to threatening the repose of cities and states, is a matter which demands a quicker and more energetic punishment, not only in seeking a penalty proportionate to the crime, but because delay in the action of justice may occasion evils of greater transcendency, and therefore the best and least cruel way is to avert from its commencement the necessity for war and slaughter on a larger scale, which are things repugnant to governments and enlightened peoples.

These and other analogous reasons have undoubtedly been those which have led the government of Mexico to propose to the sovereign congress that it should take into consideration the law of the 25th of January, 1862, so that if it should deem it advisable it should declare it to be in force, as it has not been abrogated; and in order that, in consideration of what is actually passing in various parts of the republic, measures may be rapidly and energetically taken for stifling at the commencement that spirit of anarchy which already begins to show itself with a threatening aspect.

The interest of the government in this question is the same as that felt everywhere by loyal and honest citizens, and is no other than that of the re-establishment of order and the preservation of peace, so that industry, commerce, agriculture, and arts and sciences may prosper, and that a constitution which has cost the nation so much bloodshed and wealth may be duly observed throughout the country.

[Editorial.]

PACIFICATION OF THE COUNTRY.

The great question of the day in the periodical press, and in all circles, both public and private, is solely that of the necessity of immediate proceeding to the pacification of the country. There is not a single person who does not agree that reorganization is absolutely impossible if, as up to the present time, the system be continued of simply using words, when the greatest promptness and energy of action is required. Under such circumstances the government has submitted to the consideration of Congress a repressive law, against the abuses which are already being, with too great frequency, committed in various parts of the republic. This has provoked, as was natural, a discussion, in which some in good faith, and others according to their intentions, find faults and merits in the law in question, without a determination having yet been arrived at as to what may be best for repressing and chastising crime.

A proper spirit in general certainly prevails; but as things are not looked upon in the same manner by all, there are some who are of opinion that it is not yet time to apply penalties in all their rigour, and that perhaps it would be better to resort to the last remedy, when the patient is at the final stage of his sickness, and that in the mean time we should use the lenient system, which is opposed to the shedding of blood. But there are others who believe that, in consideration of the common dangers, opinion will not delay in becoming unanimous, as far as it is possible, and that finally, what may be most conducive for guaranteeing individual security and securing public order will be decreed. The definitive decision is pending between two factions of the representatives of the people, who hold different views on the same subject. And thus, while some call themselves constitutionalists, and believe that the constitution itself contains the elements which will cut the evil short, others also call themselves constitutionalists, and believe that to be able to preserve the constitution it is necessary to treat insurgents as enemies to the fundamental charter, which authorizes no one to make war upon it.

There is, then, one common object of regard, which is the constitution: and the manifestation of affection for it consists, that some consent to save the object of their predilections without availing themselves of all the force it authorizes in the repelling of those who attack it; and others, on the contrary, will not admit that, on any pretext or in any manner, it shall be treated with disrespect.

All society is interested that this polemic be at once terminated, and that the guarantees be guaranteed which are promised by the constitution, and that the constitution itself be secured on solid basis, as it is, indeed, extremely painful that the people cannot enjoy the rights they have acquired, but are daily threatened by the despotism of kidnappers, and the insufferable tyranny of those who make a business of revolution, rendering impracticable the beautiful theories of our system of government.

It is repeated, even to satiety, but unfortunately without any use, that the only thing that we want is peace, as with that would come spontaneously all the other blessings of the earth; and, nevertheless, we wish it to subsist without severely repressing the habit of rebellion, and without extirpating the custom of highway robbery. The resources of the government and of the country will become exhausted, as has been the case at other periods, and there will be no means of transporting from point to point the troops that may be necessary to send to those places where anarchy has been propagated; and, what is worse, for want of means the soldiers become demoralized, and moreover it will never be possible to see realized the idea of presenting ourselves before the whole world as a nation without bayonets.

Our occupation will become the same as that of the women, condemned, according to the Grecian mythology, to be forever filling with water vessels that can never be filled, and our labor will not be concluded for many generations. It has not been the purpose of the government, in submitting the law of the 25th of January, 1862, to the wisdom of congress, that abuses should be introduced, which the government itself has endeavored to avoid; nor has it urged that it should be made general, over the whole republic, but solely that it be declared in force in so far as it relates to great criminals who cannot, by any humane means, be reduced to obedience and to respect for the constitutional order. Any other interpretation in a different sense is inexact.

The great care of the government is to weigh its present and future responsibilities, and make the laws of the nation respected, both abroad and at home, so as to promote the happiness of those who live within its territory, and to acquire a glorious name throughout the civilized world.

No enterprise of material advancement, of real importance, can be undertaken, because not only are the public funds day after day consumed in the interminable arrangement of intestine dissensions, but because the fountains of general wealth are paralyzed by the want of confidence, the insecurity of property, and the danger to which the lives of pacific citizens are exposed.

Neither can attention be directed to what conduces to labor and commerce, because the inhabitants have scarcely time to protect themselves against disturbances, kidnappings, and robberies. Thus, in a situation so perilous for all social interests, would it, perchance, be imprudent to positively protect the honest man and severely punish the bandit? It would be desirable that the ordinary means should suffice for suppressing crime, and not to be under the necessity of having recourse to more rigorous measures: but it is proved that by this means we cannot succeed in deterring the hordes of highway robbers from their profession of plundering, of violations, and of pillage: neither can those be converted who pass all their lives in rebelling against whatever order may be established.

It is, therefore, indispensable definitively to secure, with all energy, tranquillity in Mexico, in order to give life to the country, and to affront the snares of the enemy, as well as all the eventualities of the future.

The application of exceptional punishments is not asked for all the inhabitants of the republic, but solely and especially for such incorrigible beings as do not allow society to progress, and who will not co-operate in the development of industry and the encouragement of commerce. Therefore no one who does not enter into the ranks of the evil disposed has anything to fear, as it is evident it is not contemplated to establish for the future what is at the present time sought to be terminated. The government has given sufficient proofs that its deliberate purpose is no other than that of maintaining order and tranquillity, demonstrating, whenever it has been able, that the balance of justice only inclines to the side of law, and that its only desire is that neither natives nor foreigners shall think lightly of the constitution of Mexico; that it shall be respected in every sense of the word and that it shall no longer be left exposed to the repeated attacks of those who are without country, and who recognize no power but their own caprices, and no influence but their political hatreds.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, March 12, 1868.—Translation.]

[Editorial.]

PEACE.

The general clamor still continues of all who feel an interest in the welfare of the country, asking for the energetic suppression of the disturbances and crimes which unceasingly continue to take place, and are gradually involving all society in uncertainty, uneasiness, and alarm; and what inspires real discontent, and the greatest distrust, is not only what is happening at the present moment—although the actual state of things is sufficiently unfavorable—but what will infallibly occur in the future if the propagation of the evil be not checked at its commencement.

Hence it is that all acknowledge the imperious necessity of stifling forever the voice of anarchy, in order that the future of the nation may be as serene and beautiful as the past has been stormy and sorrowful.

In the state of affairs that at present exists, although with difficulty, and at the cost of pecuniary sacrifices, a pacification might be attained, if not absolute at least relative, were earnest endeavors made to cut up by the roots the evils which have lately again threatened us for the hundredth time; yet it is necessary to bear in mind, that the more the action of justice is hastened, the quicker and greater will be the benefit accruing to the country in general, and justice must be exercised with a strong hand, for the system of consideration and extreme kindness cannot correct those who are steeped in crime and have acquired a second nature of evil, and who constantly act perversely.

What is of the highest interest is to save society which is threatened; for if the problem of life or death be left to the slow resolution of time, opportunity will be afforded for the propagation of those incalculable evils of which we have continually to complain, and to a certain extent a chance will be given to the evil-doers to complete their work of destruction.

Prudence recommends the avoiding of delay when dangerous situations begin to present themselves, for the simple reason that it is easier and less expensive to struggle against a few than against many, and because as soon as passions arise and hostile elements accumulate in great proportions, it is clear that it becomes indispensable to make preparations in the same sense, which occasions expenses and disorders of every kind, sufficient to overcome not only peoples not yet organized, but the strongest and most wealthy nations, and this is the extreme we ought at all costs to avoid, in order not again to sink into the abyss out of which we have just emerged with so much martyrdom and so lamentable a history. If we were treating only of the suppression of such common crimes as remain after intestine dissensions in all countries, it would be well to use leniency towards the guilty, according as the case and circumstances might demand; but as that against which opposition is to be made is the constant state of war which fratricides maintain and wish indefinitely to perpetuate, it appears reasonable to procure peace through such means as, for such cases, are authorized by the laws of all nations, and to respond to the disturbers of the public order with the same arms of which they avail themselves. This must be done in order not to permit the continuance of evils into which an enlightened nation should not be led.

As the general opinion throughout Mexico is that it is now time to pacify the republic positively, and not imaginarily, this opinion should without delay be respected, and the cry of the honest inhabitants should be responded to by sincere and vigorous activity.

The merchant, the artisan, the farmer, the man of business, families, the majority, in short, of the inhabitants, demand personal safety and real guarantees against being the victims of pillage, demoralization, robbery, and assassination; and it is the duty of government to protect them in their properties and their lives, by extirpating the bands of highway robbers who, under different pretexts, oppress society, imposing upon it their despot measures, and killing those who refuse to follow their plans.

It being the common interest to save ourselves from a situation as precarious as irksome, as prejudicial as discreditable, what can be more just and proper than to apply to the patient the only remedy that experience has shown to be efficacious, and to make ourselves respected by our own people and by foreigners; endeavoring at the same time to develop the elements of wealth, which up to the present period have been paralyzed by disorders and a spirit of systematic insurrection.

Public criticism having thus judged the present circumstances, it only remains to use the utmost rigor against those who have no other rule of conduct than their personal ends; and we trust there will be no one who will not sustain the idea of applying the law, with all its severity, against those who maintain themselves in a constant state of war against the country, and who prevent the constitution of the United Mexican States from being carried into practical effect.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, March 20, 1868.—Translation.]

THE PRESENT SITUATION.

The public again saddens at the thousand rumors of pronunciamientos which incessantly circulate. Confidence in peace is being lost, and fears are unreservedly spread of a fresh war, arising from local questions which have sprung up in almost all of the States. This causes not only grief, but profound affliction in every breast, and on that account do the immense majority of the country cry out that the government, with extraordinary faculties, or without them, with the law of the 25th of January, or with those in force, should display the utmost energy in extirpating the causes of new calamities.

We are told that yesterday congress held no session. It is said that the day before, the minister for foreign affairs set forth in strong terms, during a secret session, the gravity of the situation, and that to-day some resolution will be come to respecting the initiative of the government for repressing the disturbers of the public peace, kidnappers, and assassins.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, June 15, 1868.

SIR: As at nearly the same date, the 9th instant, that I received your dispatch No. 61, of the 23d of May, relating to the outrage at Monterey, and stating that you awaited my report with reference thereto, my dispatch No. 131, of the 20th of May, treating of that subject, must have reached the department, I do not doubt that such instructions were then forwarded to me as the serious character of this case may, in your judgment, have seemed to demand, and I have therefore thought it my duty to defer addressing this government upon the subject until their arrival, especially as, to be effective in securing just redress for what has taken place, and in preventing the occurrence of such acts in the future, a direct expression of the feelings of the government of the United States with regard to this transaction appears to be necessary.

No allusion to the affair, or expression of regret at its occurrence, has yet been made to me by this government.

On the 13th instant I received from Mr. Ulrich, consul at Monterey, a letter, inclosing to me the affidavits of the parties who were the subjects of the outrage.

A copy of the same is transmitted to the department herewith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Ulrich to Mr. Plumb.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Monterey, May 27, 1868.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letters of May 6, 9, 11, and 12, acknowledging receipt of various letters of mine.

In fulfillment of your request in that of 12th of May, I herein inclose affidavits of the parties who were the subjects of the outrage of April 21.

In case I can render any further assistance in having this matter righted, you will please command me.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. ULRICH, Consul.

Hon. E. L. PLUMB,

U. S. Chargé d'Affaires, Mexico.

On this 28th day of May, A. D. 1868, before me, J. Ulrich, consul of the United States of America for Monterey, Mexico, personally appeared Samuel B. Kathrens, E. F. Liechardt, Forbes Potter, Henry Reiss, J. Montgomery, and F. Zapffe, to me well known, who, on being duly sworn, did depose as follows, and did in my presence sign their names to said affidavits:

I, Samuel B. Kathrens, am an American citizen, residing and doing business as a merchant in the city of Monterey. On the evening of the 21st of April, 1868, in company with Messrs. F. Potter, E. F. Liechardt, J. Montgomery, H. Reiss, F. Zapffe, and José Margain, had been taking some champagne at the billiard room of Mr. Zeigler, in the "calle de Dr. Mier," in this city, and at about 11 o'clock p. m. was proceeding home, (with the gentlemen above named,) distant from the billiard room not quite two blocks, the whole party talking and laughing in a lively manner, but making no discordant nor unusual noise. On our arriving at the corner of Commerce and Theater streets, under the balcony of the government palace, we were challenged and halted. Mr. Margain then left us, and went up stairs in the palace to inquire why we were so halted and detained, but did not return; and after a delay of some minutes the remaining six of us were marched to the prison, and this was done, as I understood at the time, by an order of the government. On our arrival at the prison our pockets were emptied in a forcible manner, ostensibly for purposes of safety, but leaving my watch on my person. We were then thrust into the yard of the prison, where we remained during the whole night. It was dark when we entered, and Mr. Liechardt, shortly after entering, went to urinate in one corner of the yard, and while so doing received a heavy blow from one of the officers in charge of the inside of the prison. At about four o'clock of the succeeding morning I was ordered to "llevar el caballo." To which, not understanding the order, I replied, "I had no horse." The most of us then seated ourselves on a bench, and shortly afterwards Mr. Potter was ordered in the same terms to do the same work, and not instantly proceeding to do so, was severely lashed four or five times. Mr. Liechardt next received the same order, and I told him "for God's sake to do it, as he would be treated in like manner." They were then ordered into one of the cells to carry out the vessel containing the accumulated filth of the prison. I heard blows administered, and found that Mr. Liechardt had received them for refusing to do this disgusting work. After daylight, Messrs. Zapffe, Potter, Liechardt, and myself were each given a small broom and ordered to sweep the prison yard; knowing what would be the consequences of our refusing to do this, we complied. Mr. Liechardt, who was next to me, not sweeping to suit the tastes of the officer who held the whip, (nervio de toro,) was again severely lashed. At about 8½ o'clock a. m. we were taken before the alcalde 1st, who, upon being informed by the policeman that we had been arrested by order of the government, remanded us until about 9½ or 10 o'clock, when he returned to his court and stated to us that he came not to try us, but to sentence, and declared each one of us subject to a fine of ten dollars, for creating a "scandale" the previous night. To this Mr. Montgomery objected, stating that some of the party had been sober, and had committed no offense, and the fine was remitted. We demanded, through the American consul, Mr. Ulrich, that Narciso Davila, official secretary of the governor, (who, we were informed by the alcalde, had personally ordered the arrest,) should be called as a witness. To this the alcalde objected, on the ground that he did not have the power to cite him. We finally were released without the payment of any fine, the alcalde in a manner expressing his regret at the occurrence. We had been confined during the previous night in the common jail yard with about sixty convicted criminals. Four of our party were not in the slightest degree under the influence of wine or liquor, and we were all in company together merely.

J. ULRICH, United States Consul.

I, E. F. Liechardt, a citizen of the United States of America, residing and doing business as a merchant in the city of Monterey, Mexico, do solemnly swear: That on the night of Tuesday, April 21, 1868, I was in company with S. B. Kathrens, F. H. Potter, F. Zapffe, J. Montgomery, and H. Reiss, on my way home. While passing under the balcony of the government building, on Theater street, we were ordered to stop by a party of soldiers or policemen, and informed that we were arrested by order of Sr. Davila, official secretary of the governor, for causing a disturbance in the street. A Mexican friend of mine, Don José Margain, with whom I was walking arm in arm, requested me to wait a moment, saying that he would see Sr. Davila, and have us released; but Mr. Margain did not return, and we were taken to the jail. While we were standing in front of the prison, Mr. Adolf Landott, an American, came and offered himself as security for us all, that we would appear the next morning before the alcalde 1st, and answer to whatever charge might be brought against us, which offer, although Mr. Landott is a respectable person, with considerable means, was not accepted. I was then forcibly relieved of the contents of my pockets, excepting twenty-five cents. The other five gentlemen were treated in a like manner, excepting two of the party, who retained their watches. We were then pushed into the yard of the common prison, along with the condemned criminals. I was not long in the place before I had occasion to go into a corner of the yard to urinate, when, without any forewarning, I received a blow over my back with a cowhide, the mark of which remained for several days after the occurrence. At about four o'clock in the morning, Mr. Potter was told to llevar el caballo, (the prison name for the tub holding the excrement and urine of the prisoners,) which he refused to do, upon which he received several lashes on his back, which tore his coat and lacerated him severely. After this I was also told to go with Mr. Potter, but not understanding what they meant by the "caballo," I told them I had nothing to do with the horses, when Mr. Kathrens said to me, "for God's sake go and see what they want, or they will beat you also." I then got up from where I was seated, and Mr. Potter and myself were led into a room, (we had been kept in the open yard all night,) and were ordered to lay hold of the large tub containing the accumulated filth of the prison for the twenty-four hours previous. On seeing what they wanted I refused to do the disgusting job, when two severe cuts were at once laid on my back by the officer who had charge of the inside of the jail; so, fearing the consequences, I assisted in doing the filthy work, and we carried the tub to the middle of the prison yard.

At about daylight one of the jailors handed a small broom to Messrs. Kathrens, Potter, Zapffe, and myself, ordering us to sweep the prison yard. I did not sweep so as to suit the jailer, when he struck me two severe blows on my back, which left their marks for several days on my person. I then offered the twenty-five cents which had been left in my pocket to one of the regular prisoners of the jail who would take my broom and finish the job. One of them accepted the offer, and by this means I saved myself from further ill treatment.

Between eight and nine o'clock we were liberated to appear before the alcalde 1st, and while waiting for him to make his appearance I went in search of a lawyer to put our case in proper shape. While I was absent on this errand the other five gentlemen were taken before the alcalde, so I know little of what then took place, other than that when I returned I heard him say to the United States consul and Mr. Landott that they should come in the afternoon and hear his decision. Mr. Landott went at the time appointed, and was told that none of us would be fined, and that he, the alcalde, was very sorry that the affair had taken place.

J. ULRICH, United States Consul.

I, F. H. Potter, a citizen of the United States of America, by profession a merchant, and temporarily resident in Monterey, Mexico, for the purpose of collecting an amount due me for arms sold to the government for the use of the army under General Escobedo, do solemnly swear: That on the evening of April 21st 1868, while on the street, I was met by two friends, E. F. Liechardt and Samuel B. Kathrens, who invited me to their store to take a glass of wine; after doing so we went to the billiard room of a Mr. Zeigler, where we found some other foreigners, among whom were Messrs. Montgomery, Reiss, and Zapffe, and where we were afterwards joined by Sr. José Margain, and other Mexican gentlemen not known to me. This was about ten or eleven o'clock p. m. We then took some champagne, and without unusual noise, other than talking and singing. About this time, Messrs. Liechardt and Kathrens showed some signs of intoxication, but did not create any great disturbance. We then proposed to go home, and as nearly all of us lived in the same direction, we decided to see these two gentlemen to their homes first. We then started, Mr. Kathrens and myself taking the lead. When under the balcony of the governor's palace, we were halted by a body of policemen; when very near us they cried out the usual "quien vive," and I, being in the advance, answered "Mexico," not thinking of being stopped at this hour; we walked quietly along, when the police confronted us. I then asked the chief of the policemen what he wished, and he answered that we were under arrest. I asked him for what offense. He replied "by order of the secretary of the governor." By this time the rest of the party came up, and on their asking what was the matter, the policeman repeated what he had told me. This took place about one block from the billiard room, and but three or four doors from the store of Messrs. Liechardt and Kathrens. The police felt (or seemed to do so) very reluctant about arresting us, but the only reason given to us for their so doing was that they were ordered to do so by Secretary Davila. At this time Mr. Margain, who was of the party, stated that, as the secretary was a friend of his, he would go and see him about the matter; so Mr. Margain and the other Mexican gentlemen of the party, and the chief of the police squad, went up stairs into the palace to intercede for us. After about twenty minutes the policeman returned alone, and told us we must go to prison. Our Mexican friends, Mr. Margain and the others, being allowed to go to their homes. We proceeded under charge of the police, without any remonstrance or resistance whatever on our part, as we supposed when we explained the matter to the alcalde, and he found most of our party entirely sober, he would allow us also to go to our homes. On our arrival at the door of the jail we were ordered to enter the hall leading to the gate of the prison yard. We then asked the alcalde why we were there? He replied "by order of the secretary of the governor," and then in a very insulting manner ordered his men to search our persons. Mr. Liechardt was the first person searched, and, not contented with his delivering up the contents of his pockets, they insisted on being allowed to thrust their hands in. After they had done searching him, they put him inside the door of the prison. On their commencing to search me, I asked as a favor that they would allow me to give them what my pockets contained. At this they became very indignant, insulted me with abusive language, shoved me against the wall, and forcibly thrust their hands into my pockets, taking from me everything but my watch. As I had that evening had an interview with General Escobedo regarding a claim I have for several thousand dollars against the government, I had in my pockets the papers relating to said claim. These papers and my private letters were taken from me, but were returned to me the next morning. Mr. Kathrens was treated in the same manner. At this time Mr. A. Landott, an American citizen, a man of property, established in Monterey, came to the jail, when two of the party were allowed to deposit with him their effects. Mr. Landott then offered to the alcalde that he would be responsible for our appearance before the proper authorities in the morning if they would release us. He answered that this was not possible, as we were sent to the prison by order of the secretary of the governor. The doors of the jail were then opened, and we were in an insolent manner ordered to enter. We were put into the filthy yard of the jail, where were lying around fifty or sixty of the convicts. After we had entered, Mr. Liechardt and myself went to the back part of the yard together, for the purpose of urinating. While doing this, an officer of the prison came up to us from where he was sleeping, and struck Mr. Liechardt a severe blow with what they call a "nervio de toro," at the same time abusing us with the most insulting words in their language. We then sat down upon a bench, in the rear of the yard, to pass the night as we best could. At about four o'clock next morning the prisoners were called up for their coffee or soup, and when they saw us sitting there, they or many of them commenced insulting us, by hooting at us and using towards us language which it is impossible for me to express in any but their own language. After finishing their coffee or soup, they gathered about us, when a man whom they call the "president of the prison" came to me, as I was sitting first on the bench, and ordered me to go and "llevar el caballo." Mr. Liechardt, who was sitting next to me, not understanding what he wanted, told him "we don't want any horse." At this the prisoners commenced again insulting us. He then repeated his order to me; I replied that I did not understand him. He then repeated his order several times, and to each repetition I replied "no, Señor." He then went to a room in the jail and returned with a whip (nervio de toro) in his hands. This proceeding was again greeted by the shouts and jeers of the convicts. He repeated his order, and then, on my again refusing to obey, he said "if you won't go I will make you," and then commenced beating me on the shoulders and back very severely. He again repeated his order, adding "will you go now?" To which I again replied "no, Señor." I then asked my companions if I should go, and they answered no. I did not move. He then again beat me, the marks of all these blows being visible on my person for over two weeks. About this time some of our party said I should go, or the next blow might be over my head. I then started, this fellow walking directly behind me, with his whip in such a position as to enable him to use it with facility. Mr. Liechardt followed, seeing that it would be folly to refuse anything demanded of us. We passed into one of the cells, and were there shown what the "caballo" was—a barrel containing the filth of the prisoners of the previous day, which emitted a sickening stench. On Mr. Liechardt's entering the cell where this vessel was, becoming sick from the effluvia, he walked in slowly with his hand to his nose, seeing which the man gave him a severe blow with the whip to hurry him up. We were then ordered to take the barrel and carry it to a corner of the yard, which we did. After we had put the barrel in the corner Mr. Liechardt remonstrated against this treatment, when he was again beaten severely. After this, they brought some brooms and ordered us to sweep the yard. We did not refuse to do this, but went to work as best we knew. At this point another official made his appearance, and with whip in hand seemed watching for an opportunity to use it. Mr. Liechardt it seems did not use the broom so as to please him, when he was again beaten upon the back. During all this time we made no reply to the insulting language which was applied to us. At about seven o'clock we wrote a note to the United States consul here, asking him to have us released if possible, as we were in constant fear that something worse would come; and it was with great difficulty that we could get a messenger to carry our note. At about eight o'clock we were released from the jail, through the influence of the consul and other friends, (foreigners.) We were, at about ten o'clock, taken before the "alcalde primere," who came into the court room, and, seating himself with much dignity, and without the public hearing of a single witness, stated that we had been guilty of creating a "scandalo" in the streets, and that we should pay a fine of ten dollars each, and at once called his secretary to record our names and the fine. Upon being asked where his proofs were that we had created a "scandalo," he said his proof was furnished by Mr. Davila, official secretary of the governor. The consul then requested that the witness should be brought into court. The alcalde answered that this could not be done. At this time it was told to the alcalde that four of our party were entirely sober when arrested. He then asked who were the parties intoxicated, and was told that Messrs. Liechardt and Kathrens had been slightly in that condition. He then said he would remit the fine of the four who were guiltless of any offense; but on being informed of the treatment we had been subjected to in the prison, he also remitted the fine of the other two. We then, having obtained the service of a lawyer, carried the matter before the jurez de detras, where the case now is.

J. ULRICH, Consul.

I, Henry Reiss, a citizen of the United States of America, residing and doing business as a carriage manufacturer in the city of Monterey, Mexico, do solemnly swear: That on the night of the 21st of April, 1868, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock, I was in the billiard room of Mr. Zeigler playing a game of encher, in company with Mr. Zapffe, Mr. Montgomery, and others. While so engaged, Messrs. Liechardt, Kathrens, and Potter came in, and Mr. Liechardt invited us to take some champagne with them. On our refusing, he insisted, stating that as he had received good news, of much value to him, we must drink with him. We then took some champagne and were joined in doing so by Señor José Margain and some other Mexican gentlemen. After this Mr. Liechardt asked us to accompany him home, which, with the rest of the party, we did. When under the balcony of the palace, and a short distance from the store of Messrs. Liechardt and Kathrens, we were halted by some policemen, in the usual manner, when I responded to their demand of "quien vive," "Mexico," and then told them we were Americans. The police then told us that they had orders from the governor to arrest us. I also asked them if they did not know me, to which they answered, "Yes, we know you all." We then asked the cause of our arrest, and were told by the police that they knew nothing about it. At this time one of the policemen started to go to the palace, in company with Señor Margain, leaving the rest of us in the street in charge of two policemen. Mr. Margain did not return. The policeman returned after a short time, and told us that he could do nothing, as the governor was not at the palace, but that he had spoken with the governor's secretary, Señor Davila, and that he had ordered him to take us to the prison and treat us with rigor. The Mexicans who had been along with us were allowed to go to their homes. We were then marched to the prison, and stopped at the entrance, or "saguan," and there searched, and our property taken from us. After this we were put into the yard of the prison, with over sixty criminals of every grade of crime, with whom we had to pass the night, subjected to all sorts of insults. Immediately after our entrance into the yard of the prison, Mr. Liechardt went to a gutter in a corner of the yard to urinate, when he was struck a severe blow with a whip, called "nervio de toro," by one of the officers in charge of the inside of the prison. We passed the night as well as we were able under the circumstances. At about four o'clock next morning they ordered two of our party to clean the privy, and on their refusing to do it they were beaten by the officer so severely as to retain the marks for several days on their persons. We were then ordered to sweep the yard, and some of our party, not sweeping to please them, were again beaten. There was no resistance made by any of us to the arrest; neither had there been any hallooing nor disorderly conduct by any of us while in the street. There were only two of the party at all under the influence of liquor, one of them perfectly "at himself" the other considerably intoxicated, but neither of them disorderly. The other four were perfectly sober, and we were walking along conversing in an ordinary tone. I was in the rear with Mr. Montgomery, and if there had been any unusual noise I would have heard it. In the morning, when we were brought before the alcalde 1st, he stated that we had been guilty of creating disturbance on the street, and that he came to sentence us, not to try us. That he had just been to the palace and heard there all the particulars, and therefore would sentence us to pay a fine of ten dollars each. We remonstrated against this summary proceeding, claiming that as we were guiltless of making any disorder we should not be punished, and asked him to produce his witnesses in open court. He said he had all the facts from Señor Davilo, official secretary of the governor, and that he could not compel him to appear and testify. We then satisfied him of our innocence, and he remitted the fines as to four of us, and subsequently of the other two. His attention was then called by the United States consul to our bad treatment in the jail, when he stated that we could obtain redress for all our grievances in the courts. We made no noise in the streets before our arrest. We made no resistance to the arrest. We had no quarrel with the convicts in the prison. All the whipping was done by officials of the jail.

I, J. P. Montgomery, a citizen of the United States of America, resident in Texas, a stock-raiser by profession, now trading in arms in the city of Monterey, and having some time since furnished arms to the republic of Mexico, do solemnly swear: That between the hours of ten and eleven, on the night of the 21st April, 1868, I was in Zeigler's billiard room, in company with Messrs. Reiss, Zapffe, and others, playing a game eucher for amusement. While so engaged, Messrs. Liechardt, Kathrens, and Potter entered the establishment, and invited us to take some champagne with them, which at first we refused. Mr. Liechardt then insisted that we should do so, stating that he had received some good news, worth over $3,000 to him, and that we must join him in celebrating the event. We then joined him in drinking some champagne, and he then requested us to accompany him to his home, which we all proceeded to do in company with some Mexican gentlemen of the party. When at the governor's palace, not seventy-five yards from the store of Liechardt and Kathrens, we were halted by some policemen in the usual manner, when Mr. Reiss, who was walking with me, (we being in the rear of the party,) answered to their challenge of "quien vive," "Mexico." They then said something else, which I did not understand, to which he responded, "Somas Americanos." The police then told us that they had orders from the government to arrest us. Mr. Reiss then asked him if he did not know him. He answered that he knew all of us. We then asked why we were arrested, to which the police answered that they did not know the cause of the arrest. At this time one of the police, in company with Dr. Margain, one of our party, who had also partaken of champagne with us, left the balance of us on the street in charge of the policemen until their return. Soon afterwards the policeman returned and told us he could do nothing, as the governor was not in the palace, but that he had talked with the governor's secretary, and that he had ordered him to put us in prison and treat us with rigor. The Mexicans who were with us, however, were allowed to go to their homes. We were then taken to the jail and placed in the "saguan," a front entrance, where the whole party were searched, and all that they had forcibly taken from them. Nothing was taken from me, as I had nothing valuable about my person. They then put us into the open yard, inside of the prison, where were some sixty or more convicts, murderers, and robbers of every grade, and vermin innumerable, and in this yard and in such company we passed the night, subject to jeers and insults of every kind. Immediately on our entrance into the prison one of the party went into a corner of the yard, where there is a gutter, to urinate, when one of the officers in charge struck him a severe blow with a whip called "nervio de toro." We passed the night as we could, not trying to sleep, as we did not know what might be done to us if we did by the wretches by whom we were surrounded. The next morning, at about four o'clock, they called on two of us to clean the privy, which they at first refused, but were compelled to do it by the officer in charge, who beat them severely for their first refusal. The marks from this beating remained on their bodies for several days. We were then put to sweeping out the yard of the jail, and when this work did not suit them they again lashed some of the party. When the arrest was made there was no hallooing or noise, nor did I hear any of the party making a noise on the street during the night. There were only two of the party at all under the influence of liquor, and of these one was perfectly at himself. The other was considerably intoxicated, but made no noise whatever on the street. The other four were perfectly sober, and we were going along conversing in an ordinary manner. I was some distance in the rear of the party, with Mr. Reiss, and I heard no noise coming from those in front. In the morning, when we were brought before the alcalde 1st, he commenced by stating that he did not come to try us, but to sentence us for creating a "scandalo" on the street. That he had been to the palace, and had heard the particulars of our case, and that he would, therefore, fine us ten dollars each. Against this we remonstrated, claiming that as most of us were innocent he was doing us great injustice. We then demanded that the witnesses should be produced to prove the charges against us. These witnesses were not produced. On our satisfying him that most of us were not guilty of having been drunk, he remitted the fine as to four of us, and afterwards remitted also the fine of the other two.

J. ULRICH, Consul.

I, L. P. Zapffe, a native of Norway, resident over ten years in the United States, now living and doing business as a watch-maker in the city of Monterey, do solemnly swear: That on the night of the 21st of April, 1868, I was, in company with others, in the billiard room of Mr. Zeigler, in the city of Monterey, playing a game of eucher for amusement. While so engaged, Messrs. E. F. Liechardt, L. B. Kathrens, and F. H. Potter entered, and asked us to join them in partaking of some champagne, which we did, and were afterwards joined by Don José Margain and other Mexicans whose names I do not know. While doing this none of us were disorderly, nor made any noise other than would usually take place under such circumstances. It being between ten and eleven o'clock, it was proposed we should go to our homes, and as we all lived in nearly the same direction, we (Messrs. Liechardt, Potter, Kathrens, Montgomery, Reiss, and myself, and the Mexicans who were with us) started to do so, and while on the street made no noise or other disturbance other than talking, and that not in a noisy manner. When under the balcony of the governor's palace we were saluted with the usual "quien vive" by a squad of policemen, to which one of our party answered "Mexico." They then drew their sabers, ordered us to halt, and the one who appeared to be in command told us that he arrested us by order of Señor Davila, secretary of the governor. By this time the rest of the party came up, and were told the same. Mr. Margain, who was included in the arrest, then said that, as he was a personal friend of Señor Davila, he would go up stairs and try to have us released. The chief of the squad of police and the other three Mexicans accompanied him, leaving us in the street under the charge of the remaining policemen. After about twenty minutes the policeman returned (without the Mexicans of our party, who had been allowed to go to their homes) and told us that the secretary had ordered him to take us to jail. Without any resistance whatever on the part of the six of us (foreigners) who remained, we went to the jail, hoping that when the alcalde in charge of the prison saw that most of us were sober he would release us. On our reaching the prison we asked the alcalde why we had been arrested, when he answered in a very insolent manner, that we had been sent to prison by order of the secretary of the governor. We were then searched, and all we had about us taken from us, excepting the watches of two of the party. The searching was done in a very rude and violent manner. At this time Mr. Landott, a man of property, doing business in Monterey, and well known, made his appearance, when two of our party were allowed to deposit their property in his hands. Mr. Landott then offered himself as security for the appearance of all of us to answer any charges that might be made against us in the morning. This was refused by the alcalde, he stating that, as we were sent to prison by order of the governor's secretary, he had no power to release us on bail. We were then ordered to enter the prison, and were placed inside of the yard where were confined fifty or sixty of the convicted criminals of the state. Two of our number, Mr. Liechardt and Mr. Potter, went to the gutter in the yard to urinate, and while so engaged a man jumped from his bed and struck Mr. Liechardt a severe blow on his back. We then seated ourselves on a bench in the yard to pass the night. We sat there, very cold and uncomfortable, until about four o'clock in the morning, when the convicts were called to take their soup or coffee. When they saw us, they commenced insulting us in the most disagreeable manner, using towards us the most obscene and filthy words of their language. To all this we made no reply, as we feared from their number we would be very roughly handled if we did so. This was continued until an officer, called the president of the prison, made his appearance and ordered us to "llevar el caballo." Mr. Liechardt, not understanding what was meant by this term, answered that he had no horse. At this the convicts again commenced hooting at and insulting us. The official then addressed Mr. Potter, who sat first on the seat, who told him he did not understand him. The demand was repeated several times, Mr. Potter answering always "no, señor," when the official drew from under his blanket a whip ("nervio de toro") and struck Mr. Potter very severely across the back and shoulders, all of which was repeated three or four times more. We then advised Mr. Potter to go, as we feared any further refusal would be still more severely treated. At this he arose to go to the place pointed out, and Mr. Liechardt was ordered to accompany him. They then went inside of a room and found a large tub filled with the filth of the prisoners, which they were told to carry out. While these two were in the room

I heard several blows, and afterwards saw Mr. Potter and Mr. Liechardt carrying the tub across the yard. While they were passing behind the "tanke," near the "commn," I heard the official cursing these gentlemen, and also heard other blows administered. Soon after this another official made his appearance and ordered us to sweep the yard. We complied with this order, the man in charge standing behind us with a whip. Mr. Liechardt, not sweeping to suit him, was struck several times. There was no row between us and the convicts; we endured their insults without a word. The beating was all done by officers of the prison. At seven or eight o'clock we were allowed to go outside and wait until we should be heard by the alcalde 1st, and at about ten o'clock we were taken to his court. This gentleman then, without hearing a witness, told us that he came to sentence us for creating a "scandalo" on the street, and that he would fine us ten dollars each. He was then asked to produce the witnesses. He said the secretary of the governor was his witness, and that he could not compel him to appear. We objected to the fine as unjust. He then asked if none of us were drunk. The reply was that two, Messrs. Liechardt and Kathrens, had been, but that no one had been disorderly. He then said that he would only fine these two, and afterwards withdrew this sentence. The American consul then called his attention to the treatment we had received while in jail, when he sent for the parties who had ill-treated us, the alcalde, the "presidente del carcel," and the chief policeman who made the arrest, and after hearing their statements told us he regretted the treatment we had received, and that we could get redress in the proper courts.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, June 19, 1868.

SIR: In the debate which took place in the Mexican congress on the 20th ultimo, upon the subject of the payment of interest on their foreign debt, a translation of which accompanied my dispatch No. 135, of the 27th May, the minister of the treasury, Mr. Romero, read a letter which had been addressed to him by the London bondholders recently, with regard to an arrangement of their affairs with this government.

The reply of Mr. Romero to this letter was published here, in the Diario Oficial, on the 17th instant.

As the amount of the debt held by the London bondholders is reported to be over sixty millions dollars, and forms a powerful influence bearing upon the foreign relations of this republic, I transmit to the department herewith, as a matter of information, a translation of this official communication relating thereto, of the Mexican government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[From the Diario Oficial, June 17, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT—SECTION 2.

I have received the communication which, under date of the 14th of April last, you were pleased to address to me, informing me that the Mexican bondholders in London had appointed a permanent committee, charged with the supervision of their interests, and authorized to negotiate the manner of arranging their business with the government of Mexico, and you conclude by stating to me that the committee is prepared to immediately open negotiations with the government of the republic, either in England by means of an agent accredited by the treasury department, or in this capital by means of a delegate which the said committee is disposed to send.

The government of the republic has already manifested, on different occasions, that it has the best disposition to pay all legitimate credits, and in fact has redeemed, since its return to this city, a part of the public debt.

It believes that, with the consolidation of peace, the revival of confidence, and the development of the natural elements of the country, its revenues will be augmented in such a manner that, before many years, it will have paid all of its debts that are legitimate in their origin.

Although the debt contracted in London belongs to that category, and the government recognizes it in principle, the fact that the bondholders made a new arrangement of the debt with Maximilian, who never had any right to bind the nation, and in this manner lent to him their aid and co-operation, places the debt in a different position, which cannot be arranged except by means of negotiations and mutual concessions.

Supposing that the committee appointed by the bondholders is disposed to send an agent to this city charged with the negotiation of an arrangement of their business with the government of the republic, I limit myself now to saying that the agent of the committee will be received by this department, and that it will be endeavored to make with him an arrangement mutually satisfactory.

I am your very attentive friend and obedient servant,

M. ROMERO.

Secretary of the permanent committee of the Mexican bondholders, London.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: On the 10th instant there was published in the Diario Oficial an official notice that Mr. Lerdo de Tejada had separated from the department of foreign affairs, on account of the supreme court of justice having refused the license asked by the government, that he might leave the exercise of the functions of president of the said court in order to continue in the ministry, and that the chief clerk remained in charge of the department. I inclose translation of said notice herewith.

On the 15th instant, but under date of the 10th, I received from the department of foreign affairs the customary notice of this change, as will appear in the communication, copy and translation of which are also inclosed herewith.

The withdrawal of Mr. Lerdo de Tejada from a direct participation in the executive government cannot but have a very important bearing upon the course of affairs in this country.

His ability, positiveness, and force of character have made him for some time virtually the soul of the administration, and there will be no one who can take the same place for a considerable period.

On the 16th instant there was published in the Diario Oficial an official announcement that the position of minister of justice and public instruction, rendered vacant by the continued illness and consequent resignation of Mr. Martinez de Castro, had been tendered to Mr. Mariscal, late chargé d'affaires in the United States; and yesterday his acceptance of that place in the cabinet of President Juarez was officially published in the same paper.

Mr. Mariscal, it is stated in the public journals, has also just been elected, by a popular vote, a magistrate of the supreme court, and, at the same time, also, deputy to the congress of the Union.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, June 24, 1868.

SIR: On the 16th of March last a commission was appointed by this government for the purpose of examining into the present state of mining in the republic, and especially into the system of imposts which now weighs upon that important branch of industry.

This commission was composed of a number of persons named by the government, and of delegates from each of the mining States, to be named by the miners themselves.

A translation is inclosed herewith of the order issued by the department of treasury appointing the commission, which fully explains the objects sought to be attained.

On the 25th ultimo this commission made a voluminous report upon the special subject of the existing imposts, which was submitted to congress by the minister of treasury just before the close of the last session.

This report concludes with the following important recommendation, viz: "The mining junta propose to the minister of treasury, as the sole means of rapidly raising this branch of industry to the grade of prosperity of which it is immediately susceptible, the absolute exemption of gold and silver from all duties."

Should action be taken by the Mexican congress at its next session, or at an early period, in conformity with this report, it would be of incalculable advantage to the industrial and commercial interests of this country.

It is almost too much to hope, however, that such action will soon be taken.

To show the burden resting upon the mining interests of Mexico, under the system of imposts in force at the date of the 1st ultimo, I inclose herewith a statement of the charges incurred by silver from the time it leaves the mine in bars until the proceeds are deposited in bank in England.

These charges, it will be seen, amount altogether to the enormous sum of twenty-five per cent., of which nineteen and one-half per cent. is for account of the government and the mint.

In addition to this burden, weighing upon this branch of industry, it is estimated that twenty per cent. or upwards of the silver contained in the ore is lost in the process of reduction.

It is very evident that against such obstacles mining in this country can progress only with difficulty.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

APPOINTMENT OF A BOARD FOR THE REFORM OF THE IMPOSTS ON THE PRODUCTS OF THE MINES.

[From the Diario Oficial, March 17, 1863.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT—SECTION 5.

Now that peace has been re-established in the republic, the President deems that the occasion has arrived for considering the subject of the improvement of the situation of the producing classes, and of providing such means as may be desirable for the encouragement of all branches of the public wealth.

One of those that requires, without doubt, the most particularly the care and protection of the government, is that of mining. It appears that nature has sought to make Mexico essentially a mining country, and there is every reason to believe that this important branch of the public wealth is scarcely yet explored. The government sincerely desires to encourage the mining interest by all the means that may be in its power, and especially that the system of contributions that now weighs upon it—and that many consider as an obstacle to its progress—shall be revised. It would certainly appear that the present system of imposts, which with such frequency press not upon the profits but upon the capital employed in that branch, is susceptible of improvement.

The President has observed with pleasure the earnestness with which the mining States have begun to promote this question, which is of a vital importance for the republic; and this has contributed to lead to the belief that the time has arrived to give attention to it.

As the great importance of the affair does not admit that it shall be decided precipitately, and without hearing the persons most directly interested in it, the citizen President has desired that there should be formed a mining board, composed of yourself and of Messrs. José Antonio Muchariz, José M. Godoy, Ismael Castelazo, Augustin Tamora, Miguel Bustamante, and Antonio del Castillo, for the attentive examination of the present state of mining in the republic, and especially of the system of imposts which now weigh upon it, reporting to the government all the measures that may be believed desirable for the encouragement and development of this branch, and proposing a system of imposts that, while it shall not be an obstacle to the mining interest, shall not deprive the treasury of the revenues that are now actually received from this source.

The President also desires that, if it shall be possible, you will occupy yourselves with proposing to the government such reforms in the ordinances of the mints and assay offices as shall be considered desirable in view of the modern advancements in the sciences.

The President, desiring to give a direct participation in this important work of improvement to the persons most directly interested in it, that by their experience and special knowledge may contribute the most efficaciously to attain the result proposed, has thought proper to direct that this department shall invite the miners of the States of Guanajuato, Zacatecas, Mexico, San Luis Potosí, Sinaloa, Sonora, Jalisco, Durango, Chihuahua, Michoacan, Guerrero, Oajaca, Puebla, and Vera Cruz, to send to the mining board a representative for each one of those States, who shall be accredited to the supreme government by the governor of the State by whom he is sent, or name a person resident in this city to represent them.

The representatives of the mining States will have a voice and vote in the mining board, but will not receive any salary from the federal treasury.

To the end of giving time for the most distant States to accredit their representatives to the mining board, the President desires that the board shall be installed on the 1st of May proximo.

I repeat to you the assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, March 16, 1868.

The export of uncoined silver, as also of ores, is prohibited.

From the best authorities it is also learned that, of the silver contained in the ores raised from the mines and carried to the reduction works in the most advanced mines in Mexico, upwards of twenty per cent. escapes and is lost, even under the most improved processes now in use.

This important branch of industry, therefore, labors under the disadvantage not only of the failure to extract that portion of the silver contained in the ore worked over, but also of having to bear charges to the amount of twenty-five per cent. upon the silver actually produced, and this whether the mines are yielding any returns upon the capital invested or not.

The foregoing statement is of charges as existing May 1, 1868.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 26, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 131, of the 20th ultimo, relative to the outrage inflicted upon six citizens of the United States at Monterey, on the 22d of April, has been received. The instructions which you say you await upon the subject have in part been anticipated by the communication to you from the department, No. 61, of the 23d ultimo.

No report of the close of the investigation of the case to which Mr. Lerdo de Tejada refers in his letter to the governor of New Leon, of the 9th of May, has yet reached here. If that report should come to your knowledge and should show that any person subject to the control of the Mexican government has been guilty of a delay or denial of justice to the citizens of the United States referred to, it is expected that that person will in some signal way be made sensible of the displeasure of that government.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF JALISCO BEFORE THE NATIONAL CONGRESS.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, May 19, 1868.—Translation.]

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT.

In the city of Mexico, on the 9th of May, 1868, the congress of the Union being erected in grand jury, the citizen secretary of the section read in full the process verbal relative to the accusation which the citizen deputies Robles Martinez, Silviano Moreno, and Angulo make against the governor of the State of Jalisco, for abuse of authority and infraction of articles 20, 101, and 112 of the constitution, and the law of the 30th of November, 1861.

The report of the section was also read, which concludes with the following proposition:

"It is declared that the citizen Antonio Gomez Cuervo, governor of the State of Jalisco, is guilty of violation of the organic law of the 30th of November, 1861."

After some discussion, the following proposition was introduced:

"The discussion of the report of the section of the grand jury is suspended, for the reason that the cause cannot proceed to the determination of the guilt or innocence of the presumed offender, as notice has not been served upon him of the day fixed for the trial of his cause, that he may be heard in his defense."

After discussion, this proposition was adopted by a vote of one hundred and twenty-one against seven.

The following proposition was then adopted:

"The twenty-eighth day of the present month is hereby designated for the continuance of the proceedings commenced against the governor of the State of Jalisco, the citizen Antonio G. Cuervo, to whom there shall to-day be sent, by extraordinary express, the corresponding notification by the secretary of congress."

[From the Siglo XIX, May 26, 1868.—Translation.]

JALISCO.

The accusation of Mr. Gomez Cuervo, governor of the State of Jalisco, before the general congress, has been very badly received in Guadalajara, and has led to the issuance of the decree we insert below, and which reached here yesterday by an extraordinary courier.

Decree of the State of Jalisco.

Emeterio Robles Gil, constitutional governor substitute of the State of Jalisco, to the inhabitants of the same; be it known:

Considering that the fact of the congress of the Union having submitted the citizen governor of the State to trial, for having carried into effect the decree No. 61 of this legislature, implies the declaration that said legislature had not the power to issue said law.

That although it is true that article 29 of the federal constitution provides that in cases of invasion, grave disturbance of the public peace, or any other cause that may place society in great peril or conflict, solely the president, in accord with his council of ministers, and with the approbation of the council of the union, can suspend personal guarantees; yet when an imminent danger in a State, or the immediate repression of crime, are the questions treated of, the legislatures should have the right of dictating the measures necessary to check the evil, although this may occasion that in a certain manner some guarantees with regard to the offenders may be suspended.

That it is thus implicitly stipulated in articles 19 and 28 of the constitution of the State, on providing in them that extraordinary powers may be given to the governor, and that he may of his own accord assume them whenever the urgency of the case shall require.

That if the legislatures had not the right alluded to, and in virtue whereof that of the State issued its decree No. 61, the sovereignty of the States would not exist, since even for the providing for their own preservation they would have to apply to the federal government.

Number 88. The inhabitants of Jalisco, represented by their congress, declare :

ARTICLE 1. It is declared that the congress of the State of Jalisco had full right to issue the decree No. 61, and possesses full right to dictate all others that it may judge opportune in the sense already expressed.

ART. 2. It is declared that the government of the State has complied with its duty in carrying into effect the decree referred to.

ART. 3. As what is expressed in the preceding declarations involves a controversy between the State and the federation, which should be decided in conformity with article 98 of the general constitution, a copy of this decree will be remitted to the supreme court of justice, in order that it may direct that the corresponding trial be commenced.

ART. 4. That the legislatures of the other States be exhorted to support, if they shall think proper, the rights of which the congress of the Union seeks to deprive them in denying that they can legislate, suspending certain guarantees when necessity requires it.

Hall of sessions of the congress of the State, Guadalajara, 21st of May, 1868.

J. V. TAGLE, Secretary.

P. LAUDAZURÉ, Secretary.

RAMON LUNA, President.

Wherefore I order that it be printed and published in legal form, for its due fulfillment.

GUADALAJARA, May 21, 1868.

EMETERIO ROBLES GIL.

ANTONIO P. VERDIA, Secretary.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF THE SIGLO XIX.

This decree gives rise to serious reflections. Whenever any high functionary is accused of infraction of the constitution or federal laws, it is the unavoidable duty of congress to subject him to trial, but this trial does not in any manner imply a declaration in respect to the acts of the legislatures.

The decrees of the latter are not revisable by the congress of the Union, and if individual guarantees be attacked by them, the law affords the injured parties the recourse of the courts for their protection.

The governors of the States are subject to two classes of responsibilities: as chiefs of the executive in each State, they are responsible before the respective legislatures, and as agents of the federation they are responsible before the general congress. The case may well occur of conflict between these two responsibilities; but keeping in view that the constitution is the supreme law of the country, and ought to be observed, notwithstanding whatever may be provided to the contrary by the particular laws of the States, and it being the federal courts that are charged with the application of the law of the Union, it is clear that the governors have to yield to the decisions and resolutions of the federal tribunals.

The suspension of guarantees can only be made by the President of the republic, in accord with his council of ministers and with the approbation of congress. This does not prevent the legislatures from conceding extraordinary powers to the governors, provided they neither attack nor suspend guarantees established by the general constitution.

This view is found set forth in one of the late circulars from the ministry of government, and the legislature of Queretaro acted in conformity therewith when it applied to the federal authorities for power to suspend the guarantee of free residence.

The constitution of the State of Jalisco authorizes the legislature to confer extraordinary powers upon the executive, but in no manner to suspend guarantees secured by the federal constitution.

If the States could decree such suspension and legislate on matters of individual guarantees, the union would exist only in name; the bonds of nationality would be relaxed, and the existence of the general powers would be almost superfluous, as they would be reduced to a complete nullity.

The sovereignty of the States should be complete in so far as relates to their interior regimen, but it should never be in opposition to the constitution.

In the internal affairs of the States the Union has in no way to intervene; but the Union should take care that in all and in each one of the States the federal constitution be observed.

We have always defended the sovereignty of the States, and our ideas on this point have been received with favor throughout the country, and even by the official press of Jalisco, particularly when we mention that the congress would arrogate to itself powers not belonging to it if it attempted to revise the elections of the functionaries of the State or the decree of the legislatures.

These reflections are suggested by the "considerations" of the decree of the legislature of Jalisco.

In so far as relates to the resolutions it contains, it is at once perceived that it is of no consequence that the legislature itself approves of its own acts, or of those of the governor.

It does not follow from such declarations, that there will be any controversy between the State and the federation, as the latter has not pronounced any decision in the matter, and thus the question does not come within the provisions of article 98 of the constitution, nor does any controversy exist upon which the supreme court of justice has to open trial.

The excitative addressed to the other States by the legislature of Jalisco, that they should sustain its pretensions, is very grave, because it is equivalent to inciting them to an unconstitutional course, that would subvert one of the fundamental bases of our political system, which consists in the supremacy of the Union and of the federal law. A bad interpretation of local sovereignty may have dangerous consequences. An exaggeration of the rights of the States produced the late civil war in the neighboring republic, placed it on the brink of ruin, and was most disastrous above all for the States that sought to place themselves above the Constitution.

It is to be hoped that the legislatures of the other States will not follow the path indicated to them by that of Jalisco, because that course would lead to discord, to anarchy, and the dissolution of the republic. It is also to be desired that the executive of the Union should take part in this matter, and make the States understand that they cannot place themselves above the constitution, and that their sovereignty depends precisely upon the deference they maintain for the federal law.

In the accusation and the trial of Mr. Gomez Cuervo there is no conflict or controversy between the federation and the State of Jalisco; there is simply an ordinary case of responsibility, which has to be decided by the grand jury, whose competency is undoubted, and has been recognized by the accused himself, when endeavoring to justify his acts, and in giving notice that he should make use of the right of defense.

The grand jury, in declaring the guilt or innocence of the accused, does not revise the decrees of the legislature of Jalisco, but decides whether the governor attacked or not the federal authority, and whether he violated or not the constitution by disregarding and disobeying the protection extended by the judge of the district in favor of citizens who were shot half an hour after there had been extended over them the judicial authority of the Union.

We do not wish at present to express any opinion as to what should be the decision of the jury, and will only remark that it would be undesirable in the highest degree, if any controversy should defeat the right to censure public functionaries and to make effective their responsibility.

In the jury there will undoubtedly be the utmost justice, as is indicated by the fact of having suspended its proceedings to give time for the defense of the accused, and there will also be sufficient calmness to proceed as behooves so august a tribunal, without being disturbed by the decree of the legislature of Jalisco.

The trial is to take place on the 28th. If the defendant should be absolved, he will continue in the government, full of prestige and respectability.

If he should be condemned, this decision will make manifest that the constitution and individual guarantees cannot be trampled upon with impunity; that the responsibility of public functionaries is not a vain promise; and that there really exist legal remedies against the arbitrary acts of power.

To oppose the taking place of this trial, as appears to be the intention of the legislature of Jalisco by its last decree, is a serious error, which almost involves the confession of the culpability of the accused.

Circular addressed by the minister of government to the governors of the States.

I this day communicated the following to the citizen governor of Jalisco:

"In council of ministers I laid before the constitutional President the decree numbered 28, issued by the legislature of your State, and which you transmit to me with your dispatch of the 21st instant.

"The gravity of the subject to which the decree relates, and the transcendancy of the declarations it makes, strongly arrest the attention of the federal executive, and after examining the affair with all the attention that it demands, the citizen President has directed that I should make to you the representations which are the object of this note, and for the ends that are therein expressed.

"The decree No. 28 is evidently unconstitutional, and invades the grave attributes which the fundamental law confers solely upon the congress of the Union and the federal executive. The text of that law is so clear as to render impossible any misinterpretation.

"Solely, the President of the republic, in concurrence with the council of ministers, says article 29 of the federal constitution, and with the approbation of the congress of the Union, 'may suspend the guarantees established by this constitution.' So far were the constituent legislators from conceding to the legislatures of the States the faculty of suspending the constitutional guarantees, that they refused the power even to the congress of the Union whenever the suspension should not be made by the President of the republic, in accord with his council of ministers; this essential requisite, the only one in our constitutional law limiting the legislative faculties of congress, constituting the proof that not even congress itself can suspend a constitutional guarantee, except in joint action with the government, this being a further wise precaution in a matter in itself most serious. All these views are so evidently true that if not the text of article 29, its discussion in the session of the constituent congress, on the 21st of November, 1856, would leave no room for the slightest doubt.

"For these unquestionable reasons it is an established principle of our constitutional right that the legislatures of the States can never suspend the guarantees sanctioned by the constitution.

"It is true that there may be instances when the constitutional law may not suffice for the assurance of public order, threatened in some locality by a serious peril; but the remedy for such an evil is not in infringing the law, doing what it prohibits, but in applying to the only power that can suspend guarantees, asking the necessary authorizations to confront the situation. In the circular from this department, of the 12th of last month, I stated to the government under your worthy charge what ought to be done in such cases, in order to attend equally both to the exigencies of the public peace and to the respect due to the supreme law of the country.

"Such a law does not attack the sovereignty of the States; it is known that it determines the quality and conditions of the federal compact which unites all of the States to form of them the nation; it is known that the local sovereignty only exists with the restrictions which that law establishes, nor is any one ignorant that to secure the general good of the country the States legitimately represented in the constituent congress consented to reserve certain faculties to the federal power exclusively.

"For this the States, without any offense to their sovereignty, are restricted from making alliances or treaties; they cannot coin money, nor make war against a foreign power, nor legislate on matters reserved to the congress of the Union, nor exercise faculties committed to the President of the republic; and this is why the States, without offending their sovereignty, cannot suspend guarantees, since this important attribute is exclusively reserved by article 29 of the constitution to the federal power.

"Local constitutions, it is true, permit their legislatures to invest their governors with extraordinary faculties, but such authorization cannot be invoked to enable them to do what belongs only to the competent federal power.

"The extraordinary faculties that a legislature may give cannot pass the limits assigned by the internal regimen of the State: they cannot treat of matters in which the legislature itself is incompetent, and this for the simple reason that what is not possessed cannot be given. For this reason these extraordinary faculties could never authorize a governor to do what the President only can do; and for the same reason a legislature cannot give authority to do what is permitted only to the congress of the Union. In this sense, and in no other, are articles 19, fraction 6 and 25, fraction 9, of the constitution of Jalisco to be interpreted.

"As the declarations made in the decree to which I am referring are supported by considerations which are certainly illegal, the federal government cannot admit them, nor recognize in the legislature of Jalisco, as asserted in the first article of the decree, the right of suspending constitutional guarantees, or of legislating upon matters which are reserved to the congress of the Union.

"The government makes no observations with respect to the third article, as the supreme court of justice will know how to fulfill its duty by determining what the law ordains in this case; but it cannot, indeed, omit indicating, although very summarily, that the excitative spoken of in article 4 is illegal, not because it invites other legislatures to do what they are prohibited from doing, but because the constitution does not permit States to form alliances or coalitions of any kind.

"Having by the preceding answered your official note of the 21st instant, I have finally to state to you, by express order of the citizen President, that the decree referred to being unconstitutional, the government of the Union, as also the authorities, to whom the constitution confides its inviolability, will proceed to act in their respective cases, obeying always, and with all preference, the general constitution of the republic, which cannot be derogated by the said decree."

And I transcribe the same to you, by the order of the citizen President, in order that you may be pleased to communicate this note to the legislature of your State, when the excitative, which that of Jalisco has made, with reference to this affair, shall be treated of. TRIAL IN CONGRESS.

[From the Siglo XIX, Mexico, May 29, 1868.—Translation.]

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT.

Session of the 28th of May, 1868; Mr. Zarco presiding:

The session commenced at half-past one in the afternoon, one hundred and twenty-nine representatives being present.

Mr. Zarco, president. Congress constitutes itself in grand jury.

Mr. Sanchez Ascona, secretary of the section of the grand jury, read the process verbal of the accusation made against the citizen Gomez Cuervo, governor of Jalisco, from which process we take the most important documents and the report with which it concludes. They are as follows:

The Accusation.

On the 2d day of February last, Antonio Gomez Cuervo, who acts as governor of the State of Jalisco, sanctioned the annexed decree, which, under the number 61, was issued by the legislature of that State, and which has the character of a special law of retroactive effect, the application of which is intrusted to the executive power, and in which decree are violated the guarantees respecting the life and liberty of individuals, provided by article 20 of the constitution of the republic.

On the 23d of the same month of February, at midnight, five individuals were apprehended, and were executed, by order of Señor Gomez Cuervo, at daybreak on the following day, without any previous trial whatever.

The victims in vain sought the protection of the federal courts for the assurance of their individual guarantees, a protection which was amply decreed in their favor, ordering the suspension of the execution for Señor Gomez Cuervo, infringing articles 101 and 102 of the constitution, and the organic law of the 30th of November, 1861, disregarding what had been opportunely decreed by the judge of the district, ordered that the five individuals should be executed in the principal square of Guadalajara.

Señor Gomez Cuervo has gone still further: he has manifested to the federal court that he will not obey such orders as are communicated to him with the object of hindering the executions he may decree.

The superior tribunal of the circuit has reported and transmitted all the antecedents of this business to the ministry and to the supreme court of justice of the nation.

For all the foregoing violations of the constitution we, the undersigned, accuse Señor Gomez Cuervo before the grand jury of the nation.

MEXICO, March 9, 1868.

Law No. 61 of the State of Jalisco.

Antonio Gomez Cuervo, constitutional governor of the State of Jalisco, to the inhabitants of the same; be it known that—

The honorable legislature of the State has remitted to me the following decree:

"Considering that the alarming proportions to which the perpetration of the crimes of robbery, kidnapping, and assassination have arrived requires a speedy and energetic remedy;

"That society, with good reason, intimidated by the magnitude of the dangers which surround it, urgently calls for the adoption of extraordinary measures, which shall put a stop to the evil and re-establish the public tranquillity;

"That congress cannot see with indifference the agony and alarm of the people, and should, on the contrary, make the greatest efforts to check in their origin the crimes which threaten the very dissolution of society ;

"That in the situation to which we have arrived the ordinary means established by the laws are not sufficient, and that it is necessary to strengthen the action of the executive, in order that it may be able to restore tranquillity so profoundly disturbed ;

"The congress of the State, making itself the interpreter of the most imperious of public exigencies, and desirous of saving the sacred interests of the people it represents, has thought proper to issue the following decree :

"Number 61. The people of Jalisco, represented by their congress, decree :

"ARTICLE 1. The observance of the law of the 3d of the present month, in so far as relates to the crimes of robbery, kidnapping, and assassination, is hereby suspended.

"ART. 2. During this suspension the government shall have the powers which the circular of the 12th of March, 1861, conceded to the military authorities for punishing the crimes of robbery, making the proceedings and penalties therein established applicable also to the crimes of kidnapping and assassination.

"ART. 3. The government can delegate the faculties treated of in the foregoing article to such political authorities and military chiefs as it may deem advisable.

"ART. 4. The government is authorized to expel from the State, by executive order, for the term of four years, any suspicious individual, or person suspected to be a robber or kidnapper.

"Let it be communicated to the executive for its promulgation and observance.

"Hall of sessions of the congress of the State, Guadalajara, January 31, 1868.

"ANDRES TERAN, President.

"JOSE G. GONZALES, Secretary.

"PEDRO LANDAZWIRE, Secretary."

In conformity with article 3d of the preceding decree, I have thought proper to direct :

1. The powers contained in article 2d are delegated to the political prefects of the cantons, and to the directors of the departments of the proper use of these powers, and strict application of the proceedings established in the circular of the 12th of March, 1861, the strictest responsibility will be exacted from said functionaries, under penalty of being dismissed from office in conformity with the laws, and furthermore punished as the case may require.

2. The same powers are delegated to the military authorities of the State, and with the approval of the citizen general-in-chief of the fourth division, they shall also be transmitted to such officers of the same division as, with the accord of said general, may be charged with the persecution or apprehension of the delinquents referred to in the inclosed decree, the government reserving to itself to restrict these powers in the special instructions, which in each case may be given, and to which the said chiefs shall scrupulously adhere, under penalties of the ordinance which shall be made effective by the superior officer whose duty it may be.

3. The section of justice of the government department shall form a weekly report of the criminals proceeded against, according to the present provisions, which shall be certified to and duly published.

4. The bodies of the criminals executed in compliance with respective provisions shall remain exposed to public view for the space of twenty-four hours on the site of the execution, or in that of the perpetration of the crime of which the criminals have been the authors, as may be judged convenient by the authority imposing the penalty.

Wherefore, I order that it be printed and published in legal form for its fulfillment.

GUADALAJARA, February 2, 1868.

The following is the circular referred to :

DEPARTMENT OF WAR AND MARINE—CIRCULAR.

Under date of the 7th instant I communicated to the citizen prefect and principal commandant of the district of Morelos the following :

"By your official note of the 6th instant, his excellency the President has learned with regret of the excesses committed by a party of bandits on the estate of San Carlos, and approves the efficacious solicitude with which you took steps for pursuing the malefactors, and the succor afforded to the district wherein the crime was perpetrated, although not comprehended within the jurisdiction under your command.

"The supreme government is actively engaged in the formation of a law of expeditious and severe proceedings for the trial of robbers, and firmly establishing public security, by the exemplary punishment of these offenders ; but until said law shall be published by the respective departments, his excellency the President empowers you to order the execution of every robber taken in the act, giving a report of what shall so take place.

"With respect to the bandits, against whom there may be well-grounded presumptions, when once captured, you will proceed to draw up an act, in which shall appear the declarations of two competent persons of known probity, and the culpability being proved by the uniformity of testimony against the individual, whether for the perpetration of a robbery or because he belongs to bands of highwaymen, you will give orders that he be shot, transmitting an authorized copy of the proceedings, and remaining with a tranquil conscience as regards the carrying into effect these proceedings, as the supreme government, deviating from the channels and proceedings established by the laws, and trying robbers militarily, does so by virtue of the ample faculties with which it is invested, urged by the necessity of the moment and the duty of saving society; but its dispositions during this transitory epoch will remain without effect immediately, as has been stated, that by the respective ministry or by the sovereign congress, the regular administration of justice shall be established as the situation of society shall require."

I transcribe the same to you by order of his excellency the President, in order that within the precincts of your authority, and with respect to robbers, the provisions of the inclosed communication be carried into effect.

God, liberty, and reform! Mexico, March 12, 1868.

ORTEGA.

His excellency the GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF JALISCO.

Order from the federal court.

COURT OF THE DISTRICT.

The citizen Licentiate Ignacio Matute has just presented himself in this court as counsel of prisoners, stating in writing that five individuals are to be shot in the morning of to-day without being tried by the tribunals established by the constitution.

As, if this be true, it attacks the guarantees the constitution of 1857 has conceded to every Mexican, it becomes the duty of this court to impart the protection, and id. demanded; and, therefore, in the name of the justice of the Union, I issue to you the present, for the purpose that you shall give orders for the suspension of said execution, with the reservation of a proper trial, in order that should the proceeding in question prove to be legal the action of the government shall remain free.

Independence and liberty! Guadalajara, February 24, 1868, at 25 minutes past 5 in the morning.

The Citizen GOVERNOR of the State.

Reply of the governor.

SUPREME CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT OF THE STATE OF JALISCO—SECTION OF JUSTICE.

The criminals referred to in your note that I have just received, and which I hasten to answer, have been tried and sentenced to death in conformity with the provisions in force in the State in matters of robbery and kidnapping, with which provisions I supposed you were perfectly acquainted from the day of their publication. Copies of them were sent to your court, as also to the superior tribunal of circuit. The duty of the government under my charge is to fulfill those provisions, and enforce their fulfillment in pursuance of the attributes imposed by the constitution of the State, and it is impossible for me, without violating that duty, of the observance of which I have to render account to the honorable legislature, to order the suspension of the proceeding against said criminals, as you intimate in your said note.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE AND PUBLIC INSTRUCTION—SECTION 1.

For the effects of article 149 of the interior regulations of the congress of the Union, I inclose to you, duly certified, the process verbal formed against the citizen governor of that State, under the accusation of the citizen deputies Robles, Martinez, and Agulo, and which the section of the grand jury of the congress has been pleased to remit to this department for the purposes indicated.

I have to ask that you will acknowledge the corresponding receipt.

Service of the same.

GUADALAJARA, April 24, 1868.

This citation, with the official note which accompanies it, having been received, let the directions of the section of the grand jury of the congress of the Union, in their resolution of the 15th of the present month, be carried into effect, the judge who signs hereto passing to the house of the citizen governor of the State for the purpose expressed in article 149 of the internal regulations of congress.

By the judge of the district of the State of Jalisco, decreed and signed.

D. J. TREJO.

A. ANGEL PEREZ.

A. VICENTE URZUA.

On the 25th of the same month, with the object of giving compliance to the foregoing order, associated with those assisting, I passed to the palace of the State, and the citizen Antonio Gomez Cuervo, governor of the same, being present, the undersigned judge read this process, and having concluded, Señor Gomez Cuervo said:

"The state of excitement and of alarm in which the inhabitants of the State of Jalisco found themselves in the month of January last, owing to the kidnapping and other crimes that were committed even in the principal streets of the capital, energetically called for the adoption of efficacious measures for putting a stop to a state of vandalism without example even in the epochs of the greatest disorders and revolution.

"The whole city demanded that such measures should be taken. No one is ignorant of the representations which, with that object, were addressed to the government and to the legislature, until the latter finally had to issue the decree of the 31st of January, which forms the second page of this proces, and which declared in force the circular of the 12th of March, 1861, leaving its application to the charge of the political authorities in addition to the military, although with the restriction that to the government belonged the faculty of designating what authorities and what officers should have the powers which in the circular were given to the governors and military commandants.

"It is to be noticed that this is the same disposition which was ordered to be again observed under date of the 27th of May, 1867, by the department of justice of the general government, when it was at San Luis, and that it had continued in force in the State until it was suspended by the legislature of the same, as it was not until the month of January last that by the government, or the congress of the nation, the mode of administering justice had been determined.

"The decree No. 61 of the congress of the State having been published, as I have stated, and there being no law that conflicted with it, and above all, in fulfillment of article 28 of the constitution of the State, which provides that the governor shall publish the laws without excuse or observation, I was obliged to proclaim it forthwith, decreeing immediately, in conformity with article 3d, the regulations I thought proper for delegating, without danger of abuse, the powers referred to in article 2d.

"I must observe in passing, that, as is public and notorious, the decree was received with applause by the whole of society, who saw in it their salvation. Votes of thanks to congress were drawn up, tranquillity commenced to be restored, and the authorities were only recommended to be prudent in its application.

"On the apprehension of the kidnappers, whose execution has led to my being accused, they were directly, and by virtue of the law, consigned to the political prefect, who tried, condemned, and executed them, without any intervention on the part of the government, whose functions in the matter ceased with the publication of the law.

"These criminals asked protection after they were sentenced, and the judge of the district communicated to me, a few moments before the execution, to suspend the same.

"The section of the grand jury will at once perceive that the law having been issued under the responsibility of the congress of the State, executed by the political prefect in virtue of the authorization given in the law itself, the executive government of the same was entirely foreign to the question, since it was neither the executor of the sentence, nor had it pronounced the sentence, or issued the law, this being the reason why it limited itself in its reply to stating its constitutional obligations.

"I have pointed out the situation of Jalisco when the decree was issued, and some other circumstances relating to its subsistence, in order that the section of the grand jury may be pleased to estimate them at what they may be worth. For my part, I conclude with the assurance that, although I am convinced of the necessity there was for the punishments which took place in this city, I regret the same, as I pride myself in being one of the first to recognize the respect that is due to individual guarantees."

This he said and signed before me.

Then follow various representations of municipalities and citizens of Jalisco, asking the absolution of the accused.

Report of the section of the grand jury.

The section of the grand jury has made a most scrupulous examination of the cause instituted by reason of the accusation presented to the chamber by the citizen deputies Robles, Martinez, Moreno, and Agulo, against the constitutional governor of Jalisco, Antonio Gomez Cuervo.

With an intimate conviction of the gravity and importance of this affair, the undersigned have thought it their duty to consider it thoroughly, in order to report to the national grand jury what they judge to be the most strict justice.

The section does not believe it necessary to make an extract of the procés wherein are contained the proofs of the facts which give rise to the accusation, as this proceeding appears unnecessary, the documents having been read in full in accordance with the regulations prescribed, and will have sufficiently informed the chamber, even to the fullest details. It is sufficient for their purpose to state the facts that appear to be proved, make the application of the legal precepts which serve as the basis of the accusation, and deduce therefrom the consequence which is contained in the opinion they have been able to form of the affair, submitting the same to the wisdom of the jury.

The legislature of Jalisco issued, on the 31st of January of the present year, a decree putting in force the circular which, with reference to the crime of robbery, was dictated by the supreme government of the republic, on the 12th of March, 1861. On the simple perusal of this decree it is clearly and undeniably seen that it is in open opposition to a great part of the precepts contained in the federal charter of 1857, in force in the republic since the 8th of December of last year, when the dictatorship ceased, which was created to meet the difficulties of the late foreign war.

In the opinion of the undersigned, the principle is not even doubtful, that only the congress of the Union, or during its recess the permanent deputation, with the previous consent of the government in council of ministers, can suspend the guarantees conceded to the inhabitants of the republic, in the bill of rights contained in section 1 of title 1 of the constitution. The 29th article of the fundamental law not only reserves to the chamber this important faculty, but carefully restricts it, pointing out the cases wherein use may be made of it, the special points which it is prohibited to touch, and the precise conditions to be observed in making use of that authority.

The legislators of 1857, not content with having made the explicit declaration contained in this article, were desirous of still further removing any doubt or error, by establishing, in the 126th article, the basis upon which the law of the constitution is founded, whose rules form the supreme law of all the Union, to which the authorities of the land must subject themselves, notwithstanding whatever disposition to the contrary that may be contained in the constitutions or laws of the States.

Consequently the general constitution and the organic laws issued to complete it and make practicable the division and attributes of the federal powers, are very positive as regards the deference and respect that are due to them, over the local regimen, the first condition of which is that of subordination to the stipulations contained in the social compact. Neither can the character of free and sovereign, possessed by the States of the federation with respect to their internal administration, be opposed to this, because the condition of this autonomy springs precisely from and is based upon the federal charter, which is the root and principle of our institutions, and therefore there cannot be comprehended in the exercise of that right the violation and disregard of the fundamental law.

This being so, the decree which the legislature of the State of Jalisco ordered to be promulgated on the 31st of January last ought neither to have been issued nor observed, because by it were suspended the guarantees conceded in articles 13, 14, and 20 of the constitution.

The deputies who form that legislative body will be personally responsible, in conformity with the constitution of the State, for that act, which constitutes a fault committed in the discharge of their attributes; and it may also be considered that the governor, Antonio Gomez Cuervo, also is responsible, because he not only carried into effect the provisions of that decree, in every sense unconstitutional, but he went still further than the legislature, and issued a regulation on the 2d of February last, delegating to the subaltern authorities, both military and political, the discretionary powers with which he believed himself invested.

In the application of the decree referred to occurred the event which gives rise to this accusation, and the nature of which we believe we are able to examine with probabilities of correctness by the light thrown on it by the foregoing considerations.

Five persons were arrested in Guadalajara who, according to the rumor circulated after their apprehension, had committed the crime of kidnapping; and it was said in public, that at daybreak on the 24th of February last, they were to be shot without any previous trial having taken place, or the least time allowed for an examination into the charge which had led to their being sentenced to the highest penalty.

The judge of the district of Jalisco, at the petition of the counsel for criminals, and in accordance with the organic law of 30th November, 1861, opportunely ordered the suspension of the execution, meanwhile that a trial for their defense might be opened, and communicated this disposition to the governor, Don Antonio Gomez Cuervo. This functionary, for the reasons which appear in his answer, received by the judge of the district a day after the criminals had been executed, in whose favor protection had been decreed, or for whatever other reasons, did not comply with the judicial decree of suspension, which placed the prisoners under the shield of the federal courts. 'Such an act involves a flagrant violation of article 4th of the said law of the 30th November, 1861, undermines at their base our social institutions, and consequently is a charge of inevitable responsibility. The exculpations made by the accused, on replying to the charges, are not sufficient, in the judgment of the section, to extenuate them, or much less to refute them.

These exculpations are reduced to two points: In the first place, Señor Gomez Cuervo believes that the obligation the constitution of the State imposes upon him of executing the laws of the same relieves him from enforcing obedience to the general constitution and laws; and in the second place, he thinks that the abnormal situation in which the State of Jalisco was found authorizes and justifies his proceedings.

We have already remarked how inexact and illegal the opinion is upon which the first of his exculpations is founded; and with respect to the second, it is easy to see that, whatever may be the character of necessity given to the occasion for a punishable act, it is not sufficient to avert the judicial proceedings, although it may at the proper time be alleged as an extenuating circumstance in mitigation of the rigor of the law in the sentences.

In the judgment of the undersigned, it results from what has been set forth that the accusation which has given rise to the continuation of this process is legal and well founded, and the undersigned conclude by submitting to the enlightened deliberation of the national grand jury the following:

"It is declared that the citizen Antonio Gomez Cuervo, governor of the State of Jalisco, is guilty of infraction of the general law of the 30th of November, 1861, and of the constitution."

Section of the grand jury, Mexico, May 9, 1868.

SANCHEZ ASCONA,
Secretary.

The reading of the documents having been concluded, the said citizen Sanchez Ascona read the following official note from citizen Gomez Cuervo:

Defense of Governor Cuervo.

SUPREME GOVERNMENT OF THE STATE OF JALISCO.

Summoned by the secretary of the grand jury to appear on the 28th instant, to defend myself before it from the accusation which has been made against me for violation of individual guarantees, and without refraining from doing so if it shall be possible, either personally or by means of counsel, I am desirous that the grand jury should at once be made acquainted with the documents I inclose, which may have some influence in the decision of the matter in question. They will form my only defense, should the brevity of time allowed me for appearing, not admit of making it in any other manner.

Elected governor of the State of Jalisco against my wish, against my expectations and when I had never figured nor aspired to figure in any public post, I thought it my duty nevertheless, as a citizen, to accept the position, although for me it was a sacrifice which was what as a liberal I had already made, seeing with resignation my little property destroyed at one time by reactionists, at another by interventionists and French, notwithstanding the false reproaches now made against me through party spirit of having served the empire, and on which point document No. 1 gives sufficient explanations.

On taking charge of the government, I did so with the firm determination of always being the faithful interpreter of the law, and that it should be the guide of my conduct, procuring whatever good might be possible for a people who, without any merits on my part, had so elevated me. I am convinced that, so far as my incapacity has permitted, I have not deviated from that path, and this alone it is that makes me now see with regret that I should be criminally tried when my conscience tells me that I have not been wanting in my duty.

I purposely refrain from describing the state of alarm in which, at the beginning of this year, the whole State of Jalisco was found, owing to the unheard of and incredible development of the most ferocious banditism, which perpetrated crimes and depredations even in the principal streets of the capital. I well know that it is said by the enemies of the government that this state of things was exaggerated, and I, therefore, let facts speak which cannot be contradicted.

To put an end to the evil I have spoken of, the congress of the State issued, under date of the 3d of January, the decree relating to criminal trials, which I inclose, marked No. 2, in which, while giving the parties accused all constitutional guarantees, brief proceedings were provided, and such measures as it was considered might conduce to the desired result were dictated. The trials were established, but robberies and kidnappings continued, because the decree had not sufficient efficacy to terrify the bandits, who, it is mournful to have to state, counted, if not on the direct support of the opposition, on the moral support they derived from seeing the authority depreciated and ridiculed by the daily and blood-thirsty invectives, which, without reason, were directed against it, in publications which have only been allowed to exist owing to the government, the faithful slave to the law, having wished to respect to the utmost the liberty of thought and of the press.

Owing to the inefficacy of the decree of the 3d of January, the alarm of society was of such a nature, that, on the 31st of the same month, a committee from the municipality of Guadalajara presented themselves before congress, asking for the adoption of more severe measures, as also a numerous concourse of citizens to present the memorial marked No. 3, contained in the adjoined number of the official paper of the State, of the 6th of February.

Congress could not resist, before the exigencies of a population possessed with terror; it comprehended that although only the president in council, with his ministers, and with the approbation of the congress of the Union, can in certain cases suspend the constitutional guarantees, this right ought also to be possessed by the States in urgent cases which do not give time to apply to the federation, as they have the right in such cases of making war against a foreign power, although in article 112 of the constitution it is prohibited in general; and as he who is attacked by a bandit has the right of killing him without waiting for his condemnation by the tribunals, congress, under the pressure of the circumstances, issued on the same day, the 31st of January, the decree No. 61, of which I inclose a copy marked No. 4. Fraction 1 of the 28th article of the constitution of the State (document No. 5) prescribes among the attributes of the governor that of publishing and executing all of the laws, and of causing them to be obeyed, as also of taking care that the public order shall be preserved.

The meaning of that fraction has been determined, since the year 1862, by congress itself, in the same official documents which, underlined, are contained in the pamphlet No. 6, (pages 19 and 25,) and later in fraction 3d of article 16 of the decree No. 73, (document No. 7.)

The governor, by virtue of that constitutional precept, has the obligation to publish, under the exclusive responsibility of the legislature, the laws which the latter may issue, immediately on receiving them, and without his being permitted to make any observation whatever, since it is declared that the government does not sanction them but is only the medium of their publication, as are afterwards the political chiefs and directors in the cantons of the States.

This precedent being made known, it is clear that I incurred no responsibility by the publication of the decree No. 61. I simply performed my constitutional duty, and no charge can on that account be brought against me.

After the publication of the decree, the execution of which was intrusted to the political authorities without the government further interfering therewith, public tranquillity began to revive, and still more so when about that time five kidnappers were apprehended, who were tried in conformity with the decree, and whose criminality was proved in due form, as is seen in the certified copy of the act which was drawn up in conformity with the circular of the 12th of March, 1861, (document No. 8.)

All society was awaiting what was to take place; the culprits were condemned to death, and their execution became such a necessity that had it been suspended it would have caused a disorder, as all the world would have seen by it the solemn declaration of impunity for criminals of that kind.

The proof of this is shown in the fact that scarcely had the criminals been executed when from the greater part of the towns commenced to come in votes of thanks to the congress, to the government, and to the political prefect, among which may be seen those which will be found published in numbers 185, 188, 189, and 200 of the official paper of the State, (documents Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13,) the numbers of which are inclosed for that purpose.

At five in the morning of the day of the execution I received an official note from the judge of the district ordering me to suspend the execution, as the criminals had asked the protection of the guarantees.

I then gave the answer which appears in the procès verbal, stating my obligations as governor of the State; this answer was sent in sufficient time for the court of the district to address itself either to the congress, author of the law, or to the political prefect, charged with the execution of it. I know not by what incident, accidental or not, the note was carried to the judge of the circuit, and the judge of the district did not receive it until after the culprits had been shot. But considering the state of things, and above all, that I was neither the author of the decree nor the person charged with its execution, that it was not to me whom the judge of the district should have addressed himself, but to the political prefect or to congress, would it have been prudent, would it have been politic, even though I had been the party that had decreed the execution, to suspend it as was ordered?

I am of opinion that in those moments my responsibility would have been affected by again introducing alarm and agitation into a society that, always humane and opposed to bloody spectacles, nevertheless then saw their salvation in the execution of those five criminals.

I call the attention of the grand jury to the circumstance that when these events were passing in Guadalajara there had been already proposed in the general congress by the ministry initiative for declaring in force the law of the 25th of January, 1862, the discussion of which has only been terminated a few days since. What would have happened if the congress of the State, instead of dictating the decree No. 61, had remained indifferent, and tolerated until now the continuation of the dreadful situation in which Guadalajara was placed?

If, as I have before stated, it be possible for me to attend the session of the grand jury, personally or by counsel, I will then amplify the reasons I have here only indicated.

However that may be, I from this moment submit to the determination it may dictate, as my conscience tells me that I have not been criminal, and this will tranquilize me in case I shall be condemned.

GUADALAJARA, May 15, 1868.

A. G. CUERVO.

The citizen SECRETARIES OF THE GRAND JURY, Mexico.

The reading of the documents being concluded, the debate commenced.

SPEECH OF MR. ZARCO, PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS, SUSTAINING THE ACCUSATION.

[From the Siglo XIX, Mexico, 30th May, 1868.—Translation.]

Mr. ZARCO, president: I was unwilling to speak, as I wished to avoid saying anything against the accused. The part of defender is undoubtedly more attractive than that of accuser, and I would not aggravate the situation of Señor Gomez Cuervo. But such sentiments have been expressed, and such reasons adduced by the defenders of the accused that with much regret I am forced to make some rectifications.

The principal argument on which the defense is based is that the desperate situation in which kidnappers had placed Jalisco called for the conduct observed by the legislature and the governor, and to incline the mind of the jury to pronounce an absolute public disorder is even predicted.

Notwithstanding the alarming symptoms which, since the commencement of this question, it is said have appeared in the State of Jalisco, notwithstanding the predictions of a disturbance of the public peace which are being repeated to us, the truth is that the accused has come to bow down before the jury, and that he has attempted to justify his conduct, and that the people of Jalisco remain and will remain tranquil because they will respect the sentence of the law.

Our duty, above every individual consideration, is to do justice, and to give no motive for the repetition and even justification of the calumnies always cast upon us of not knowing how to govern ourselves.

I have defended, through the press, the sovereignty and independence of the States in their internal regimen; I have sustained that congress has no right even to revise the decrees issued by the States; but if I have sustained this, I also sustain, as an indisputable truth, that the federal constitution and laws are above the laws and constitutions of the States, and if we ought to respect the internal government of localities we ought not to consent that the constitution shall be violated.

The counsel for Señor Gomez Cuervo has been very able; the good will of the audience has been captivated, and we all regretted that he had not a better cause to defend; but notwithstanding his brilliant style, he has not been able to diminish, even in one single point, the culpability of his client.

I have remarked that he as well as the other speakers who have taken up the defense of the accused, have occupied themselves in trying to do away with a charge which is not made against him. They have sought to sustain the right or obligation he was under of promulgating the decree of the legislature.

The charge is not that of having published the decree, but of having carried it into effect. He should have remembered that no law in the world is superior to the fundamental compact; he should have remembered what is provided by the law of 30th November, 1861, and should have availed himself of the opportunity afforded him by the judge of the district in decreeing the trial of protection.

The responsibility for those assassinations, which recall those of Tacubaya, it is sought to throw entirely upon the political prefect, because he tried and condemned the persons executed; and it is sought to establish that the governor had no obligation, and that it would have been an act of officiousness on his part to inform the judge of the district to what party he ought to have addressed himself to obtain the suspension of that butchery.
